There can be no doubt, I think, that Munch's Beethoven is unorthodox, but it is fresh, vigorous, beautiful and in good taste. He makes Beethoven happy music—strong, noble and dignified, but never lugubrious. The first symphony was enchantingly conceived, in full understanding of the classic ideal in which it is set, and as a prophecy of things to come, yet there was no touch of the gloomy and not once did fate knock on the door. In the third symphony, Munch maintained the mood of noble optimism, but on a broader canvas; the work was read with fire, brilliance and breadth, but despite its massiveness never became unwieldy. For me the summation of what Munch can do with Beethoven came in the second movement of the third symphony, which was wrought with deep perception, dynamic intensity, infinite variety and over-all nobility. The entire program was an outstanding example of what happens when a great conductor meets a great orchestra in musical masterpieces.

—Louise L. Goss.

BATTLE CREEK ENQUIRER & NEWS
Oct. 24, 1950

Boston Symphony

Battle Creek Will Not Soon Forget Wonderful Music That Marked Community Concert Anniversary.

[illegible] moments of dissonance, which an average rendition might make painful to the sensitive ear. The violin solo work of Richard Burgin, concertmaster, was superb, and that of the first flautist, Georg Laurent, was amazingly perfect. Two harps, played by men, rather than the usual feminine artists, added greatly to this number, which covers many emotions, dealing with the experiences of the wine god and the abandoned Ariane (Ariadne is more common nomenclature). Dr. Munch's direction was dynamic.

The second half of the program was devoted entirely to Johannes Brahms' marvelous symphony in E minor (No. 4, Op. 98) and, despite its length and its four distinct movements, the time passed all too quickly. The Allegro non troppo movement was played quietly, with some of the most exquisite plucking of the strings imaginable. Even the nine bass viols seemed as one instrument, as did the violins and violas. The Andante moderato opened with some beautiful French horn passages, leading through some lace-like moments to a stately finale. The Allegro giocoso movement was off to a vigorous start, followed by the loveliest of diminuendos and then a nice swing which did not dull the appreciation of the meaty content of the movement. The Allegro energgico e passionale introduced some vigorous bowing, technically perfect, some alluring flute passages, and a lovely control of the brass section.

Vienna could not have attained more enjoyment, back in September, 1884, than Battle Creek experienced Monday evening. Dr. Munch was called back to the stage several times. It was not his policy to provide an encore, after this difficult and exacting program, and the audience finally sensed this fact. The usual exodus during the final number was for once not in evidence.

At intermission time both Ward French, national president of Community Concerts (New York) and Arthur Wisner, vice president (Chicago), were introduced by John Craig Allen, local president, and both spoke briefly. Mr. French was in a happy mood, as he should be in considering the growth of Community Concerts from the inception in Battle Creek in 1930-31 to the international set-up of today. He has a well-trained voice and could be heard plainly without the microphone, which he declined to use. Both he and Mr. Wisner were loudly applauded, most of those present realizing the tremendous amount of work that had to be done to create the Community Concert organization of today. It may be years before the Boston Symphony returns to Battle Creek, but it will be years, too, before those who attended its performance Monday evening will forget Dr. Munch and his musicians. Now they know that while there are many great symphony orchestras in America, there is only one Boston Symphony.—G. B. D.

[illegible] taken this community many years to reach a financial [illegible] which it could afford the [illegible] of the Boston orchestra. This year it reached that point, enabling it to not only book the orchestra but to provide four other concerts of high quality to augment the [illegible]

Appreciation fairly oozed from the capacity crowd that gathered [illegible] Dr. Munch and his men. The [illegible] Alsatian had scarcely stepped on stage before the applause became tremendous. Dr. Munch sensed that he was facing [illegible] who came to enjoy his work and later he commented on the sincerity and spontaniety of his reception. The orchestra always gives a remarkable performance, but Monday evening it seemed to be inspired and the smallness of the community was definitely not a factor in the performance.

Speaking of Dr. Munch, it should be said that he is more French than German, though some people have pointed out that he served with the German army in World War I. They do not know that he was forced to do so. Alsace was then in German control and Dr. Munch was a native of Strasbourg. He was born of a French mother and an Alsatian father. Ernest Munch, his father, was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. The son, Charles, studied violin in both Paris and Berlin. He directed several orchestras in Paris and he founded the Paris Philharmonic. He speaks fluent French, as the writer found in conversation Monday evening, very good German and understandable English. And he is as charming "off-stage" as on.

But, to get to the concert itself, it may be said without much fear of contradiction, that it was the best symphonic program this community has ever heard. The 104 musicians play as one, in their respective choirs, and they can display the most extreme delicacy in pianissimo as certainly as they display the most thrilling power in the fortissimo. When there comes an abrupt stop, the edges are not in the slightest degree ragged—and the rest that follows is dramatic and poignant. These factors were evident in the opening number, von Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio"—the fourth overture which Beethoven wrote for this opera and the one that has become permanently known as the "Fidelio" overture. The audience, which was probably more familiar with this than with some of the other offerings, gave Dr. Munch an ovation. This one fact may have much to do with the whole-some enthusiasm the musicians put into their entire program.

Battle Creek was fortunate to hear Claude Debussy's magnificent "La Mer"—a series of three orchestral sketches built on the composer's passion for the sea. As a composition it baffles the average symphony audience, and many of those present who follow music with keen interest had never before heard it rendered. The first sketch, "From Dawn to Noon at Sea," moved with a gentle undulation with an occasional swell of sound, and then the serenity of a [illegible] sea under the noonside sun. The second, "Gambol of the Waves," was playful at times, tranquil at others, [illegible] vehement as a wave crashes into wave and [illegible] a climax ensues. There was more of a [illegible] to the third sketch, "Dialogue Between Wind and Sea," opening with an ominous roaring of sound, with a booming depth to represent the voice of the sea and a delightful use of the oboe as leader of the wind. Dr. Munch was called forth to take not one but two ovations.

Albert Charles Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" number, embracing the Ballet of the Second Suite (Opus 43), proved intriguing even in its

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 22 1950

Survivor of First Symphony Welcomes Royal Philharmonic

The only living member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra last night greeted members of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London as they arrived for their concert today at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall.

It is the first time an English orchestra had visited Boston since 1912, and brought the total number of foreign orchestras that have come to Boston up to five. Though the most recent visit of a symphony orchestra from abroad was in 1948, the nevt previous time Bostonians heard a foreign orchestra was in 1922.

MEMORY VIVID

It was appropriate then that they should be greeted by Daniel Kuntz, who at the age of 90 still clearly remembers the first Boston Symphony concert in October, 1881, when he was "concert-master from the rear."

Kuntz recalled that the English orchestra that came here in 1912 was the London, not Royal, Philharmonic, and that it was conducted by Arthur Nikisch, then a former conductor of the Boston Symphony. Nikisch, said Kuntz yesterday, was a stern disciplinarian.

"One day I asked him if I could be excused from rehearsal the following Thursday. He asked what I was going to do. I told him that I would be married Wednesday night, and Thursday would like to be free. He thought a minute and then said 'All right, if you won't do it again.' And I kept my part of the bargain."

TRAVELED ABROAD

Though he has lived alone since his wife died 20 years ago (they had no children), Kuntz has enough memories of a rich life to keep him more than company. It was his custom to travel abroad, frequently to Heidelburg, where he was born and lived until the age of 14.

Every important festival was on his itinerary on the 12 trips to Europe he made before his retirement in 1914. That was shortly after the night when the former Boston Symphony conductor, Carl Muck, was arrested as a German alien, at the end of a gruelling 13-hour rehearsal session.

He spoke of meeting Frau Cosima Wagner and her son Siegfried, and of being shown through Richard Wagner's huge musical library at Bayreuth. At that famous opera center he played under three of the most celebrated conductors—Hans Richter, Felix Mottl and Herman Levi.

TO FIRST RANK

"It was Wilhelm Gerricke who first built the Boston orchestra up to first rank. He was the second conductor, before Nikisch, and came back for another term before Muck arrived (by permission of aKiser Wilhelm). It was in 1886 under Gerricke that the Boston Symphony first travelled. We played in old Steinway hall on 14th street in New York.

"Lately, in the past four years, I have given up playing violin. I am getting deaf." He still has a full head of close-cropped white hair atop his stocky frame, and cherishes a collection of rare old printed scores from Germany.

The other orchestras from Europe that have visited Boston, he said, were the Cociete des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris in 1918 and the La Scala Orchestra from Milan in 1906 and 1922.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 26 1950

Symphony's Student Tickets Available

Although most of the seats have been subscribed for five Boston Symphony rehearsals which will be opened to music students at a reasonable cost, about 600 are still available. The students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible and should telephone Norman S. Shirk, Assistant Manager at Symphony Hall.

Symphony Rehearsals Open to Students

Most of the tickets have been subscribed for the five Boston Symphony rehearsals which will be opened to music students at a minimum cost, according to a new plan of Charles Munch. The first student rehearsal will be given in Symphony Hall on the evening of November 9th at 7:30, and the remaining ones will be on Thursday, December 14, Wednesday, January 24, Thursday, March 1 and Thursday, April 26 at the same hour. These rehearsals follow out the original idea of the Friday afternoon concerts which were at first public rehearsals intended to enable students to hear the Orchestra.

Although most of the seats have been subscribed for the new series, about 600 are still to be had. The students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible and should telephone Norman S. Shirk, assistant manager, at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON TRAVELER
Oct. 26, 1950

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
OCT. 26 →

MUSIC

Charles Munch and his Boston Symphony presented another magnificent program in Hill Auditorium last night. Differing greatly from Sunday's all-Beethoven concert, the program was varied, highly interesting and well-planned—less demanding of the audience, but perhaps even more taxing for the orchestra.

Munch's Handel, like his Beethoven, may probably be termed unorthodox; it certainly is not "pure" baroque. But in its tempos, dynamic contrasts, sweeping melodic line and healthy vigor, it was completely satisfying.

The jump from Handel to Debussy is a difficult one, but the orchestra effected it successfully, and their rendition of "La Mer" was outstanding. In Munch's hands, even Debussy is straightforward. There is less blending of elements into a diffused whole than the composer might have wished, and Munch, never a colorist, relied on rhythmic emphasis, dynamic accentuation and the skillful use of inner voices; but the over-all effect was overwhelming.

The opportunity for first-hand acquaintance with the works of Roussel is a welcome one. The "Bacchus et Adriane" ballet music was interesting, beautiful and effective; it came well after Debussy and served as a climax to it. In both French works the woodwinds and brasses upheld the fine impression made Sunday night.

If Munch's Beethoven can be questioned, his Brahms can not. The fourth symphony came as a climax not only to last night's program, but to both the Boston's appearances in Ann Arbor. This work, one of the greatest tragic symphonies since Beethoven, was read with the same heroic grandeur which characterized the Eroica. Munch approached it with simplicity and naturalness, breadth, depth and intensity. His melodic conception and interpretive perception were outstanding, and his musical understanding impeccable.

Heartfelt thanks to Mr. Munch and his men for one of the finest musical experiences of this or any season.

—Louise L. Goss.

[142]

THE MICHIGAN DAILY
OCTOBER 24, 1950

MUSIC

CHARLES MUNCH conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in a program that few who sat in Hill auditorium will ever forget. His appearance here with the National French Orchestra in 1948, and the two spectacular performances with the Boston Orchestra last year had raised to high pitch an expectancy which was not disappointed.

A year ago, Munch had been working with the orchestra only a short time; his way was a new way—different, demanding and somewhat startling. The orchestra was used to Koussevitsky and loyal to him, and for everyone the adjustment must have been a difficult one. This year that adjustment is made. The Boston isn't Koussevitsky's orchestra, under Munch any longer; it is Munch's orchestra, and as such may well become the greatest in the world today.

Last night's program, devoted entirely to works of Beethoven, was not only superbly executed but ideally planned. To hear the first and third symphonies, in their chronological order on the same program, is musically rewarding and historically enlightening; it is an experience which clothes the first in fresh beauty and renews awareness of the immense progressiveness and monumental significance of the third. The inclusion of the Fidelio Overture completed the balance, introducing the program with a somewhat lighter Beethoven.

The performance itself was magnificent. Munch has achieved an ideal orchestral balance; the brass and woodwind sections played magnificently, running the always peerless strings a close second. The ensemble work was impeccable and frequently had an almost chamber-music quality; there was an unusually independent significance of single instruments and choirs which only added to the effectiveness of the total ensemble, and while Munch brings out inner voices with remarkable clarity he never destroys melodic line or sacrifices a firm foundation.

The orchestra as a whole has achieved an intensity as well as beauty of tone. Though Munch does not use an infinite variety of cloristic possibilities, his coloring is always interesting, straight-forward and in good taste. The orchestra's unique quality is achieved through an uncanny exploitation of rhythmic elements and a constantly maintained dynamic interest. The dynamic level is subtlely planned and has structural significance, and there is always perfect balance between stress and rest, crescendo and decrescendo, etc. Munch's tempos, which were a matter of some discussion last year, were less startling and more leisurely paced. His phrasing is fresh and original, full of small interest which does not destroy the broad line.

There can be no doubt, I think, that Munch's Beethoven is unorthodox, but it is fresh, vigorous, beautiful and in good taste. He makes Beethoven happy music—strong, noble and dignified, but never lugubrious. The first symphony was enchantingly conceived, in full understanding of the classic ideal in which it is set, and as a prophecy of things to come, yet there was no touch of the gloomy and not once did fate knock on the door. In the third symphony, Munch maintained the mood of noble optimism, but on a broader canvas; the work was read with fire, brilliance and breadth, but despite its massiveness never became unwieldy. For me the summation of what Munch can do with Beethoven came in the second movement of the third symphony, which was wrought with deep perception, dynamic intensity, infinite variety and over-all nobility. The entire program was an outstanding example of what happens when a great conductor meets a great orchestra in musical masterpieces.

—Louise L. Goss.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 26 1950

Boston Orchestra Triumphs In Extra Concert Series

By Carl Gehring

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard here Sunday evening in the second concert of the Choral Union Series, returned to Hill Auditorium last evening to present the second event of the Extra Concert Series. On this occasion, a program of greater variety was offered but the music cannot be said to have surpassed what was heard on Sunday. In the matter of orchestral acrobatics and instrumental color, last evening's concert was livelier and more luminous for having Debussy and Roussel on the program, yet, from the standpoint of intrinsic musical worth, despite the inclusion of Handel and Brahms works, the preceding all-Beethoven concert was superior.

Both concerts, however, were outstanding, and, offering what they did in musical fare, showed the conductor, Charles Munch, in a broad and multi-favorable light. In Beethoven he is quite supreme, as his concerts in the last two seasons here have shown. Two years ago, directing the French National Orchestra, he was superb in works by Berlioz, Debussy, Dukas and the American Walter Piston. At this time, he scored signally with Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of a Suite from Handel's "Music for the Royal Fireworks"; Debussy's "La Mer"; the Second Suite, Op. 43, from Roussel's Ballet "Bacchus et Ariane," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E Minor, Op. 98.

Handel Well Interpreted

The Suite by Handel, a composer much admired by Beethoven, was interpreted with fine feeling for what the music has to say and was gorgeously intoned. At the outset, in the slow and dignified introduction to the Overture, a spell of heroic grandeur seemed to carry over from the last notes of the Beethoven on Sunday to enchant those present last evening. In the allegro, Munch's genius for the fusion of thematic strands, the dovetailing of parts and the blending of instruments was apparent. Projected just enough, but not too much, were little staccati in the brasses. Of the other three movements, all masterfully done, the jocularity of the Bourree was especially delightful.

The Three Symphonic Sketches "La Mer," by Debussy, presented Munch and his players, now augmented to the requirements of the full modern orchestra, with a challenging canvas for the display of talents of another kind. Here the perfect cornucopia of color inherent in lush instrumentation and intriguing harmonies was revealed by a performance which reflected the greatest credit on both Munch and the orchestra. This is heady music in which motion and rhythm also are cleverly contrived, with the most subtle melodic turns. Flowing uninhibitedly as sea music should, and dynamic on occasion, "La Mer" proved quite intoxicating.

Roussel Work Played

This state of excitement carried over into Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," a composition which is effective in somewhat the same fashion as the Debussy, coloristically speaking. Highly seasoned and of no particular substance, Roussel's pagan music revealed conductor and musicians as perfect chameleons in their quick adjustments to the demands of a brilliant and sophisticated score. In the matter of solo passages, some lovely playing in the English horn merits mention. With the full orchestra, a number of stunning climaxes were achieved, one of which, in the Bacchanale, featured a couple of flourishes in the brasses.

A prodigious performance of the Finale distinguished an exceedingly able and scholarly reading of Brahms' Symphony. Here was approached if not equalled our ideal of this Finale as exemplified in Hermann Abendroth's recording of the Symphony with the London Symphony Orchestra. Perfect phrasing, tempi, dynamics and over-all plan combined to bring down the house, at the end of what is probably Brahms' finest symphony movement, and to reveal Munch as the gifted interpreter that he is. Of especial beauty was the fine passage for solo flute midway through the movement, while the trombones never resounded with more nobility than in bringing the Symphony and the evening to a climactic and triumphant close.

ANN ARBOR NEWS

MONDAY, OCT. 23, 1950

Boston Orchestra Concert Has Imprint Of Greatness

By Carl Gehring

Last evening's concert at Hill Auditorium bore the imprint of greatness from first to last. Fundamental in making the occasion one of such heroic stature was an all-Beethoven program composed of the Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72-b; the First Symphony in C Major, Op. 21, and the "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3 in E-Flat Major, Op. 55. While the concluding work, of course, is identified as "Heroic," and was all that the title implies in its realization, let there be no mistake about the "Fidelio" Overture and the First Symphony: they, too, are Beethoven, and they also were done in heroic style.

A great orchestra and an old friend, the Boston Symphony, did the honors at this second concert of the Choral Union Series, while Charles Munch re-enforced the fine impression we had had of him when he directed this group in two concerts here last season and the French National Orchestra two years ago. Munch seems to have a yen for Beethoven, as evidenced by the fact that he did the Fifth Symphony at the first concert here last year and the "Egmont" Overture and Seventh Symphony at the second. With all of these, as on this occasion, he projected noble music as only great men can do.

A Vital Experience

Those who were exposed to such a vital experience of spiritual uplift and exaltation, as was last evening's, are better fortified to meet the stresses of these trying times. The strength and fortitude inherent in the music of men like Beethoven, as distinguished from the mere heroics of lesser figures, communicate courage and are tremendously sustaining. The effect of hearing Beethoven as performed by Munch and his orchestra, in sum, was like that of reading Robert Frost in the hours that followed Pearl Harbor.

Oct. 22, incidentally, was a date of great significance in American music for it was 69 years ago that this orchestra gave its first concert in Boston. Perhaps intrigued by the fact that it was a birthday anniversary, the musicians quite outdid themselves at this time. Perfection was the rule in all the many phases of orchestral performance, with a string section which was wondrously expressive and of great elasticity and depth of tone; a wood choir of the most striking sheen and clarity, and brasses which had just the right authority without unduly arresting one's attention.

In the matter of ensemble and orchestral balance, bouquets are due the director for his synthesis of the forces under his command. The incisiveness with which the opening staccato chords of the "Fidelio" Overture were struck off was a perfect example of the instrumental integration and compelling drive which characterized the evening. This series of chords, twice sounded, constrasted well with the smooth elegance of intervening legato passages in slow tempo, while the succeeding allegro was run through with that satisfying sense of objectives adroitly achieved.

The First Symphony, Beethoven for all its identification with the style of Haydn, was a dream. As interpreted by Munch, its music said just what it had to say, no more and no less. The handling of the slow introduction to the first movement and its resolution into the Allegro Con Brio, for example, was masterful; the simplicity of the second movement was beautifully maintained; in the Menuetto, the interplay of the instruments fairly sparkled, with the incisiveness of the string figurations in the Trio recalling Sir George Grove's description of "a delicious dialogue between the wind and the stringed instruments."

Heroic Performance

The performance of the "Eroica" Symphony was completely in keeping with its title. A long and learned first movement was articulated with the utmost lucidity and was tremendously moving; the second movement had such sweep and scope as to seem to transcend its designation as Funeral March, and the incorporated fugal treatment was worked out with great skill; the Scherzo was brilliant, with the contrast between its fitful opening and closing sections and the sedate Trio well wrought; in the Finale, Munch's gifts for synthesis shone at their best.

A new arrangement of the musicians had the double basses shifted to the right of the platform for better synchronization with the celli, and this necessitated a slight movement to the left for the timpani. In the matter of performance, the basses were magnificent in the opening measures of the Funeral March from the "Eroica," as was the first oboe. Right on the beam, also, were the French horns in a tricky passage from the Trio of the Scherzo in this same Symphony. Here a high E-flat as often as not spells trouble for the first horn player, but not a crack was heard on this occasion.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 28 1950

MUSIC

Biggs Symphony Soloist in Handel Concerto; Munch Also Leads Bach

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony concert this week are given over to musi by Bach and Handel. Although nc "sweet, soothing and soporific," a Sir Thomas Beecham characterize the Royal Philharmonic's collec tion of encores last Sunday, thi is definitely a soothing program an certainly of unanimous appea From Bach, conductor Charle Munch chose the orchestral Sin fonia from the secular Cantata Nc 29; the Second and Sixth Branden burg Concertos, and the Suite Nc 3. Handel is represented by the major Organ Concerto, No. 1 ("The Cuckoo and the Nightingale" in which E. Power Biggs is soloist

This was a highly satisfying con cert from first to last. Althoug now and again there was a littl rolling of a chord because every one did not come in at the spli second, and a bit of loose rhythn the general playing was admirabl fine. The strings never sounde sweeter or lovelier, and the ver small number of them employed i the Sixth Brandenburg Concert came close to perfection. Such mas tery is all the more remarkabl when you consider that the or chestra had returned only Thurs day from the gruelling 10-day an nual Western trip and had had bu one rehearsal.

Mr. Munch's way with Bach a ready is familiar: clear leading of a the voices, and avoidance of stron accents and extreme tempos—a though in the Suite, I thought th celebrated Air and the Gigue coul have been a shade faster. This is sure and musicianly way with Bac

While all hands merit high com mendation for their share in th pleasurable concert, a special wor must be written in praise of Rog Voisin, for his superb performanc of the high, spectacular and ver difficult trumpet part in the Secon Brandenburg Concerto. Mr. Munc recognized the achievement, an brought him forward to bow wi the other members of the co certino.

Of Handel we do not have enou at the Symphony concerts, and a Organ Concerto is a rarity, indee Hence there was added enjoyme in hearing the technically adroit an scholarly Mr. Biggs in this charmin work, which employed the baroqu registers of the superb and st new Symphony Hall organ.

There will be more exciting Sym phony programs between now an the end of the season. But none wi surpass, in unassuming merit an relaxed pleasure, this excursion in Handel and Bach.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 31 1950

Koussevitzky May Revive Detroit Orchestra

DETROIT, Oct. 31—The Detroit Symphony Orchestra may soon be revived under the baton of the world-famed Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Detroit Free Press today quoted the conductor as saying: "I will do my best to revive the orchestra if the public shows active interest."

[143]

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the case of a concert program, which is more to be desired: unity or an agreeable variety? Twice at this year's Symphony Concerts Mr. Munch has decided in favor of the former. He began this, the Orchestra's 70th season, with an all-Beethoven list and the program of the current pair is four-fifths Bach and one-fifth Handel.

The Bach bicentennial year of 1950 is running out, and it may be that Mr. Munch thought that he had not played as much Bach as it was incumbent upon him to do. The orchestra got back day before yesterday from an extended Western tour, leaving little rehearsal time for yesterday afternoon's concert, another reason for choosing a program that did not require extended preparation. Besides, most of the wind and percussion players and the two harpists, could enjoy a holiday.

Or was it because E. Power Biggs was to play Handel's F major Concerto for organ and orchestra that Mr. Munch decided he would reinforce Handel's music by that of his great contemporary? The two composers differ in degree more than in kind, so the Handel number, most pleasing in the slow divisions, made for a certain contrast, but not a very marked one. The Adagio from which the Concerto gets its name was, of course, amusing to hear, and it was all very nice.

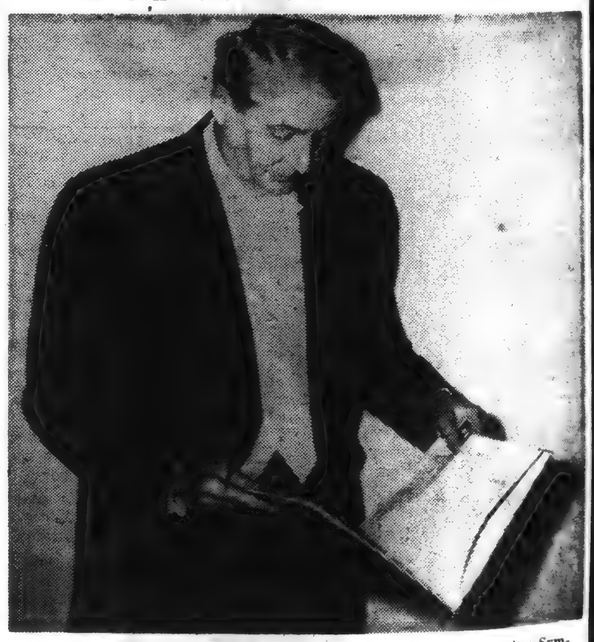
The organ was also used in the first number, the Sinfonia from Contata No. 29, virtually a transcription of the familiar Prelude to the E major Partita for violin alone. The scoring for three trumpets and two oboes (plus strings, harpsichord and tympani) and the strident registration chosen by Mr. Biggs produced a quality of sound that was interestingly archaic or downright unpleasant, according to how you looked at it.

Other numbers were the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto, which calls for only the lower strings; the Second Brandenburg, in which the Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gomberg and Voisin supplied the solos for violin, flute, oboe and trumpet, and the D major Orchestral Suite of the famous Air, that was not originally intended for the G string. High spots were the slow movements of the two Brandenburgs, in both of which the beauty of the performance matched that of the music. The Suite was given a stunning presentation and one in which the music did not lose its Bach-like quality. And the audience seemed to like everything.

Oct. 24, 1950

THE MICHIGAN DAILY

Symphony Conductor



PRE-CONCERT—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, checks through the score prior to presenting the Sunday night concert in Hill Auditorium. Munch will lead the orchestra in their second "U" concert tomorrow night.

* * * *

Munch Cites European Subsidies to Orchestras

The present subsidization of European orchestras by their governments is necessary to keep the groups active and satisfy the spiritual need to hear music, Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, declared yesterday in an interview.

"European orchestras cannot exist on their paid admissions or private endowments," he said. Hence in countries like France and Belgium there is a government officer, 'Ministre de Beaux arts' who directs subsidization."

THE INTERVIEW which required a translator because of Munch's greater ease at conversing in French was held in the Union prior to the orchestra's departure for last night's concert at Battle Creek.

"Subsidized orchestras," Munch continued, "have the opportunity to pick programs more from the musician's viewpoint than from a public one. They don't have to please the public taste completely and can more easily introduce new innovations by modern composers.

Program of Baroque Music at Symphony

HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE

...centennial year of ...out, and it may be ...thought that he had ...uch Bach as it was ...him to do. The or... day before yes... extended Western ...the rehearsal time ...fternoon's concert, ...or choosing a pro... ...t require extended ...ides, most of the ...sion players, and ..., could enjoy a

...se E. Power Biggs ...del's F major Con... and orchestra that ...ded he would re... music by that of ...mporary? The two ... in degree more ...he Handel number, ...the slow divisions, ...in contrast, but not ...ne. The Adagio from ...erto gets its name ...musing to hear, and ...ice.

...s also used in the ...he Sinfonia from ...irtually a transcrip... ...liar Prelude to the ... for violin alone, ...three trumpets and ...strings, harpsichord ...d the strident regis... ...by Mr. Biggs pro... ...of sound that was ...chaic or downright ...rding to how you

...s were the Sixth ...ncerto, which calls ...ower strings; the ...burg, in which the ... Laurent, Gomberg ...plied the solos for ... and trumpet, and ...hestral Suite of the ... was not originally ... G string. High ...lovo movements of ...nburg, in both of ...y of the perform... ...that of the music. ...given a stunning ... one in which the ... loses its Bach-like ...o audience seemed ...ng.

...uctor

...e Boston Sym... ...to presenting ...lanch will lead ...ew night.

...pean ...stras

...VIEW which re... ...ictor because of ... ease at convers... ...was held in the ...he orchestra's de... ...night's concert at

...Orchestras," ...d, "have the op... ...nick programs ...musician's view... ...n a public one. ...re to please the ...mpletely and can ...udience new inno... ...compasers.

Biggs Soloist in Works by Bach and Handel

By Harold Rogers

Sometimes there are extenuating circumstances, of which one may know little, that produce an orchestral performance that is less than the best. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, has just returned from an exacting tour of nine cities in as many days; its last concert was in Ann Arbor, Mich., on Wednesday. Yet when music is not heard at its best, as happened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, it is the listener who loses, regardless of the reasons involved.

Charles Munch devoted his program to the music of Bach and Handel. E. Power Biggs, appearing as soloist in two first performances at the week-end series, played the organ for Bach's Sinfonia from the Cantata No. 29, and for Handel's Concerto No. 13 in F major.

* * *

The new organ at Symphony Hall is much like a spirited horse. Given the slightest relaxation of the reins, it is off at a thundering gallop. Even Mr. Biggs, who is an organist of uncommon ability, often loses a stirrup while taking the jumps. There were times in the Sinfonia when the orchestral instruments were forced to accede to the onrush of volume; the shrill registration was actually unkind to the ear.

In the Handel, however, Mr. Biggs had a much better grip on the reins. There was a certain delicacy not present in his first selection. There was a more sensitive balance between orchestra and organ. The work derives its nickname, "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale," from the two amusingly literal cadenzas where these distinctive birds hold conversation. Mr. Biggs interpolated the eloquent Adagio solo from the Seventh Flute Suite. His treatment of the antiphonal Larghetto was especially graceful.

* * *

Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the Bach Brandenburg Concertos—the No. 6 in B-flat major, and the No. 2 in F major. The witty dialogue of the violas, who hold the stage of the No. 6, was ingratiatingly smooth. They gave poignant expression to the poetic Adagio.

For the No. 2 the soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, high trumpet. Mr. Voisin, in his Tanglewood appearances, has played this difficult part with greater finesse, but his performance yesterday was sufficiently impressive to win him several rounds of applause. The soloists in the Andante neatly wove their phrases into poised and balanced periods of considerable beauty.

The concluding selection was Bach's Suite No. 3 in D major, played by full orchestra. While the impulse remained steady, the tonal focus bordered on the translucent. Impromptu clouds, which attempted to cast a shadow over this concert, parted often enough to reveal shafts of redeeming light.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 15 1950

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown and Co., Boston. $6). Here is a nostalgic, pleasant and often charming account of one of America's famous concert halls—Boston's Symphony Hall. Mr. Johnson, who obviously has his heart in his task, tells of the building of the hall, the tenants it has housed, the concert life it has sponsored. In telling this story, the author also, as a by-product, gives us a thorough history of the Boston Symphony and its conductors and repertoire; tales of the artists who have appeared there; and a social history of the last fifty years. A series of appendices include a list of works performed by the Boston Symphony, its conductors and guest conductors, its soloists, a list of visiting orchestras, a selective list of concert artists who have appeared there, and specifications of the hall's organ.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
OCT 29 1950

IT'S ON RECORD — ...Y PATTERSON ... GREENE

CHARLES MUNCH—The French conductor with the German name. A native of Strasbourg, in Alsace—a city that spells its German name in a French way, in a country that has taken turns being German and French.

Munch got his first orchestral experience in Germany, but had to return to France because he refused to become a German citizen. From this background comes his equal comprehension of the German and French styles in music.

Known as a champion of French composers, he is nevertheless completely at home in the German school. First appeared in the United States as guest conductor (for Koussevitzky) of the Boston Symphony.

Last year, on Koussevitzky's retirement, he took over permanent direction of that orchestra. He has appeared in Los Angeles in 1947 and 1948 as guest conductor (for Wallenstein) of the Philharmonic.

Again in 1948 he appeared as conductor of the Orchestre National de France. After this last concert, the audience rose en masse to cheer him.

—DRAWING BY BOB CLAY

CHARLES MUNCH
"Record of Work" Conductor

[144]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 31 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS 'YES' TO DETROIT BID

Expresses His Willingness to Revive and Conduct City's Symphony Orchestra

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, Oct. 30—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said he was available to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

The maestro cabled The Detroit Free Press music critic from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best assist revival Detroit Symphony if representatives of Detroit City Society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired.

He added that he would desire "full participation and support in restoring one of America's great orchestras, without which Detroit would be missed on the artistic and cultural map of the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been on tour with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. He is due back in the United States next month.

If Detroit should rally and make it possible to bring Mr. Koussevitzky here, the city almost immediately would emerge as a leading musical center, backers of the symphony agreed.

Since the orchestra was permitted to collapse last year, many of its members have scattered to other organizations, while there has been a continued effort by some looking toward the eventual revival of the orchestra.

Among these have been the Women's Association for the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and members of the defunct board of the Detroit Orchestra, Inc.

This is the first time, however, that a major orchestral conductor has made his services available.

Mr. Koussevitzky, now 76 years old, is considered by many authorities to be in his musical prime. For the quarter century beginning in 1924, he presided over the musical development of the Boston Symphony.

But the matter of the availability of fine music cannot be judged accurately on a local basis. In many parts of the country music lovers are severely restricted in their choice of stations and, even then, these stations may air concerts at absurd hours, if at all.

In this connection many musicians of long experience in broadcasting are not averse in taking to task the members of the Music Critics Circle. They make the point that part of the plight of fine music on the air may be attributed to the indifference of these critics to radio as a medium for disseminating the classics.

These musicians contend the critics over the years have paid primary attention only to concerts which they could attend in person. A concert presented before a few hundred persons in a hall had the benefit of their stimulating praise or disciplining disapproval, it was said, but the concert which was heard by the hundreds of thousands was usually ignored.

Course

Had radio concerts received a more generous share of attention from the music critics, the musicians conclude, network executives today might be more aware of the importance of such broadcasts. This department is delighted to let the music critics take the matter from there.

The important task at this point, however, is to decide what can be done at least to curb a further decline in the volume of classical presentations on the network. Certainly one course is to let the networks know if you have enjoyed a given program or missed an old favorite, as indeed many music lovers already have done.

Ultimately, it would seem incumbent on the Federal Communications Commission to have another look at its forgotten policy apropos balance in programming.

No one can deny that television is important with its 8,000,000 sets now in use. But radio is not unimportant just yet. It still happens to have $5,200,000 receivers.

Oct 29

DEARTH OF GOOD MUSIC

Symphony Groups Vanish From Network Radio

By JACK GOULD

THE excitement over television has obscured what is a thoroughly disturbing development in radio: the steady and unremitting decline in attention which the networks are giving to classical music programs.

The dwindling interest on the part of the chains has taken many forms, most of which are only too familiar to listeners who have tried to keep up with the changes in schedules. Symphonic groups have been shifted around to less desirable times, some programs have been abandoned altogether, others have an uncertain future. In short, the music lover is becoming network radio's forgotten man.

Here are some recent examples:

(1) The New York Philharmonic-Symphony has been moved from its traditional time period of 3 P.M. Sundays to 1 P.M. Instead of originating "live" from Carnegie Hall, the concert is now tape-recorded and offered a week later.

(2) Arturo Toscanini has lost what has been practically his second home, Studio 8-H, at N. B. C. That space has been turned into a television studio. The N. B. C. Symphony concert now comes from the Manhattan Center. In addition, the time of the program has been switched from early Saturday evening to 10 P.M. Mondays.

Although Toscanini currently is absent from the podium because of a recurring knee ailment which bothered him on last season's country-wide tour, it is no secret that the maestro has not been too happy over the changes.

(3) The C. B. S. Symphony, which has been indigenous to the radio medium has been disbanded as a unit.

(4) Whether the Philadelphia Orchestra would be heard later this season was uncertain.

(5) The rehearsals of the Boston Symphony are now heard on recording at the hour of 9:30 on Monday morning, which means that they are denied to any music lover who by chance happens to go out to work for a living.

Casualties

It should be emphasized, however, that this trend is not new; it has been going on for some time. Among the casualties of late years have been the C. B. S. network's "Invitation to Music," one of the few radio programs to give new composers a hearing, and the concerts of the Budapest String Quartet from the Library of Congress in Washington.

Concurrently, the other networks, such as Mutual and A. B. C., have either cut down on their classical programs or resorted to greater use of recordings.

What is responsible for this calculated de-emphasis on fine music on the air? The main villain of the piece undoubtedly is television, which is absorbing every spare dollar upon which the networks can lay their hands.

The effect of television on radio in this case has not been just the obvious competition for the attention of a viewer. Rather it has been a more fundamental economic fact: Since television has the more promising commercial future the networks prefer to invest their resources in comedians and vaudeville that can be seen and not in public-service radio programming.

Had the broadcasters deliberately wanted to help TV kill radio, which still is paying most of television's bills, they could hardly have chosen a more short-sighted method. If there is one single type of television program which cannot hold a candle to the effectiveness of radio, it is the presentation of fine music addressed primarily to the ear.

But the cultural implications of the present trend are equally as important as the economic. The advent of television will exact a high price indeed if it means to all practical purposes that national dissemination of fine music ultimately is to disappear from American broadcasting.

The point has been made—and legitimately, too—that there has been an increase in the time which local stations are giving to fine music. That is true, however, in only a relatively few communities, particularly in New York City.

Program of Baroque Music at Symphony

HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Biggs Soloist in Works by Bach and Handel

By Harold Rogers

Sometimes there are extenuating circumstances, of which one may know little, that produce an orchestral performance that is less than the best. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, has just returned from an exacting tour of nine cities in as many days; its last concert was in Ann Arbor, Mich., on Wednesday. Yet when music is not heard at its best, as happened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, it is the listener who loses, regardless of the reasons involved.

Charles Munch devoted his program to the music of Bach and Handel. E. Power Biggs, appearing as soloist in two first performances at the week-end series, played the organ for Bach's Sinfonia from the Cantata No. 29, and for Handel's Concerto No. 13 in F major.

* * *

The new organ at Symphony Hall is much like a spirited horse. Given the slightest relaxation of the reins, it is off at a thundering gallop. Even Mr. Biggs, who is an organist of uncommon ability, often loses a stirrup while taking the jumps. There were times in the Sinfonia when the orchestral instruments were forced to accede to the onrush of volume; the shrill registration was actually unkind to the ear.

In the Handel, however, Mr. Biggs had a much better grip on the reins. There was a certain delicacy not present in his first selection. There was a more sensitive balance between orchestra and organ. The work derives its nickname, "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale," from the two amusingly literal cadenzas where these distinctive birds hold conversation. Mr. Biggs interpolated the eloquent Adagio solo from the Seventh Flute Suite. His treatment of the antiphonal Larghetto was especially graceful.

* * *

Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the Bach Brandenburg Concertos—the No. 6 in B-flat major, and the No. 2 in F major. The witty dialogue of the violas, who hold the stage of the No. 6, was ingratiatingly smooth. They gave poignant expression to the poetic Adagio.

For the No. 2 the soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, high trumpet. Mr. Voisin, in his Tanglewood appearances, has played this difficult part with greater finesse, but his performance yesterday was sufficiently impressive to win him several rounds of applause. The soloists in the Andante neatly wove their phrases into poised and balanced periods of considerable beauty.

The concluding selection was Bach's Suite No. 3 in D major, played by full orchestra. While the impulse remained steady, the tonal focus bordered on the translucent. Impromptu clouds, which attempted to cast a shadow over this concert, parted often enough to reveal shafts of redeeming light.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 15 1950

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown and Co., Boston. $6). Here is a nostalgic, pleasant and often charming account of one of America's famous concert halls—Boston's Symphony Hall. Mr. Johnson, who obviously has his heart in his task, tells of the building of the hall, the tenants it has housed, the concert life it has sponsored. In telling this story, the author also, as a by-product, gives us a thorough history of the Boston Symphony and its conductors and repertoire; tales of the artists who have appeared there; and a social history of the last fifty years. A series of appendices include a list of works performed by the Boston Symphony, its conductors and guest conductors, its soloists, a list of visiting orchestras, a selective list of concert artists who have appeared there, and specifications of the hall's organ.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
OCT 29 1950

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 31 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS 'YES' TO DETROIT BID

Expresses His Willingness to Revive and Conduct City's Symphony Orchestra

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, Oct. 30—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said he was available to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

The maestro cabled The Detroit Free Press music critic from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best assist revival Detroit Symphony if representatives of Detroit City Society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired.

He added that he would desire "full participation and support in restoring one of America's great orchestras, without which Detroit would be missed on the artistic and cultural map of the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been on tour with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. He is due back in the United States next month.

If Detroit should rally and make it possible to bring Mr. Koussevitzky here, the city almost immediately would emerge as a leading musical center, backers of the symphony agreed.

Since the orchestra was permitted to collapse last year, many of its members have scattered to other organizations, while there has been a continued effort by some looking toward the eventual revival of the orchestra.

Among these have been the Women's Association for the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and members of the [illegible] dinner has been planned for March 3 at the Statler. Queens. The wedding of Miss Julius Hellwell of Janet, to Norman L. Hellwell, son of Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] engagement of their daughter, Jane, to Norman L. Hellwell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Julius Hellwell of Jamaica Estates, Queens. The wedding has been planned for March [illegible] Middle Village, queens, of the en-

But the matter of the availability of fine music cannot be judged accurately on a local basis. In many parts of the country music lovers are severely restricted in their choice of stations and, even then, these stations may air concerts at absurd hours, if at all.

In this connection many musicians of long experience in broadcasting are not averse in taking to task the members of the Music Critics Circle. They make the point that part of the plight of fine music on the air may be attributed to the indifference of these critics to radio as a medium for disseminating the classics.

These musicians contend the critics over the years have paid primary attention only to concerts which they could attend in person. A concert presented before a few hundred persons in a hall had the benefit of their stimulating praise or disciplining disapproval, it was said, but the concert which was heard by the hundreds of thousands was usually ignored.

Course

Had radio concerts received a more generous share of attention from the music critics, the musicians conclude, network executives today might be more aware of the importance of such broadcasts. This department is delighted to let the music critics take the matter from there.

The important task at this point, however, is to decide what can be done at least to curb a further decline in the volume of classical presentations on the network. Certainly one course is to let the networks know if you have enjoyed a given program or missed an old favorite, as indeed many music lovers already have done.

Ultimately, it would seem incumbent on the Federal Communications Commission to have another look at its forgotten policy apropos balance in programming.

No one can deny that television is important with its 8,000,000 sets now in use. But radio is not unimportant just yet. It still happens to have 85,200,000 receivers.

Oct 29

DEARTH OF GOOD MUSIC

Symphony Groups Vanish From Network Radio

By JACK GOULD

THE excitement over television has obscured what is a thoroughly disturbing development in radio: the steady and unremitting decline in attention which the networks are giving to classical music programs.

The dwindling interest on the part of the chains has taken many forms, most of which are only too familiar to listeners who have tried to keep up with the changes in schedules. Symphonic groups have been shifted around to less desirable times, some programs have been abandoned altogether, others have an uncertain future. In short, the music lover is becoming network radio's forgotten man.

Here are some recent examples:

(1) The New York Philharmonic-Symphony has been moved from its traditional time period of 3 P.M. Sundays to 1 P.M. Instead of originating "live" from Carnegie Hall, the concert is now tape-recorded and offered a week later.

(2) Arturo Toscanini has lost what has been practically his second home, Studio 8-H, at N. B. C. That space has been turned into a television studio. The N. B. C. Symphony concert now comes from the Manhattan Center. In addition, the time of the program has been switched from early Saturday evening to 10 P.M. Mondays.

Although Toscanini currently is absent from the podium because of a recurring knee ailment which bothered him on last season's country-wide tour, it is no secret that the maestro has not been too happy over the changes.

(3) The C. B. S. Symphony, which has been indigenous to the radio medium has been disbanded as a unit.

(4) Whether the Philadelphia Orchestra would be heard later this season was uncertain.

(5) The rehearsals of the Boston Symphony are now heard on recording at the hour of 9:30 on Monday morning, which means that they are denied to any music lover who by chance happens to go out to work for a living.

Casualties

It should be emphasized, however, that this trend is not new; it has been going on for some time. Among the casualties of late years have been the C. B. S. network's "Invitation to Music," one of the few radio programs to give new composers a hearing, and the concerts of the Budapest String Quartet from the Library of Congress in Washington.

Concurrently, the other networks, such as Mutual and A. B. C., have either cut down on their classical programs or resorted to greater use of recordings.

What is responsible for this calculated de-emphasis on fine music on the air? The main villain of the piece undoubtedly is television, which is absorbing every spare dollar upon which the networks can lay their hands.

The effect of television on radio in this case has not been just the obvious competition for the attention of a viewer. Rather it has been a more fundamental economic fact: Since television has the more promising commercial future the networks prefer to invest their resources in comedians and vaudeville that can be seen and not in public-service radio programming.

Had the broadcasters deliberately wanted to help TV kill radio, which still is paying most of television's bills, they could hardly have chosen a more short-sighted method. If there is one single type of television program which cannot hold a candle to the effectiveness of radio, it is the presentation of fine music addressed primarily to the ear.

But the cultural implications of the present trend are equally as important as the economic. The advent of television will exact a high price indeed if it means to all practical purposes that national dissemination of fine music ultimately is to disappear from American broadcasting.

The point has been made—and legitimately, too—that there has been an increase in the time which local stations are giving to fine music. That is true, however, in only a relatively few communities, particularly in New York City.

IT'S ON RECORD

BY PATTERSON GREENE

CHARLES MUNCH—The French conductor with the German name. A native of Strasbourg, in Alsace—a city that spells its German name in a French way, in a country that has taken turns being German and French.

Munch got his first orchestral experience in Germany, but had to return to France because he refused to become a German citizen. From this background comes his equal comprehension of the German and French styles in music.

Known as a champion of French composers, he is nevertheless completely at home in the German school. First appeared in the United States as guest conductor (for Koussevitzky) of the Boston Symphony.

Last year, on Koussevitzky's retirement, he took over permanent direction of that orchestra. He has appeared in Los Angeles in 1947 and 1948 as guest conductor (for Wallenstein) of the Philharmonic.

Again in 1948 he appeared as conductor of the Orchestre National de France. After this last concert, the audience rose en masse to cheer him.

—DRAWING BY BOB CLAY

CHARLES MUNCH
"Record of Week" Conductor

[144]

Program of Baroque Music at Symphony

HERALD
OCT 28 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the third concert of the 71st season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was E. Power Biggs, organist; the assisting artist Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord. The program

Sinfonia to Cantata No. 29; Brandenburg Concertos Nos 2 and 6; Suite No. ... in D ... Bach
Concerto No. 13 for organ and orchestra "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale" ... Handel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was a genial homecoming for the orchestra yesterday afternoon. The music—all Bach and Handel—was genial, too: easy to listen to, to assimilate and love. There was, it is true, an atmosphere of orchestral weariness in mind and body, but most of the playing was beautiful.

There is something rather frightening, come to think of it, about these long tours of the orchestra. What it has to do for money is really appalling. Consider this: in ten days orchestra and conductor gave nine concerts in nine different cities, returning late Thursday night and rehearsing yesterday morning before the concert.

Thus that the Sinfonia from Bach's Cantata No. 29 for organ and orchestra (a nearly literal transcription of the famed Prelude to the E major Partita for unaccompanied violin), was a little out of joint in the matter of togetherness is readily to be forgiven. Thereafter things went much better anyway though there were minor slips in everything but the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto.

This Concerto, which seems to be to contain some of Bach's most exalted music (that slow movement is clearly one of his greatest moment), is especially rewarding for bringing to our attention the marvels of the violas and players of the orchestra. These overlooked instruments and instrumentalists, whose role is hardly ever noticed by anybody, are nowhere (save in the Brahms' Serenade) more wonderfully exploited than in this work for the low strings in which their massed tone is absolutely golden. The power of their expression—like that of an athlete playing with a child—is clothed in tenderness, but their underlying strength is there for all to know. This might be said for the members of the viola section as well. Taking the places on the stage of the first violins, they performed with extraordinary unanimity and virtuosity, as indeed they do unnoticed throughout the season.

E. Power Biggs, perhaps the ranking organ virtuoso of the day, contributed a notable chapter in the Handel Organ Concerto. This graceful work, with its amusing tonal portrait of cuckoos and nightingales, is entirely without pretense yet elegant, intimate without familiarity. It is also an everlasting model of music for no reason at all but to pleasantly occupy the ear, and Mr. Biggs and the orchestra did it splendidly.

Once again making allowance for the generally relaxed performance level of yesterday's concert (for it will certainly not be in evidence tonight), the Second Brandenburg Concerto and the D major Suite (the one with the Air now known as the Air for the G string) were attractively set forth. Immense credit is due Roger Voison for his well-nigh superhuman traversal of the part for the high trumpet, and the solo roles of Richard Burgin, violin, Georges Laurent, flute, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe, were matchlessly done. It might be added that Mr. Munch again demonstrated his particular ear for the music of Bach, but he took occasion of the character of the music to conduct with more reserve than usual. Unfortunately, the audience seems to interpret a lack of fireworks to mean the music and the performance deserve less than the usual applause. The conductor, soloists and orchestra were hardly given credit for their efforts. Mr. Munch will doubtless come to learn, as Koussevitzky did, that if you don't finish up with Tchaikovsky's Fifth, you might as well not bother to come back for a second show at all. The program next week offers Berlioz Fantastic Symphony, Diamond's Third Symphony, and Roussel's "Bacchus at Ariane."

Biggs Soloist in Works by Bach and Handel

By Harold Rogers

Sometimes there are extenuating circumstances, of which one may know little, that produce an orchestral performance that is less than the best. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, has just returned from an exacting tour of nine cities in as many days; its last concert was in Ann Arbor, Mich., on Wednesday. Yet when music is not heard at its best, as happened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, it is the listener who loses, regardless of the reasons involved.

Charles Munch devoted his program to the music of Bach and Handel. E. Power Biggs, appearing as soloist in two first performances at the week-end series, played the organ for Bach's Sinfonia from the Cantata No. 29, and for Handel's Concerto No. 13 in F major.

The new organ at Symphony Hall is much like a spirited horse. Given the slightest relaxation of the reins, it is off at a thundering gallop. Even Mr. Biggs, who is an organist of uncommon ability, often loses a stirrup while taking the jumps. There were times in the Sinfonia when the orchestral instruments were forced to accede to the onrush of volume; the shrill registration was actually unkind to the ear.

In the Handel, however, Mr. Biggs had a much better grip on the reins. There was a certain delicacy not present in his first selection. There was a more sensitive balance between orchestra and organ. The work derives its nickname, "The Cuckoo and the Nightingale," from the two amusingly literal cadenzas where these distinctive birds hold conversation. Mr. Biggs interpolated the eloquent Adagio solo from the Seventh Flute Suite. His treatment of the antiphonal Larghetto was especially graceful.

Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the Bach Brandenburg Concertos—the No. 6 in B-flat major, and the No. 2 in F major. The witty dialogue of the violas, who hold the stage of the No. 6, was ingratiatingly smooth. They gave poignant expression to the poetic Adagio.

For the No. 2 the soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, high trumpet. Mr. Voisin, in his Tanglewood appearances, has played this difficult part with greater finesse, but his performance yesterday was sufficiently impressive to win him several rounds of applause. The soloists in the Andante neatly wove their phrases into poised and balanced periods of considerable beauty.

The concluding selection was Bach's Suite No. 3 in D major, played by full orchestra. While the impulse remained steady, the tonal focus bordered on the translucent. Impromptu clouds, which attempted to cast a shadow over this concert, parted often enough to reveal shafts of redeeming light.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 15 1950

Symphony Hall, Boston, by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown and Co., Boston. $6). Here is a nostalgic, pleasant and often charming account of one of America's famous concert halls—Boston's Symphony Hall. Mr. Johnson, who obviously has his heart in his task, tells of the building of the hall, the tenants it has housed, the concert life it has sponsored. In telling this story, the author also, as a by-product, gives us a thorough history of the Boston Symphony and its conductors and repertoire; tales of the artists who have appeared there; and a social history of the last fifty years. A series of appendices include a list of works performed by the Boston Symphony, its conductors and guest conductors, its soloists, a list of visiting orchestras, a selective list of concert artists who have appeared there, and specifications of the hall's organ.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 31 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS 'YES' TO DETROIT BID

Expresses His Willingness to Revive and Conduct City's Symphony Orchestra

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, Oct. 30—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said he was available to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

The maestro cabled The Detroit Free Press music critic from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best assist revival Detroit Symphony if representatives of Detroit City Society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired.

He added that he would desire "full participation and support in restoring one of America's great orchestras, without which Detroit would be missed on the artistic and cultural map of the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been on tour with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. He is due back in the United States next month.

If Detroit should rally and make it possible to bring Mr. Koussevitzky here, the city almost immediately would emerge as a leading musical center, backers of the symphony agreed.

Since the orchestra was permitted to collapse last year, many of its members have scattered to other organizations, while there has been a continued effort by some looking toward the eventual revival of the orchestra.

Among these have been the Women's Association for the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and [illegible] dine has been planned for March [illegible] Bataves, Queens, The wedding of their daughter, Janet, to Norman I. Helliwell, son of Mr. and Mrs. Julius Helliwell of Jamaica Estates, Queens, The wed-

But the matter of the availability of fine music cannot be judged accurately on a local basis. In many parts of the country music lovers are severely restricted in their choice of stations and, even then, these stations may air concerts at absurd hours, if at all.

In this connection many musicians of long experience in broadcasting are not averse in taking to task the members of the Music Critics Circle. They make the point that part of the plight of fine music on the air may be attributed to the indifference of these critics to radio as a medium for disseminating the classics.

These musicians contend the critics over the years have paid primary attention only to concerts which they could attend in person. A concert presented before a few hundred persons in a hall had the benefit of their stimulating praise or disciplining disapproval, it was said, but the concert which was heard by the hundreds of thousands was usually ignored.

Course

Had radio concerts received a more generous share of attention from the music critics, the musicians conclude, network executives today might be more aware of the importance of such broadcasts. This department is delighted to let the music critics take the matter from there.

The important task at this point, however, is to decide what can be done at least to curb a further decline in the volume of classical presentations on the network. Certainly one course is to let the networks know if you have enjoyed a given program or missed an old favorite, as indeed many music lovers already have done.

Ultimately, it would seem incumbent on the Federal Communications Commission to have another look at its forgotten policy apropos balance in programming.

No one can deny that television is important with its 8,000,000 sets now in use. But radio is not unimportant just yet. It still happens to have 85,250,000 receivers.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
OCT 29 1950

IT'S ON RECORD

BY PATTERSON GREENE

CHARLES MUNCH—The French conductor with the German name. A native of Strasbourg, in Alsace—a city that spells its German name in a French way, in a country that has taken turns being German and French.

Munch got his first orchestral experience in Germany, but had to return to France because he refused to become a German citizen. From this background comes his equal comprehension of the German and French styles in music.

Known as a champion of French composers, he is nevertheless completely at home in the German school. First appeared in the United States as guest conductor (for Koussevitzky) of the Boston Symphony.

Last year, on Koussevitzky's retirement, he took over permanent direction of that orchestra. He has appeared in Los Angeles in 1947 and 1948 as guest conductor (for Wallenstein) of the Philharmonic.

Again in 1948 he appeared as conductor of the Orchestre National de France. After this last concert, the audience rose en masse to cheer him.

CHARLES MUNCH
"Record of Week" Conductor

DEARTH OF GOOD MUSIC

Symphony Groups Vanish From Network Radio

By JACK GOULD

THE excitement over television has obscured what is a thoroughly disturbing development in radio: the steady and unremitting decline in attention which the networks are giving to classical music programs.

The dwindling interest on the part of the chains has taken many forms, most of which are only too familiar to listeners who have tried to keep up with the changes in schedules. Symphonic groups have been shifted around to less desirable times, some programs have been abandoned altogether, others have an uncertain future. In short, the music lover is becoming network radio's forgotten man.

Here are some recent examples:

(1) The New York Philharmonic-Symphony has been moved from its traditional time period of 3 P.M. Sundays to 1 P.M. Instead of originating "live" from Carnegie Hall, the concert is now tape-recorded and offered a week later.

(2) Arturo Toscanini has lost what has been practically his second home, Studio 8-H, at N. B. C. That space has been turned into a television studio. The N. B. C. Symphony concert now comes from the Manhattan Center. In addition, the time of the program has been switched from early Saturday evening to 10 P.M. Mondays.

Although Toscanini currently is absent from the podium because of a recurring knee ailment which bothered him on last season's country-wide tour, it is no secret that the maestro has not been too happy over the changes.

(3) The C. B. S. Symphony, which has been indigenous to the radio medium has been disbanded as a unit.

(4) Whether the Philadelphia Orchestra would be heard later this season was uncertain.

(5) The rehearsals of the Boston Symphony are now heard on recording at the hour of 9:30 on Monday morning, which means that they are denied to any music lover who by chance happens to go out to work for a living.

Cancellations

It should be emphasized, however, that this trend is not new; it has been going on for some time. Among the casualties of late years have been the C. B. S. network's "Invitation to Music," one of the few radio programs to give new composers a hearing, and the concerts of the Budapest String Quartet from the Library of Congress in Washington.

Concurrently, the other networks, such as Mutual and A. B. C., have either cut down on their classical programs or resorted to greater use of recordings.

What is responsible for this calculated de-emphasis on fine music on the air? The main villain of the piece undoubtedly is television, which is absorbing every spare dollar upon which the networks can lay their hands.

The effect of television on radio in this case has not been just the obvious competition for the attention of a viewer. Rather it has been a more fundamental economic fact: Since television has the more promising commercial future the networks prefer to invest their resources in comedians and vaudeville that can be seen and not in public-service radio programming.

Had the broadcasters deliberately wanted to help TV kill radio, which still is paying most of television's bills, they could hardly have chosen a more short-sighted method. If there is one single type of television program which cannot hold a candle to the effectiveness of radio, it is the presentation of fine music addressed primarily to the ear.

But the cultural implications of the present trend are equally as important as the economic. The advent of television will exact a high price indeed if it means to all practical purposes that national discussion of fine music ultimately is to disappear from American broadcasting.

The point has been made—and legitimately, too—that there has been an increase in the time which local stations are giving to fine music. That is true, however, in only a relatively few communities, particularly in New York City.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 31 1950

Koussevitzky May Reorganize and Direct Detroit Orchestra

Detroit, Oct. 30 [Special]—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today said he was available to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony orchestra. He cabled J. Dorsey Callaghan, Free Press music critic, from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best assist revival Detroit symphony. If representatives of Detroit civic society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired. He added that he would desire "full participation and support in restoring one of America's great orchestras, without which Detroit would be missed on the artistic and cultural map of the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been on tour conducting the Israel Philharmonic orchestra. He is due back in the United States next month.

If Detroit should make it possible to bring Koussevitzky here, the city could emerge as a leading musical center, backers of the symphony agreed. Its orchestra disbanded last year and many of its members have gone to other organizations.

NBC Symph Shuttling Seen Likely To Cue Major Blowoff When Toscy Returns

Around NBC it's the feeling that the network hasn't heard the last of the "Arturo Toscanini Story." Although the maestro of the NBC Symphony Orchestra is now scheduled to originate his broadcasts from the Manhattan Center on West 34th street, N. Y., in the Monday night 10 to 11 period (of which Toscy knows nothing as yet), some anticipate there will be a major blowoff when the renowned leader returns from Italy a couple weeks hence.

Some of those at NBC who are close to the symph operation regard the moving of the orchestra into the late Monday time, when Toscanini will follow "Voice of Firestone," "Telephone Hour" and "Cities Service Band," and the constant shuttling around for an origination point, as the opening wedge toward a gradual dissolution of the orch. In recent years it has cost NBC $500,000 a year to sustain the orch, including $96,000 for Toscanini's salary. The inclusion of the Monday night symph hour as part of the projected sponsor-participating "Operation Tandem," is seen as a last desperate move to get off the sustaining hook with the costly symph.

The 84-year-old maestro didn't like the idea of being evicted from Studio 8-H in Radio City, which has been converted for television purposes, and reportedly squawked over the initial plan to house the orch in Carnegie Hall, N. Y., which meant stair climbing. The switchover from Saturday 6:30 to Monday at 10 ruled out Carnegie Hall, however, and NBC then planned to install the symph in the Center theatre. However, it was decided to originate a TV show from the Center at that hour and the web, in scouting about, came up with the Manhattan Center (which is also used by RCA Victor for recording purposes).

Beyond the Carnegie Hall stage of thinking, Toscanini reportedly knows nothing of the plans. If, as some believe, he'll refuse to go along with the switches, it may pose a problem on his RCA Victor association.

Since the RCA-sponsored Toscy tour of 33 cities last spring, the maestro's recordings have been one of Victor's prize possessions, with the tour adding up to one of the most fruitful promotion ventures in RCA annals. It's a question now whether a Toscy-NBC breach would also affect his RCA Victor relationship.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
OCT 15 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony to Arrive By Special Train Oct. 18; Concert in Coliseum

By E. V. W.

This date in music: 1906, American premiere of Puccini's opera, "Madam Butterfly," in Washington, D. C.

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Syracuse Wednesday afternoon on its own special train and company of approximately 120 for a concert that night in the State Fair Coliseum Charles Munch, conducting. The concert is included in the Famous Artists Series, as is another symphonic concert—that of the Royal Philharmonic of London, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting in the Coliseum Dec. 9.

* * *

'Surging Vigor' In Beethoven's 'Fidelio'

A BOSTON REVIEWER, writing of the opening concert there had this to say, in part, of the Beethoven "Fidelio" Overture, to be included in the Syracuse program: "What he (Munch) does is quite remarkable: he infuses Beethoven with a surging vigor on one hand while giving a clarity and lucidity of texture on the other that proves to be a truly astonishing lesson in orchestral form. You keep thinking, when suddenly you hear a bassoon or an oboe proclaiming in inner voice of greatest beauty, 'For goodness sake I never happened to hear that before!'"

* * *

Ralph Gomberg Included in New Players

AMONG NEW FACES in the Boston Symphony is Ralph Gomberg, solo oboeist, who played in Mizpah a fortnight ago in the Bach "Musical Offering" with the Krasner Chamber Music Ensemble. Also Gino Cioffi, clarinet, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. Roger Voisin, solo, trumpet, replaces the late Georges Mager. Concertmaster is Richard Burgin. Principal viola is Joseph de Pasquale. Among hundreds to come from out of town for the concert is Miss Laura Bryant of Ithaca, nationally known public school music authority. She will dine that night with Dr. and Mrs. Jacob Kwalwasser, long-time friends.

* * *

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead the orchestra in these numbers Wednesday night in the State Fair Coliseum: "Fidelio" Overture by Beethoven; "La Mer," Debussy; "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 by Roussel and the Fourth Symphony by Brahms.

DETROIT MICH.
NEWS
OCT 15 1950

Boston Orchestra to Open Series . . .

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

SINCE DETROIT is sadly bereft of its own orchestra, and since the town's appetite for symphonic music has never declined a particle, it is a fortunate thing that an enterprising management brings us notable orchestras from afar, to afford a pretty lively season of that beloved kind of music, at the Masonic Auditorium.

And first of those visitors is probably first in other respects, too. Which is to say that the Boston Symphony will open the series of visiting orchestras next Saturday evening. The conductor will be permanent occupant of that post; Charles Munch, the distinguished Frenchman who succeeded Koussevitzky as captain of the Bostonians, two years ago.

Everybody knows all about the quality of this notable organization and is familiar with the standing of Mr. Munch. But, judging from the jangling telephone in a music-editor's office over the past three weeks there is much curiosity about what the Bostonians will play.

So—Saturday night's program will include the following works: Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture; Debussy's three-movement suite called "La Mer," which is to say, "The Sea"; the second suite from Rousell's Ballet, "Bacchus and Ariadne"; and, after the intermission, the well-loved D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Boston Leader

Charles Munch, the noted Frenchman who now captains the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring his musicians to the Masonic Auditorium next Saturday evening.

[145]

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
OCT 2 - 1950

MUSIC

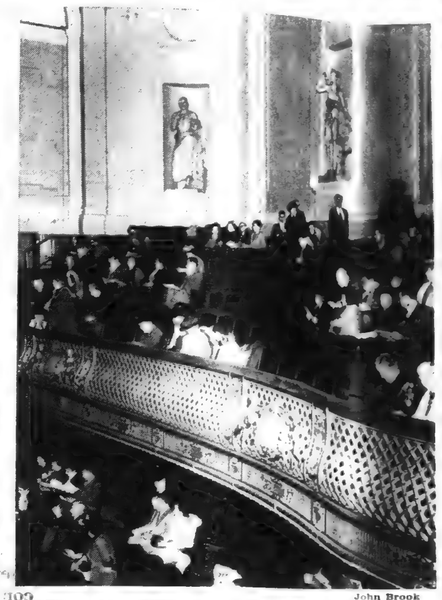
Symphony Hall, 1900–

When Boston's Symphony Hall was opened just half a century ago, the ladies in the audience were startled to read an announcement in the program prohibiting "any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance." A delegation thereupon visited the management for further clarification, and the result was typical of the spirit of Symphony Hall. "The gracious women with musical taste," replied the management, "can be depended upon to wear hats, if they wear any, against which the meanest man on earth could find no indictment."

As it turned out, however, "the gracious women with musical taste" could not be depended upon. The "Merry Widow" vogue was in full flower as the 1908-09 season began. The men, having had all they could take of wide brims and dashing plumes, appealed to the mayor, who threatened to revoke the hall's license if the hats were not abandoned. On Nov. 19, deadline day, Symphony Hall was awave with defiant millinery. Ushers were frantically nervous as time for the final bell before the concert approached. But when it rang, the spirit of the ladies broke, and all the hats came off—all, that is, except one, and its owner marched to the box office and got her money back. Ever since that time, the tradition goes, the women of Boston have taken their hats to Symphony Hall—and worn them in their laps.

Anecdotes such as this one make H. Earle Johnson's new book, "Symphony Hall, Boston,"* most delightful reading. Johnson, assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester, Mass., was born in Connecticut, but vows that he is a "Bostonian by conviction." His writing shows it, for he has succeeded in portraying the city and the hall and the Boston Symphony with pride, respect, warm affection, and gentle humor.

Agewise, Symphony Hall is one of the nation's youngest important concert houses. It was opened in 1900, whereas the Philadelphia Academy of Music was completed in 1857 and Carnegie Hall in New York was finished in 1891. Symphony Hall cost $750,000; and into it went careful planning—proof of which is the fact that no major structural [illegible] been performed since its opening, and yet it is a thoroughly up-to-date plant, complete with a remarkable modern ventilating system. Nor did the hall's vaunted acoustics result from accident. Professor Wallace C. Sabine, the assistant professor of physics at Harvard University who closely with the [illegible] architects—McKim, Mead, & White of New York—achieved the finest acoustical properties [illegible] music. As a general model, the Leipzig Gewandhaus was chosen, but with an increased seating capacity. Oddly enough, the statues which occupy commanding positions above the second balcony around three sides of the hall (see cut) are there "for reasons as much acoustical as decorative." "The niches," says the author, "are important adjuncts to the acoustical scheme, the idea of placing statues in them a happy afterthought."



John Brook

Symphony Hall: Acoustical and decorative

*431 pages. [illegible]

78

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 8- 1950

Ex-Regist[illegible] The Story

YMPHONY HALL, B[illegible]
$6)

In this book about [illegible]me of the Boston Sy[illegible]wn in vivid and witt[illegible]former music editor [illegible]mplished a labor of [illegible]nviction." Now as [illegible]rsity, he is also the [illegible]795-1830)."

This reviewer, a nat[illegible]ian who may be sai[illegible]med his musical ear[illegible]at auditorium som[illegible], naturally found M[illegible]'s new book of unu[illegible]est. The author's ac[illegible] rush seats (2d bal[illegible] Friday afternoon co[illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible]sonal note with the [illegible]alling many cherish[illegible]ots of past listening [illegible]ow completing a h[illegible]y of activities, musi[illegible]erwise. Symphony [illegible]t a local musical shr[illegible]'eased in spiritual st[illegible] point where its prin[illegible]ies are of national a[illegible]ld-wide interest. T[illegible]e about through th[illegible]e of the Boston Sy[illegible]iestra, principally [illegible]reign of Serge Kouss[illegible] world famous mus[illegible]zation. Incidentally, [illegible]nigh perfect ac[illegible]rties, the buildin[illegible]d to be an ideal [illegible]oston's great orches[illegible]hphony Hall is a [illegible]ment to Henry Lee [illegible]civic minded and c[illegible]r of one of Boston[illegible]s, who founded t[illegible] in 1881 and was [illegible] on its governing[illegible] death in 1919. [illegible]gginson's foresig[illegible]zeal, as Mr. Johnson [illegible]"Symphony Hall was th[illegible]concert hall in the world[illegible]built in known conformit[illegible]acoustical law." Exhaust[illegible]search work was carried [illegible]musical and scientific au[illegible]ties both here and abroad[illegible]consulted before the choic[illegible]made to construct the bu[illegible]along the lines of the cele[illegible]Leipzig Gewandhaus.

Aside from the concerts [illegible]Boston Symphony and occa[illegible]l visiting orchestras, the [illegible]musical activities of Boston[illegible]centered in Symphony Hal[illegible]the years. It has played h[illegible]most of the world's great a[illegible]during its 50 years of exis[illegible]The author has conside[illegible]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 31 1950

Koussevitzky May Reorganize and Direct Detroit Orchestra

Detroit, Oct. 30 [Special]—Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today said he was available to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony orchestra. He cabled J. Dorsey Callaghan, Detroit Press music critic, from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best to assist revival Detroit symphony. Representatives of Detroit music society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired. He added that he would desire "full participation and support in restoring one of America's great orchestras, without which Detroit would be missed on the artistic and cultural map of the world."

Mr. Koussevitzky has been on tour conducting the Israel Philharmonic orchestra. He is due back in the United States next month.

If Detroit could make it possible to bring Koussevitzky here, the city could emerge as a leading musical center. Backers of the symphony agreed. Its orchestra disbanded last year and many of its members have gone to other organizations.

effort looking toward eventual revival of the orchestra. Among those interested have been the Women's Association for the Detroit Symphony orchestra and members of the defunct board of the Detroit Orchestra, Inc. This is the first time that a major orchestral conductor has made his services available, however.

Mr. Koussevitzky, now 76, is considered by many authorities to be in his musical prime. Of Russian birth, he gained recognition in his youth as a double bass virtuoso. For the 25 years beginning in 1924, he conducted the Boston orchestra.

NBC Symph Shifting Seen Likely To Cue Major Blowoff When Toscy Returns

Around NBC it's the feeling that the network hasn't heard the last of the "Arturo Toscanini Story." Although the maestro of the NBC Symphony Orchestra is now scheduled to originate his broadcasts from the Manhattan Center on West 34th street, N. Y., in the Monday night 10 to 11 period (of which Toscy knows nothing as yet), some anticipate there will be a major blowoff when the renowned leader returns from Italy a couple weeks hence.

Some of those at NBC who are close to the symph operation regard the moving of the orchestra into the late Monday time, when Toscanini will follow "Voice of Firestone," "Telephone Hour" and "Cities Service Band," and the constant shuttling around for an origination point, as the opening wedge toward a gradual dissolution of the orch. In recent years it has cost NBC $500,000 a year to sustain the orch, including $96,000 for Toscanini's salary. The inclusion of the Monday night symph hour as part of the projected sponsor-participating "Operation Tandem," is seen as a last desperate move to get off the sustaining hook with the costly symph.

The 84-year-old maestro didn't like the idea of being evicted from Studio 8-H in Radio City, which has been converted for television purposes, and reportedly squawked over the initial plan to house the orch in Carnegie Hall, N. Y., which meant stair climbing. The switch-over from Saturday 6:30 to Monday at 10 ruled out Carnegie Hall, however, and NBC then planned to install the symph in the Center theatre. However, it was decided to originate a TV show from the Center at that hour and the web, in scouting about, came up with the Manhattan Center (which is also used by RCA Victor for recording purposes).

Beyond the Carnegie Hall stage of thinking, Toscanini reportedly knows nothing of the plans. If, as some believe, he'll refuse to go along with the switches, it may pose a problem on his RCA Victor association.

Since the RCA-sponsored Toscy tour of 33 cities last spring, the maestro's recordings have been one of Victor's prize possessions, with the tour adding up to one of the most fruitful promotion ventures in RCA annals. It's a question now whether a Toscy-NBC breach would also affect his RCA Victor relationship.

BOSTON, MASS.
NEWS WEEK
OCT 2 - 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Hall, 1900–

When Boston's Symphony Hall was opened just half a century ago, the ladies in the audience were startled to read an announcement in the program prohibiting "any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance." A delegation thereupon visited the management for further clarification, and the result was typical of the spirit of Symphony Hall. "The gracious women with musical taste," replied the management, "can be depended upon to wear hats, if they wear any, against which the meanest man on earth could find no indictment."

As it turned out, however, "the gracious women with musical taste" could not be depended upon. The "Merry Widow" vogue was in full flower as the 1908-09 season began. The men, having had all they could take of wide brims and dashing plumes, appealed to the mayor, who threatened to revoke the hall's license if the hats were not abandoned. On Nov. 19, deadline day, Symphony Hall was awave with defiant millinery. Ushers wore frantically nervous as time for the first bell before the concert approached. But when it rang, the spirit of the ladies broke, and all the hats came off—all, that is, except one, and its owner marched to the box office and got her money back. Ever since that time, the tradition goes, women of Boston have taken their hats to Symphony Hall—and worn them.

Anecdotes [illegible] make H. Earle Johnson's almost book-length "Symphony Hall, Boston" most delightful reading. Johnson, assistant professor of music at Clark University in Worcester, Mass., was born in Connecticut, but vows that he is a Bostonian by conviction." His writing shows it; he has succeeded in portraying the city and the hall and the Boston Symphony with pride, respect, warm affection and gentle humor.

Agewise, Symphony Hall is one of the nation's youngest important concert houses. It was opened in 1900, whereas the Philadelphia Academy of Music was [illegible] Carnegie Hall in [illegible] in 1891. Symphony [illegible] 1900, and into it went [illegible] planning—[illegible] that no major structure [illegible] been performed since its opening, and yet it is a thoroughly up-to-date plant, complete with remarkably modern ventilating system.

Nor did the hall's vaunted acoustics result from accident. Prof. Wallace C. Sabine, then assistant professor of physics at Harvard University, worked closely with the hall's architects—McKim, Mead, & White of New York—to achieve the finest acoustical properties for music. As a general model, the Leipzig Gewandhaus was chosen, but with an increased seating capacity. Oddly enough, the statues which occupy commanding positions above the second balcony around three sides of the hall (see cut) are there "for reasons as much acoustical as decorative." "The niches," says the author, "are important adjuncts to the acoustical scheme, the idea of placing statues in them a happy afterthought."

John Brook

Symphony Hall: Acoustical and decorative

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
OCT 15 1950

Boston Symphony to Arrive By Special Train Oct. 18; Concert in Coliseum

By E. V. W.

This date in music: 1906, American premiere of Puccini's opera, "Madam Butterfly," in Washington, D. C.

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Syracuse Wednesday afternoon on its own special train and company of approximately 120 for a concert that night in the State Fair Coliseum, Charles Munch, conducting. The concert is included in the Famous Artists Series, as is another symphonic concert—that of the Royal Philharmonic of London, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting in the Coliseum Dec. 9.

• • •

'Surging Vigor' In Beethoven's 'Fidelio'

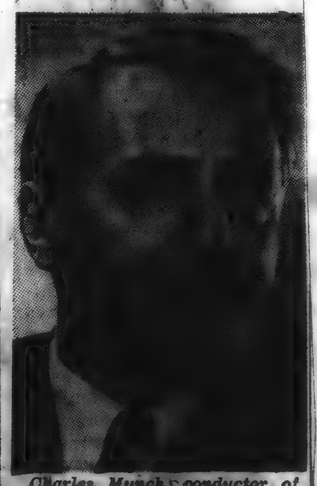
A BOSTON REVIEWER, writing of the opening concert there had this to say, in part, of the Beethoven "Fidelio" Overture, to be included in the Syracuse program: "What he (Munch) does is quite remarkable: he infuses Beethoven with a surging vigor on one hand while giving a clarity and lucidity of texture on the other that proves to be a truly astonishing lesson in orchestral form. You keep thinking, when suddenly you hear a bassoon or an oboe proclaiming an inner voice of greatest beauty, 'For goodness sake I never happened to hear that before!'"

• • •

Ralph Gomberg Included in New Players

AMONG NEW FACES in the Boston Symphony is Ralph Gomberg, solo oboeist, who played in Mizpah a fortnight ago in the Bach "Musical Offering" with the Krasner Chamber Music Ensemble. Also Gino Cioffi, clarinet, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra; Roger Voisin, solo trumpet, replaces the late Georges Mager. Concertmaster is Richard Burgin. Principal viola is Joseph de Pasquale. Among hundreds to come from out of town for the concert is Miss Laura Bryant of Ithaca, nationally known public school music authority. She will dine that night with Dr. and Mrs. Jacob Kwalwasser, long-time friends.

• • •



Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead the orchestra in these numbers Wednesday night in the State Fair Coliseum: "Fidelio" Overture by Beethoven; "La Mer," Debussy; "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 by Roussel and the Fourth Symphony by Brahms.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 15 1950

Boston Orchestra to Open Series . . .

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN

SINCE DETROIT is sadly bereft of its own orchestra, and since the town's appetite for symphonic music has never declined a particle, it is a fortunate thing that an enterprising management brings us notable orchestras from afar, to afford a pretty lively season of that beloved kind of music, at the Masonic Auditorium.

And first of those visitors is probably first in other respects, too. Which is to say that the Boston Symphony will open the series of visiting orchestras next Saturday evening. The conductor will be permanent occupant of that post; Charles Munch, the distinguished Frenchman who succeeded Koussevitzky as captain of the Bostonians, two years ago.

Everybody knows all about the quality of this notable organization and is familiar with the standing of Mr. Munch. But, judging from the jangling telephone in a music editor's office over the past three weeks there is much curiosity about what the Bostonians will play.

So—Saturday night's program will include the following works: Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture; Debussy's three-movement suite called "La Mer," which is to say, "The Sea"; the second suite from Rousell's Ballet, "Bacchus and Ariadne"; and, after the intermission, the well-loved D Minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Boston Leader

Charles Munch, the noted Frenchman who now captains the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring the musicians to the Masonic Auditorium next

[145]

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 8 1950

Ex-Register Critic Narrates The Story Of Symphony Hall

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown; $6)

In this book about one of the world's great concert halls, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, H. Earle Johnson has set down in vivid and witty fashion the story of an era. Mr. Johnson, a former music editor of The Register for some 10 years, has accomplished a labor of love for he is in his words a "Bostonian by conviction." Now an assistant professor of music at Clark University, he is also the author of "Musical Interludes in Boston (1795-1830)."

H. EARLE JOHNSON

This reviewer, a native Bostonian who may be said to have opened his musical ears in this great auditorium some years ago, naturally found Mr. Johnson's new book of unusual interest. The author's account of the rush seats (2d balcony) at the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony struck a personal note with the writer, recalling many cherished moments of past listening pleasure.

Now completing a half century of activities, musical and otherwise, Symphony Hall, at first a local musical shrine, has increased in spiritual stature to the point where its primary activities are of national and even world-wide interest. This has come about through the emergence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, principally during the reign of Serge Koussevitzky, as a world famous musical organization. Incidentally, with its well nigh perfect acoustical properties, the building has proved to be an ideal "home" for Boston's great orchestra.

Symphony Hall is a living monument to Henry Lee Higginson, a civic minded and cultured member of one of Boston's great families, who founded the orchestra in 1881 and was actively engaged on its governing board until his death in 1919. Due to Major Higginson's foresight and zeal, as Mr. Johnson relates, "Symphony Hall was the first concert hall in the world to be built in known conformity with acoustical law." Exhaustive research work was carried on and musical and scientific authorities both here and abroad were consulted before the choice was made to construct the building along the lines of the celebrated Leipzig Gewandhaus.

Aside from the concerts of the Boston Symphony and occasional visiting orchestras, the major musical activities of Boston have centered in Symphony Hall over the years. It has played host to most of the world's great artists during its 50 years of existence. The author has considerably heightened the interest in the numerous events listed by incorporating excerpts from the critical appraisals by the Boston critics. This was a master stroke!

There are few Bostonians above cradle age who have not set foot in Symphony Hall at some time or other. This is not to say that they are the world's outstanding group of music lovers for great numbers of them have been in attendance for anything but musical interests. In a section of the book entitled "Of Many Things," Mr. Johnson describes a bewildering variety of events that find sanctuary in the Hall, including almost every type excepting possibly wrestling and dog shows. For all this, Symphony Hall has lost none of its time encrusted dignity as all of the varied happenings there have been conducted with traditional Bostonian decorum and propriety.

Symphony Hall is a great American institution which has occupied a prominent part in our musical history since the beginning of the century. Bostonians may properly be proud of it and all of us may share in some measure the world-wide prestige which it now enjoys in matters cultural.

Mr. Johnson's selection to write this book was a happy one for he combines all the necessary attributes—love of subject matter, distinguished prose style, imagination, and wit—to make this book a distinctive and valuable contribution in its field. To close these remarks which, of necessity, are too short to do the book justice, here is the author in one of "Symphony Hall's" more delightful moments: "Here, also pianists have played and lost their places; singers have sung and lost their voices; dancers have pirouetted and lost their tunics; conductors have lost their tempers. But the show goes on."

Appendices which give a complete list of works played by the Boston Symphony since its inception, soloists with the orchestra, concert artists (since 1900), conductors and guest conductors, visiting orchestras, and statistics concerning the new organ in the hall, also make the book a storehouse of reference material.

GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 7 1950

Munch Tries New Seating Of Symphony

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Charles Munch was given a standing ovation as he came on stage to open the 70th season of the Boston Symphony Concert series Friday afternoon.

The program was all Beethoven including the overture to "Fidelio" and the Symphony No. 1 in C Major and his Third Symphony in E Flat Major.

Hearing and playing Beethoven seems to get everyone in a hearing and playing mood. It is an interesting observation, however, that Munch's Beethoven has a lot of Munch in it. Yet the man manages to remain uncannily faithful to the composer.

This was especially true of the "Eroica" which seemed as geared to the 20th century as it did to Beethoven's time and, inadvertently, seems to add emphasis to the fact that in all the arts we are just getting around to reverting back to the primitive. It still remains an uncommonly distressing fact that there are only so many notes in the musical scale and not enough new composers around with the adequate ingenuity to successfully re-arrange them.

* * *

MR. MUNCH has gone out on a limb with his new seating arrangement which is far more radical, in Boston at least, than last year's combination. It is to be hoped that the limb is a strong one, for there are always those who like to saw.

The string sections, with the exception of the celli, have been taken off the elevating stages and placed on the floor. The former arrangement made a pretty picture and the tone of the violins was superb. From the audience everyone could see what was going on and this added to the over all enjoyment of the concerts.

However, the worth of a seating arrangement is not based on its sight appeal. Mr. Munch was obviously out to improve the tone. In this reviewer's opinion, the celli and brass sections have benefited from the change. There is, an overbalance here, though. Although the lower register is more resonant, the violins lack the luster and resilience which have characterized the Boston Symphony for lo these many years. The tone is thin and, at times, whining.

* * *

LAST SEASON it seemed that the blaring brass was the Achilles heel of this orchestra. Now it seems that when Mr. Munch dunked his orchestra into the river of reform, he held it by the tip of the violin section.

The orchestra is changing. There is no doubt there. This energetic conductor has taken a robot and humanized it. By giving it a soul, however, he gave it the human frailties which go with a new born consciousness. Simultaneously he exhibits a fascinating lack of sentimentality.

This concert was also the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the opening of Symphony Hall. The Museum of Fine Arts has loaned several of its paintings for display and just before the performance, Lansing Humphrey of the box office mentioned something of interest. It seems that although Symphony Hall is famous all over the country as such, it has never been officially named, and nowhere inside or outside of the building can be found the words Symphony Hall.—F. S.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 6 1950

ENCORE!

Those things with a long past are likely to have a long future. Today begins the 70th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One reason it has flourished in our midst for seventy years is that the musical public here had already been seventy years growing, besides which the cultural soil of a respect for learning and for the arts hereabouts is three hundred years deep.

Suppose we had in Boston (and on tour throughout the northeastern parts of the United States) a repertory theatre company which played nearly the year round the classic masterpieces of the world's drama, ancient and modern, from the past 25 centuries. What we do have is an orchestral equivalent. The art of symphonic music is younger, let us say 200 years old, but the invigorating effect upon hundreds of thousands of minds during the 70 years of our Orchestra's existence is something beyond estimate, beyond money, beyond any scale of tangible values known to man. When money is spoken about in relation to such values, it is only as a means of sustaining life in a body that sustains a life of the spirit in ourselves.

The Boston Orchestra will lose an expected $165,000 of additional income which would have been the result of tax exemption—the proposed Federal measure ruled out by the national emergency. Without available funds to meet its deficits, the Orchestra, instead of raising the price of tickets, has asked those who renew their season tickets to add twenty percent, as a voluntary gift. Between 80 and 90 percent of them have already done so. The usual privileges of the Friends of the Orchestra will be offered in return for their usual and very necessary contributions to its maintenance. No one who knows the intricate urgencies of such an Orchestra's financial sustainment will question the wisdom of this.

Ideas which come to artists are often symbolic of events on an international scale. At a time when the drawing together of Western Europe and the Americas is an historic event, Mr. Charles Munch, the conductor of the Orchestra, a native of Alsace, a region long symbolic of an harmonious union of the Western European nations, has produced an idea for a wider service and union of our Orchestra for our enormous student population, who come from an equally wide geographical area. In answer to a question raised by three Harvard students, it is announced that Mr. Munch will return to an early tradition of the Orchestra by really open rehearsals on Thursday, beginning in November and averaging about one a month through the season, these for students of conservatories and others at college level, no seats reserved, and the money from such open rehearsals to go to better the pension fund.

The Orchestra's royalties from phonographic records, owing to a dispute between parties entirely outside of its orbit, declined in two years from $200,000 to $100,000, but better returns are expected in the coming years. In sum, what we have in our Boston Orchestra is a quality product—which is certainly understating it. The distribution of this product is limited as to number of concerts and number of seats, since this is no time to ask the public for the needed larger auditorium, and a subsidy cannot be counted upon.

The means of sharing this quality product by broadcast with a larger public exists; the receptive public exists; the medium for bringing the two together regularly does not exist. Even as things are, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives more concerts in more forms for more people than any other. Its primacy continues. This is the language of plain fact. And we who have eaten at the common table of that overearthly banquet know that it is worth all it costs, since in the final accounting such fare cannot be paid for at all.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD
OCT 18 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY DRAWS AUDIENCE OF NEARLY 6,000

Program At R.P.I. Field House Features Beethoven, Franck Compositions

By KEITH MARVIN.

With a stunning albeit somewhat erratic performance of the famous "Symphony in D Minor" by the nineteenth century Belgian romatic composer, Cesar Franck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new permanent conductor, Charles Munch, brought to a close a thrilling concert before nearly 6,000 persons at R.P.I.'s Field House last night.

This marked the first concert to be given in Troy by that august group since 1924, when the orchestra performed under Serge Koussevitzky, also a new permanent conductor of the orchestra in those days.

Last night's program also marked the first major concert to be held in the new Field House. It was, perhaps, the most significant musical event in Troy history in the twenty-six years since the group played before the Trojan audience. As is known, the Boston Orchestra today is probably the No. 1 orchestra in the United States and perhaps in the world!

Not Ideal.

As far as the program was concerned however, the "Fidelio Overture" by Beethoven and the ever-famous "Eroica" or Third Symphony by the same composer, plus the Franck symphony was far from ideal. The "Fidelio' was put on the program at the last moment in place of an overture by the American contemporary, Samuel Barber, but no matter—the concert was one of the finest heard in the area for many a year.

The Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72b, by Beethoven opened the program and worth mentioning was the attack given by the conductor and the orchestra. Munch was facing the audience for a few moments seemingly taking in the number present when, without warning he wheeled about, raised his hands, brought them down, and the concert had begun.

The string section was particularly fine, and was admirably aided by the woodwinds, horns and percussion. The overture is cast in Beethoven's classical style, and in view of what was to follow—the "Eroica" and the Franck "D Minor," saved the program from being one consisting of old warhorses, the latter two symphonies being legion in the concert repertory of any symphony orchestra.

Wrong Applause.

Aside from the unfortunate applause on the part of the audience between movements of the symphonies, there was a dead hush throughout the evening's performance.

With another whirlwind opening, the "Eroica" was underway, and beautifully played. From any point of view it was an outstanding performance with the majestic opening lovingly performed, and the dirge-like open of the second movement following the mood. Superlatives might be easily lost in attempting a description of this beautiful section. The gay third movement followed in rapid suit and the majestic finale with its famous and ever-popular theme completed the picture.

The Franck "Symphony in D Minor", also a favorite with concert goers, was rather amazing because of the faster tempo with which it was taken. Crescendos, always required in the Belgian master's great work, were very fine indeed, as was the shimmering brilliance with which the orchestra generally performed the movement. The thrilling climax to the concert brought a tremendous applause from the audience and the conductor took several curtain calls.

Troy has always been noted as a musical city, but from indications last night at the Field House, with its fine acoustics and more than ample seating capacity, the city has definitely arrived in musical facilities. This concert should prove the point.

[146]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE

OCT 20 1950

Munch Accorded Long Ovation With Boston

By NORMAN NAIRN

CONTINUING its superlative ways under Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another feast to the ears at the Eastman last night, arousing the large audience to enthusiasm reaching ovation proportions.

It took the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) in a marvelously dramatic reading to reach the peak of the evening. For here Munch immersed himself completely in the music—which immersion is the mark of a great conductor—never missing the logic of the towering structure, sending his hearers home grateful for such a contribution.

There was the illusion of spontaneity, too, which makes an orchestra plastic. The titanic quality of the music, with its surges of energy, its sweeping utterances, was moving in its intensity. The essence of Beethoven here is spaciousness, grandeur, nobility of spirit. Munch probed all these qualities.

The playful Scherzo, with its famous and difficult horn passages, came off splendidly, preceded by the poignancy of the Marcia funebre, greatest of all dirges, a sort of crystalization of spiritual and emotional utterance. And the Finale was notable for surety and vigor.

* * *

FROM its earliest days the Boston Symphony has been an orchestra to hear, nearly always nothing short of equisite. Possibly it was the choice of program which made it not quite that last night, for our Philharmonic audiences are not quite in sympathy with such works as Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude.

It is one which Munch is introducing to his Boston following this season, although not its premiere in this country, for Ernest Ansermet conducted it with the Dallas Symphony early last year.

Honegger, French composer, formerly of "The Six," pursued his dissonant way in this piece, which so far as most of the audience was concerned had strictly intellectual appeal. Your reviewer confesses to receiving no deep inspiration or thrill. The audience gave it just a polite reception. It was here that the horns and trumpets departed from the strict and narrow path. One could hardly blame them.

* * *

Another contemporary French work of far different character is Albert Roussel's Second Suite extracted from ballet, "Bacchus et Ariadne," which so far as I know has not been heard here.

It has an exquisite quality, fascinating in its orchestral colors, emotional, exciting in some of its episodes, wholly enjoyable. The glorious string quality for which the orchestra is famous had full sway here.

Munch opened with Sir Hamilton Harty's transcription of Handel's Royal Fireworks Music, a stunning performance, with the sonorous Overture, the grace and finesse of the Alla Siciliano for strings only. The contrast between the soft woodwinds answering the more positive strings in the Bourree was strikingly affective, the Menuetto sturdy.

Three members of the orchestra, former Eastmanites, had a time in the afternoon renewing old acquaintance, Harold Meek, French horn; Willis Page and Henry Freeman, double basses.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM

NOV 1 = 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY SAYS "YES" TO DETROIT BID

DETROIT — Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today said he [redacted] to organize and conduct a revived Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

The maestro cabled The Detroit Free Press music critic from Tel Aviv, Israel, in response to a query concerning his availability.

"Will do my best assist revival Detroit Symphony if representatives of Detroit City Society and public show active interest," Mr. Koussevitzky wired.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

OCT 20 1950

What a Sight!

It did many a Syracusan's heart good Wednesday night to walk in the stronghold of hockey, horses and the Nats, and find some 6,000 music hungry people waiting for the Boston symphony to begin.

Barring conflicting dates and an evident predominance of sports, it bodes well—very well—for the War Memorial which will be smacked with chmpagne next year.

Of course, the Boston symphony can—and has—played in everything from plush concert halls to salons, but somehow, even knowing what called one to the Coliseum, to see one of the world's greatest orchestras in that barn of a place with people packing it to the girders, gave one something of a start that might result if Mae West were to appear in the village choir some Sunday—and just as pleasant a start at that.

It proves that the music of the masters is not a social pastime that will bring out a few hundred on a pleasant evening when there is nothing else to do. It proves that Syracuse can and will support such music far beyond our present capacity to hold such an enormous audience.

And it also brings up this point—a very important one: With the not too far distant opening of the War Memorial and its thousands of seats, the price of even the most expensive artists will permit a general lowering in the cost per seat, from orchestra to the back row.

Here's to it, and more of it!

* * *

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 19 1950

6,000 Applaud RPI Concert Of Symphony

By D. E. RITZ

A highly dramatic interpretation of the Star Spangled Banner opened the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the RPI Field House in Troy Tuesday night.

Charles Munch, the dynamic new music director of the famous orchestra, was making his first vicinity appearance.

The program proper opened with Beethoven's "Overture to Fidelio," opus 72 b and included the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony and the Cesar Franck "Symphony in D minor."

The program offered no novelties but included solid and substantial fare, and for that reason gave orchestral enthusiasts a most accurate gauge of the characteristics of Munch. He combines a flair for the dramatic with a most forthright approach to the subject in hand and the music begins almost as soon as he reaches the podium.

No studied mannerisms detract from the performance and his beat is clarity in itself. The left forefinger pointing significantly to the heart is one of his favorite admonishments to the orchestra. A sense of complete understanding between the men in the orchestra and its new leader has been achieved with results most gratifying. The Tuesday evening audience of nearly 6,000 persons was enthusiastic and an ovation followed the program for the orchestra and the conductor.

The concert opened the symphony's fall tour, which will take it to Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Battle Creek and Kalamazoo before its return to Boston for the Oct. 27 concert. It was also the first program presented in the new acoustical shell (built like the one at Tanglewood) in the field house. Acoustics proved excellent with no echo, which, considering the structure of the building, is an amazing feat.

Incidents during the evening included the breaking of a tailgut for one of the violas and the resultant zing as the strings were released and the bridge clattered to the floor and a bow incident in which one of the first desk men of the 'cello section found himself uddenly clutching a fistfull of bowhair. A quiet assist from another player gave the unlucky 'cellist a bow to use and his benefactor the rest of the evening off.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

OCT 18 1950

Throng Hears Boston Symphony

By CLIF BRADT

A fall accent to the Berkshire Festival came last night to Troy, where the huge Field House of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute became for the moment the Tanglewood Shed, but there was one major difference, Charles Munch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was on the podium and from his personality and French musical background was reflected a concert of dynamic power that gave a new and different flavor to the orchestra's efforts.

There is a strange detachment of almost wistful humor about Munch's facial expression but not in the forthright manner of his conducting, in which one senses tremendous power that is only partially unleashed, even in the strongest passages of the music.

What probably was the largest musical audience of its kind ever gather under one roof in the Capital District heard Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the socalled "Eroica," played in a manner that brought out in the first movement the tenseness, the sinister explosive power that motivated Beethoven when he declared himself, in this symphony, liberated from classical tradition.

In the unutterable mystery of the funeral march sections of the second movement, Munch displayed a forte for giving the music every opportunity to speak for itself, rather than adorn it with the foibles of overconducting.

The same was true with Franck's Symphony in D Minor, once considered less profound than is now realized. Thus, without becoming ornate, as many conductors do with the D Minor, Munch opened up the realistic depths of this poignant, at times deeply tragic study of the duality and mystery of man's emotional life. The audience recognized the worth of his efforts in the ovation accorded him at the end of the concert.

The overture from Beethoven's "Fidelio," the more theatrical frontpiece that eventually remained with the score after the previous overtures became the Lenore No. 1 and No. 2, struck the mood of the concert, but kept the program within romantic confines, where a modern work have added a dash of spice.

The accoustics were surprisingly good, considering the cavernous hall, and attested to the efforts made in that direction.

A replica scaled within a few inches of the shell before which the orchestra plays at Tanglewood was constructed and some baffling of the superstructure of the Field House produced a good balancing of the orchestra sections with minor exceptions, such as overaccenting of the brass in passages of the Franck second movement, which probably was due more to the orchestra. Nevertheless, such delicacies as the pizzicato strings and the oboe and flute songs of the Allegretto came through exquisitely.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 8 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Trio of New Books on Boston's Symphony Hall and Other Matters

Three books covering as many different aspects of the musical scene have recently come to our attention.

The first of these will be of particular interest to Brooklynites who attend regularly the local concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is "Symphony Hall, Boston," by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown), and, as its title implies, is a history of that noble shrine at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Aves., which, since its opening just 50 years ago, has been the home of the orchestra.

Beginning with a detailed description of the hall and its management, Mr. Johnson goes on to give us an equally detailed account of the history of music in Boston during the last half century. Since the orchestra is the hall's principal tenant, most of the discussion is centered around that magnificent organization, its programs and the conductors under whom it functioned. But we are also given a chance to meet in print the many brilliant concert artists who have performed there, not to mention the jazz bands, orators and conventions which help keep the auditorium busy most of the year.

Liberal Quotes

But this is no mere set of sentimental reminiscences of the musical life in a large American city. Mr. Johnson has taken the trouble to quote liberally from the writings of Boston's notable critical fraternity, so that we learn a great deal about contemporary thought concerning the musical giants of the past and present. He also gives us a vitally interesting picture of changing musical tastes during the first half of the twentieth century. Strangely enough, the only thing he omits is the date of the official opening of the hall!

Appendices take up a considerable portion of the book. They include a complete list of the works played by the Boston Symphony from the time of its inception in 1881 through 1949, lists of conductors and soloists with the orchestra, visiting orchestras and concert artists who have appeared in the hall, as well as the specifications of the new pipe organ.

The second book is "Records:

[147]

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.

...on Boston's
Other Matters

...many different aspects ...ome to our attention. ...of particular interest to ...e local concerts by the ...ymphony Hall, Boston," ..., and, as its title impli... the corner of Hunting... ...ince its opening just 5... the orchestra.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
NOV 1 - 1950

As We See It—

Symphonic Stirrings

THE possibility that the Detroit Symphony Orchestra may be revived under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, famed former conductor of the Boston Symphony, should meet an enthusiastic response in this City.

The collapse last year of the local musical organization left a gap in Detroit's cultural life which badly needs closing. As it has been pointed out, our musical difficulties of the past are due, in large part, to the fact that at no time have we had at the head of our orchestras men of recognized national stature. With Koussevitzky wielding the baton, that handicap no longer would exist.

KOUSSEVITZKY

Mr. Koussevitzky retired a year ago from the Boston orchestra after directing it for 25 years. During that time it became one of the world's great musical combinations. Now it is reported that the maestro, tired of retirement, wants again to resume his established place in music.

It is more than coincidence that his name has been mentioned, and that he has indicated a willingness to come to Detroit. It is an indication that music lovers of this City and particularly those whose generosity makes support of an orchestra possible, have definite ideas about reviving the symphony.

Whatever may be behind the move, it is indicative of the fact that Detroit has not abandoned hope of having a great orchestra and providing the people with the best in music.

For that reason, the plan, however tentative it may still be, deserves the widest popular support.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 1 - 1950

Music

Boston Symphony Heard in First Concert of Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first Providence concert of its series at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening and now we feel that the musical season has really started in earnest.

Charles Munch conducted a program which offered something for all ages and types of listener. They were all there, too, from the eager young students in the extra seats placed in the orchestra pit for them, on up to the most venerable of our music lovers.

The warm weather left no excuse for anyone to stay away. Some of the patrons were delayed in arriving. Perhaps they forgot that these concerts begin at 8:15. There was more stir than usual seating the late comers.

The stage of the auditorium had been partially enclosed by the sides of the box stage formerly used for orchestral concerts at the Metropolitan Theater. It is hoped that the mechanism for lifting the ceiling of the box stage into place will soon be available so that the entire stage will be enclosed.

Dr. Munch opened the season by playing the national anthem and some of the audience sang.

Then we settled down to listen and we heard the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Op. 55 by Beethoven, "La Mer" by Debussy and "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, Second Suite, Op. 43 by Roussel.

The Beethoven was played with extraordinary devotion. Charles Munch makes sure that one hears what the composers meant him to hear. The contrasting phrases of the first movement were graceful and quiet at times and then with one quick gesture, were welded into a tonal structure of forceful sound. The "Marcia funebre" was very moving and a fitting prelude to All Saints Day. The lightness and speed of the Scherzo were delightful. The Finale was a careful exposition of Beethoven's masterful writing. The conductor was recalled four times. He always takes his bows from the floor beside the podium with the entire orchestra standing.

The Debussy was full of imagination and color. The rhythm of the "Jeux de Vagus" was unusually realistic and th virtuosity of the players was given full sway here. The dialogue between the wind and the sea was ful of foreboding. This was truly a brilliant offering.

The Rousse Suite was introduced to Boston in 1946 by Charles Munch. It is an excellent example of the work of a French composer whose music is not too often heard. The Bacchanale was exciting with its strong accents, wide leaps and whirling frenzy. It took on a Wagnerian sort of grandeur in the finale and brought hearty applause for the orchestra and conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 2 - 1950

Wagneriana

John N. Burk, author and music critic, who has been the program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1935, has edited the Letters of Richard Wagner: The Burrell Collection,' which Macmillan will issue in early December. These papers and documents were assembled during the nineteenth century by Mary Burrell, who refused to allow experts or biographers to examine them. With the exception of a few letters, the collection, now in the possession of Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, has been published for the first time.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 - 1950

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Heard In First Concert of Its Providence Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first Providence concert of its series at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening and now we feel that the musical season has really started in earnest.

Charles Munch conducted a program which offered something for all ages and types of listener. They were all there, too, from the eager young students in the extra seats placed in the orchestra pit for them, on up to the most venerable of our music lovers.

The warm weather left no excuse for anyone to stay away. Some of the patrons were delayed in arriving. Perhaps they forgot that these concerts begin at 8:15. There was more stir than usual seating the late comers.

The stage of the auditorium had been partially enclosed by the sides of the box stage formerly used for orchestral concerts at the Metropolitan Theater. It is hoped that the mechanism for lifting the ceiling of the box stage into place will soon be available so that the entire stage will be enclosed.

Dr. Munch opened the season by playing the national anthem and some of the audience sang.

Then we settled down to listen and we heard the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Op. 55 by Beethoven, "La Mer" by Debussy and "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, Second Suite, Op. 43 by Roussel.

The Beethoven was played with extraordinary devotion. Charles Munch makes sure that one hears what the composers meant him to hear. The contrasting phrases of the first movement were graceful and quiet at times and then with one quick gesture, were welded into a tonal structure of forceful sound. The "Marcia funebre" was very moving and a fitting prelude to All Saints Day. The lightness and speed of the Scherzo were delightful. The Finale was a careful exposition of Beethoven's masterful writing. The conductor was recalled four times. He always takes his bows from the floor beside the podium with the entire orchestra standing.

The Debussy was full of imagination and color. The rhythm of the "Jeux de Vagues" was unusually realistic and the virtuosity of the players was given full sway here. The dialogue between the wind and the sea was full of foreboding. This was truly a brilliant offering.

The Roussel Suite was introduced to Boston in 1946 by Charles Munch. It is an excellent example of the work of a French composer whose music is not too often heard. The Bacchanale was exciting with its strong accents, wide leaps and whirling frenzy. It took on a Wagnerian sort of grandeur in the finale and brought hearty applause for the orchestra and conductor.

...review of New Diamond Symphony

Composer in Interview Talks About His Third

By Klaus G. Roy

"Yes, I've been very fortunate with my symphonies," David Diamond said. "Mitropoulos premièred my First, Koussevitzky the Second, Bernstein launched the Fourth here in 1948, and I'm now writing the Fifth for him!"

It was logical that this procession of important first performances should bring up a simple question—what happened to the Third, if the Boston Symphony concerts of this Friday and Saturday are to give it its world première?

"Well, it's an odd story," the composer continued, "but I don't mind telling you. You recall the Reichhold Contest in Detroit, some five years ago? I was pretty low on finances then, earning my living as a radio orchestra player, and $25,000 sounded pretty inviting. I submitted the Third Symphony, completed on July 28, 1945. Didn't even get honorable mention. Got thrown out with the first batch.

"However, my symphony was tied up there for years. That's why it has been lying unplayed for so long, but a première by the Boston Symphony was worth it."

* * *

David Diamond is now 35, and the list of his prizes, commissions, and awards is almost as long as that of his works. One of his fellowships, a Guggenheim in the late 1930's, took him to France.

This week end the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the fitting climax to a program that includes also Albert Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane" Second Ballet Suite, which Mr. Munch played here with his French Orchestra before he took over as head of the Boston Symphony.

"All that makes it a doubly meaningful program to me," Mr. Diamond said. "It was through Roussel, you see, that I first met Mr. Munch in 1937. Roussel was just like a father to me when I studied in Paris — some people have even commented on a relationship between his music and mine, and there is much to it. Well, one day he said to me, 'You must come and meet my good friend Charles Munch.' I came, and Mr. Munch and I spent the evening playing my 'Psalm for Orchestra' on two pianos!" On all these counts it was no surprise to hear the composer giving instructions at Tuesday's rehearsal —"mezzoforte, sans accents," and Mr. Munch gravely interpreting for the orchestra: "Mezzoforte, without accents!"

* * *

How, possibly, did the Third Symphony compare in musical expression with "Timon of Athens," which Leonard Bernstein played at Tanglewood last summer?

"Oh, no connection at all," the composer protested. "That was music entirely based on the interpretation of a literary and psychological situation; it's something like the Fifth Symphony, which deals with the Oedipus Rex story —quite some effects in that. . . . No, the Third is entirely pure music, no program of any kind."

Was it an illusion to deduce from a cursory hearing that there was some relationship between the first and last movements?

"Absolutely not! As a matter of fact all the five movements grow out of one another, thematically speaking. What you've got here is a real cyclical form. No, no, of course this is not meant to be obvious, à la Franck. Certain motifs just serve as unifying strands, and they are entirely transformed from movement to movement; like this one, for example. . . ." And Mr. Diamond pointed out in the score how this metamorphosis works.

He explained how he spends several years merely sketching and letting his ideas germinate, so that when he writes it all down in a few months, the whole work can assume a natural and homogeneous form, whatever its contrasts.

The vigorous first movement is in clear sonata form, and the last is a rondo-sonata combination with extensive development. The Scherzo is flanked by two slow movements, the second quite chorale-like in nature, and the whole work takes about 35 minutes.

"Yes, the Symphony really runs the gamut," Mr. Diamond concluded.

[148]

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
NOV 2 - 1950

TRYING OUT THE BELLS, specially cast by Blanchet in Paris, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be used in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Jean Dillingham, soubrette of the D'Oyly Carte Company, is instructed by Victor Di Stefano, percussionist. Bells wil be heard this weekend.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 1 - 1950

Symphony Hall, Boston
Fifty Years of Music

By H[illegible]. Boston: Little, Brown. 1950.

Fifty years ago on [illegible] 15, the first [illegible] Symphony Hall, at [illegible] corner of H[illegible]ington and Massachusetts Avenue, [illegible] opposite [illegible] Mother [illegible]urch [illegible]hr[illegible]nust. In the [illegible]-century [illegible] time the se[illegible], re[illegible]ditorium has [illegible] concerts of [illegible] Boston [illegible] also a mul[illegible] recitals by [illegible] of [illegible] individual [illegible] but numerous travelogues, [illegible] ceremonials, [illegible] schools [illegible]ts. In the [illegible] its [illegible] maroon to [illegible] and [illegible]-floor seats [illegible] replace [illegible] the orchestra [illegible] men, turns [illegible] Pops. From [illegible] to June, the hall is seldom [illegible] and the quality and diversity of [illegible] one of [illegible] per[illegible] [illegible]ce. Mr. [illegible] Worcester, [illegible] by conviction [illegible] has [illegible] make the walls [illegible] of a [illegible] symphony, [illegible] of Sy[illegible] re-eminent [illegible] which is [illegible] accurate [illegible]pelled and [illegible]on's Third Symphony [illegible] earance ten[illegible] context that [illegible] the author's real [illegible] Caruccio Tagliavini [illegible] a "heroic tenor," etc.). [illegible] all the works played by the Boston Symphony in both the old Music Hall and Symphony Hall.

Amusing and informative as the book is, its author wears the air of one who is treading on eggs. The real story of Karl Muck's internment is suppressed; the termination of Pierre Monteux's tenure is left without explanation; the 25-year reign of Serge Koussevitzky is bathed in sweetness and light. The book has a smiling, tea-party tone which no doubt gratifies the management of Symphony Hall, but which leaves the reader with the feeling that the story has been told in technicolor. Still, it is full of fascinating details, and it provides a sense of the scope, dignity, and importance of one of the country's leading concert halls.

—C. S.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
NOV 1 - 1950

As We See It—

Symphonic Stirrings

THE possibility that the Detroit Symphony Orchestra may be revived under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, famed former conductor of the Boston Symphony, should meet an enthusiastic response in this City.

The collapse last year of the local musical organization left a gap in Detroit's cultural life which badly needs closing. As it has been pointed out, our musical difficulties of the past are due, in large part, to the fact that at no time have we had at the head of our orchestras men of recognized national stature. With Koussevitzky wielding the baton, that handicap no longer would exist.

KOUSSEVITZKY

Mr. Koussevitzky retired a year ago from the Boston orchestra after directing it for 25 years. During that time it became one of the world's great musical combinations. Now it is reported that the maestro, tired of retirement, wants again to resume his established place in music.

It is more than coincidence that his name has been mentioned, and that he has indicated a willingness to come to Detroit. It is an indication that music lovers of this City and particularly those whose generosity makes support of an orchestra possible, have definite ideas about reviving the symphony.

Whatever may be behind the move, it is indicative of the fact that Detroit has not abandoned hope of having a great orchestra and providing the people with the best in music.

For that reason, the plan, however tentative it may still be, deserves the widest popular support.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 1 - 1950

Music

Boston Symphony Heard in First Concert of Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first Providence concert of its series at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening and now we feel that the musical season has really started in earnest.

Charles Munch conducted a program which offered something for all ages and types of listener. They were all there, too, from the eager young students in the extra seats placed in the orchestra pit for them, on up to the most venerable of our music lovers.

The warm weather left no excuse for anyone to stay away. Some of the patrons were delayed in arriving. Perhaps they forgot that these concerts begin at 8:15. There was more stir than usual seating the late comers.

The stage of the auditorium has been partially enclosed by the sides of the box stage formerly used for orchestral concerts at the Metropolitan Theater. It is hoped that the mechanism for lifting the ceiling of the box stage into place will soon be available so that the entire stage will be enclosed.

Dr. Munch opened the season by playing the national anthem and some of the audience sang.

Then we settled down to listen and we heard the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Op. 55 by Beethoven, "La Mer" by Debussy and "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, Second Suite, Op. 43 by Roussel.

The Beethoven was played with extraordinary devotion. Charles Munch makes sure that one hears what the composers meant him to hear. The contrasting phrases of the first movement were graceful and quiet at times and then with one quick gesture, were welded into a tonal structure of forceful sound. The "Marcia funebre" was very moving and a fitting prelude to All Saints Day. The lightness and speed of the Scherzo were delightful. The Finale was a careful exposition of Beethoven's masterful writing. The conductor was recalled four times. He always takes his bows from the floor beside the podium with the entire orchestra standing.

The Debussy was full of imagination and color. The rhythm of the "Jeux de Vagues" was unusually realistic and the virtuosity of the players was given full sway here. The dialogue between the wind and the sea was full of foreboding. This was truly a brilliant offering.

The Roussel Suite was introduced to Boston in 1946 by Charles Munch. It is an excellent example of the work of a French composer whose music is not too often heard. The Bacchanale was exciting with its strong accents, wide leaps and whirling frenzy. It took on a Wagnerian sort of grandeur in the finale and brought hearty applause for the orchestra and conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 2 - 1950

Wagneriana

John N. Burk, author and music critic, who has been the program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1935, has edited the Letters of Richard Wagner: The Burrell Collection,' which Macmillan will issue in early December. These papers and documents were assembled during the nineteenth century by Mary Burrell, who refused to allow experts or biographers to examine them. With the exception of a few letters, the collection, now in the possession of Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, has been published for the first time.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Heard In First Concert of Its Providence Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first Providence concert of its series at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening and now we feel that the musical season has really started in earnest.

Charles Munch conducted a program which offered something for all ages and types of listener. They were all there, too, from the eager young students in the extra seats placed in the orchestra pit for them, on up to the most venerable of our music lovers.

The warm weather left no excuse for anyone to stay away. Some of the patrons were delayed in arriving. Perhaps they forgot that these concerts begin at 8:15. There was more stir than usual seating the late comers.

The stage of the auditorium has been partially enclosed by the sides of the box stage formerly used for orchestral concerts at the Metropolitan Theater. It is hoped that the mechanism for lifting the ceiling of the box stage into place will soon be available so that the entire stage will be enclosed.

Dr. Munch opened the season by playing the national anthem and some of the audience sang.

Then we settled down to listen and we heard the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Op. 55 by Beethoven, "La Mer" by Debussy and "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, Second Suite, Op. 43 by Roussel.

The Beethoven was played with extraordinary devotion. Charles Munch makes sure that one hears what the composers meant him to hear. The contrasting phrases of the first movement were graceful and quiet at times and then with one quick gesture, were welded into a tonal structure of forceful sound. The "Marcia funebre" was very moving and a fitting prelude to All Saints Day. The lightness and speed of the Scherzo were delightful. The Finale was a careful exposition of Beethoven's masterful writing. The conductor was recalled four times. He always takes his bows from the floor beside the podium with the entire orchestra standing.

The Debussy was full of imagination and color. The rhythm of the "Jeux de Vagues" was unusually realistic and the virtuosity of the players was given full sway here. The dialogue between the wind and the sea was full of foreboding. This was truly a brilliant offering.

The Roussel Suite was introduced to Boston in 1946 by Charles Munch. It is an excellent example of the work of a French composer whose music is not too often heard. The Bacchanale was exciting with its strong accents, wide leaps and whirling frenzy. It took on a Wagnerian sort of grandeur in the finale and brought hearty applause for the orchestra and conductor.

Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

Preview of New Diamond Symphony

Composer in Interview Talks About His Third

By Klaus G. Roy

"Yes, I've been very fortunate with my symphonies," David Diamond said. "Mitropoulos premièred my First, Koussevitzky the Second, Bernstein launched the Fourth here in 1948, and I'm now writing the Fifth for him!"

It was logical that this procession of important first performances should bring up a simple question—what happened to the Third, if the Boston Symphony concerts of this Friday and Saturday are to give it its world première?

"Well, it's an odd story," the composer continued, "but I don't mind telling you. You recall the Reichhold Contest in Detroit, some five years ago? I was pretty low on finances then, earning my living as a radio orchestra player, and $25,000 sounded pretty inviting. I submitted the Third Symphony, completed on July 28, 1945. Didn't even get honorable mention. Got thrown out with the first batch.

"However, my symphony was tied up there for years. That's why it has been lying unplayed for so long, but a première by the Boston Symphony was worth it."

* * *

David Diamond is now 35, and the list of his prizes, commissions, and awards is almost as long as that of his works. One of his fellowships, a Guggenheim in the late 1930's, took him to France.

This week end the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the fitting climax to a program that includes also Albert Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane" Second Ballet Suite, which Mr. Munch played here with his French Orchestra before he took over as head of the Boston Symphony.

"All that makes it a doubly meaningful program to me," Mr. Diamond said. "It was through Roussel, you see, that I first met Mr. Munch in 1937. Roussel was just like a father to me when I studied in Paris — some people have even commented on a relationship between his music and mine, and there is much to it. Well, one day he said to me, 'You must come and meet my good friend Charles Munch.' I came, and Mr. Munch and I spent the evening playing my 'Psalm for Orchestra' on two pianos!" On all these counts it was no surprise to hear the composer giving instructions at Tuesday's rehearsal —"mezzoforte, sans accents," and Mr. Munch gravely interpreting for the orchestra: "Mezzoforte, without accents!"

* * *

How, possibly, did the Third Symphony compare in musical expression with "Timon of Athens," which Leonard Bernstein played at Tanglewood last summer?

"Oh, no connection at all," the composer protested. "That was music entirely based on the interpretation of a literary and psychological situation; it's something like the Fifth Symphony, which deals with the Oedipus Rex story —quite some effects in that, . . . No, the Third is entirely pure music, no program of any kind."

Was it an illusion to deduce from a cursory hearing that there was some relationship between the first and last movements?

"Absolutely not! As a matter of fact all the five movements grow out of one another, thematically speaking. What you've got here is a real cyclical form. No; no; of course this is not meant to be obvious, à la Franck. Certain motifs just serve as unifying strands, and they are entirely transformed from movement to movement; like this one, for example. . . ." And Mr. Diamond pointed out in the score how this metamorphosis works.

He explained how he spends several years merely sketching and letting his ideas germinate, so that when he writes it all down in a few months, the whole work can assume a natural and homogeneous form, whatever its contrasts.

The vigorous first movement is in clear sonata form, and the last is a rondo-sonata combination with extensive development. The Scherzo is flanked by two slow movements, the second quite chorale-like in nature, and the whole work takes about 35 minutes.

"Yes, the Symphony really runs the gamut," Mr. Diamond concluded.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
NOV 2 - 1950

TRYING OUT THE BELLS, specially cast by Blanchet in Paris, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be used in Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," Joan Dillingham, soubrette of the D'Oyly Carte Company, is instructed by Victor Di Stefano, percussionist. Bells will be heard this weekend.

[148]

—Diamond's Third Symphony in Première

THE BOSTON HERALD, SA

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth program of its 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony No. 3.....David Diamond
"Bacchus et Ariane," Op. 43....Roussel
Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A....Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Yesterday's concert was what is known, for want of a more expressive term, a hair-raiser. It was everything else, too, filled as it was with a new symphony, a very atmospheric item not too often encountered, and one of the most exciting works in all the repertoire.

The new work produced, in me at least, very mingled impressions, but on the whole I found David Diamond's Third Symphony a work of considerable expressive power, of abundant invention and of great technical mastery of the orchestra. Its first movement contrasts a strong rhythmic figure of American Indian-like character with a long-breathing lyrical phrase for strings, the whole establishing the cyclical development—and very novel—atmosphere of piano, harps and flutes in a low register, invokes a flavor of open spaces, of Panoramic serenity, of repose and warmth. There follows one of the best and most amusing orchestral scherzos I've heard in any work. The orchestral combinations, the surprises, the bitter-sweet whimsies are thoroughly entertaining, but it does go on after it has made its point.

Oddly enough, although the adagio that follows again captures the note of lyrical expressivity of the second movement, and although the finale is muscular and vigorous, something occurs somewhere along the line to undermine the interest the first three movements achieve. It is true a contrasting slow movement seems required between the scherzo and the finale (and it would be a pity to sacrifice this one), but there is something too much of Mr. Diamond's rather special musical language before this 35-minute piece comes to an end. It is a good language, an original and a forceful sound that is lucid and transparent yet urgent and telling; perhaps too telling to extend itself beyond its proper time.

Roussel's Second Ballet Suite to "Sacchus et Ariane" one of the pieces which introduced us to the singularly vivid art of Charles Munch in 1946, is a pleasure from beginning to end. Although it reflects none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it does parallel its musical course, taking us through a mythical romance to a bacchanale of intoxicated vehemence. The orchestral textures are at once subtle and clamorous, poetic and invigorating, and Mr. Munch brought out every detail with the orchestra in the top of its form tonally and technically.

As for the performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in Mr. Munch's hands it fulfills every qualification of its title. I know of no conductor who can achieve the heart-stopping sense of misterioso he he can, with the result that the moments of extreme pianissimo (as in the entrance of the violas in the slow movement) proved to be as exciting as the ferocious climaxes for full orchestra.

He had brought back from France a new set of bells for this work, and it must be said their debut lent additional impact to the "Witches' Sabbath," the passages involving the "Dies Irae" being all but overwhelming. How the musicians ever negotiated the concluding round at the speed demanded of them I cannot imagine. It may be added, incidentally, that Louis Speyer's playing of the English horn was, as always, superb, and that both of the new first desk artists (Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Gino Cioffi, clarinet) had opportunity to reveal again their fine musicianship. The program next week offers Yehudi Menuhin as soloist in Mozart's D major Concerto, the other pieces being Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony and Shumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat.

E. POWER BIGGS, celebrated organist, will present some of the great works of organ literature at a concert in Symphony Hall Monday night.

Program Includes Works by Roussel, Berlioz

By Harold Rogers

David Diamond is a young American composer of dynamic talent and, to judge by the first performance of his Third Symphony, of untempered zeal. But his symphony, which had its delayed première yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, is already five years old. His Fourth Symphony was heard here in 1948; he is presently at work on his Fifth. Any evaluation of the composer of 1945 may not, therefore, have much relation to the composer of 1950.

Charles Munch opened the Boston Symphony program yesterday with Mr. Diamond's Third, continued it with Albert Roussel's Second Suite from the "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, and brought it to a resounding close with his colossic reading of the Berlioz Symphony, "Fantastique."

* * *

Since Mr. Diamond admits that, while a student in France, he came strongly under Roussel's influence, it was interesting to hear works by both men on the same program. Any comparison of the two suggests that the differences between them are similar to the cultural differences between America and France. America artistically is still a heady youngster, vigorous, explosive, and largely untamed. French culture is the distillation of centuries, rarified, mellowed, and controlled.

Mr. Diamond's symphony, conceived in absolute terms, has great originality and movement, all bound together in good form, and flavored with strong, exotic spices. The first and fifth movements are much alike in allegro motion and staccato rhythms, an intentional likeness since the form is cyclical. The third movement, though in lighter humorous mood, also resembles the end movements in its flavoring. By the time we reach the finale, therefore, we are surfeited with the same dish.

But the second movement is a serenely songful Andante that comes in excellent contrast to the first. The fourth movement, an Adagio, is least American in feeling, though the modal harmonies and parallel motion are well employed for the elegiac mood.

In the "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite, which dates from 1932, Roussel has chosen his condiments with greater care than Mr. Diamond and has been economical in their use. He summons up classical scenes and peoples them with pagan gods. The moods are in turn dreamy, idyllic, sensuous, lyrical, and culminate in a dithyrambic Bacchanale. Roussel's music is a successful bridge between the impressionistic and the modern schools. There is much to satisfy those of the older school or the advance guard.

* * *

Mr. Munch has chosen a program that is compelling from first to last. It is obviously music that he loves to play, for he played it all with a fierce enthusiasm. The listeners were accordingly instant and vociferous in their response. When Mr. Munch conducts works that fall naturally into his métier, as these works did, he is difficult to equal.

The Berlioz "Fantastique" was presented by Mr. Munch in Symphony Hall when he was on tour two seasons ago with his French National Orchestra. Last April he was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque by L'Academie Charles Gros for his recording of this symphony with the same orchestra. It is a work on which he has lavished his loving care. Though hopelessly ahead of its time when composed 120 years ago, many of its ingenious effects are now more than commonplace. But Mr. Munch has revivified it brilliantly with a fiery life. The two new bells, cast in France expressly for the Boston Symphony, are hauntingly effective as they toll through the Dies Irae on the "Witches' Sabbath."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 10 1950

Dr. Koussevitzky Back, Israel Orchestra Coming

Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Wednesday he would be willing to help reorganize the Detroit Symphony Orchestra if there was "real civic interest" in that city, but that so far he had not been invited to do so.

Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at Idlewild Airport from Israel, where he has been preparing the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra for a tour of the United States. He said the American public would find the Israel orchestra "not only a great orchestra but one which combines the greatest enthusiasm with a profound love and devotion to the art—to a degree which is found rarely even among the great nations of the world." The tour will begin Jan. 8 in New York.

The conductor said he had received a telegram from a Detroit civic group asking if he would be available to conduct the Detroit orchestra, which has been dissolved for more than a year. He said his reply was that he would accept such an invitation if it was tendered. Dr. Koussevitzky left the airport for his home at Lenox, Mass. Since his retirement from the Boston Symphony he has conducted at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1950

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was one to dispel doubts and revive drooping spirits. Either in the matter of program or performance, and for one reason or another, everything in this 70th season had not been just the way we would like it. Sometimes, but not always, the orchestra had its familiar sound, and if Mr. Munch was sometimes on the beam, he was occasionally off it, partly missing the point with Beethoven, for example, and going completely wrong with Franck. Yesterday in the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz and in the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Ariane," conductor and orchestra were alike superb.

With the visiting French orchestra two years ago, Mr. Munch had shown his sympathy for and understanding of the Fantastic, but the orchestra could hardly realize his imaginative intentions. I was especially aware of this, having heard him do the piece with the New York Philharmonic a few months before. The Boston Symphony, of course, gave him everything that he wanted, besides giving Berlioz all that he had desired and certainly more than he would have expected in his day. We were all struck with the real bells used by the Orchestre Nationale in the finale. Since he evidently prefers them to the generally used tubular chimes, Mr. Munch had some made for him in France and they had their christening yesterday.

We had heard the Roussel Suite once before, in December, 1946, when Mr. Munch conducted it here as guest. There is a certain kinship to the "Daphnis and Chloe," of Ravel, on the whole a more striking and original creation. One can still wonder why Dr. Koussevitzky overlooked this particular bet. Tonally this music has about everything and yesterday one could revel in the rich and exciting sounds.

David Diamond's Third Symphony was performed yesterday for the first time. It is well put together and by no means unagreeable to hear. Somehow, it didn't seem to prove much beyond the fact that Mr. Diamond can write a Symphony after the cyclic pattern. The three fast movements were curiously suggestive of the Indian Suite of MacDowell, probably farthest from Mr. Diamond's thoughts. He was present in the audience to acknowledge the warm applause.

Roussel's musico-ballet treatment of the Ariane-Theseus-Bacchus legend is vastly different from the lush, stylized opera Strauss contrived on the subject. Roussel was writing for stage motion in the form of dancing, however, which accounts for the prevalence of fast tempos, and the quickly-running fragments of melody that burst out of the intricate orchestral fabric and then disappear back into it. Roussel must have absorbed something from Ravel, for that tiny giant of the art of dance music and orchestration lurks behind a good portion of "Ariane." But the fundamental musularity, the dry, taut quality, those came from Roussel himself and are distinctive. It was good, indeed, to hear this admirable modern French music again.

As he had done here two years ago with the French Orchestre National, Mr. Munch created a sensation with his blazing, virtuoso performance of Berlioz' wonderful old 'Fantastic." Oftentimes Mr. Munch had it go very, very fast, but there was nothing of actual distortion and certainly not of coarseness about it. In fact, the Boston Symphony played like 100-odd angels. But the brilliance, the passion and the gorgeous colors were overwhelming.

Only the Boston Symphony's new bells were something of a disappointment, for they did not equal the French orchestra's clear, true-toned bells we heard in 1948. These new bells are better than the Boston Symphony's old tubular gongs, but it seems we have merely swapped one set of jangling overtones for another.

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Two Symphonies: 'Fantastic' and Diamond's No. 3

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch conducts two symphonies at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week: the "Fantastic" of Berlioz, and the No. 3 by David Diamond, which receives first performances anywhere. The remaining piece is the Second Suite from Albert Roussel's ballet "Ariane et Bacchus," which Mr. Munch introduced to Boston as guest conductor in 1946.

David Diamond finished his Third Symphony in July, 1945. He has this to say about it in the program book: ". . . it consolidates the cyclic form by amalgamating all thematic harmonic and rhythmic material throughout the five movements." This is compact and highly organized music, and I think you might also call it technically theoretical. It is not so good as the Fourth Symphony, and perhaps there is a reason why the Third has waited five years for its premiere.

You get the impression that the Third, which has a rough exterior and a fairly heavy texture, may look better on paper than it sounds in performance. It is not markedly melodic, apart from the slow movement, although in his Fourth Mr. Diamond proved very inventive in the matter of tunes. The rhythms of the Third are insistent and mechanistic, the accents sudden and strong, and the whole thing gives you a feeling of aiming at abstraction. I was glad to be able to hear it, however, and so must the composer, who bowed from where he sat in the auditorium.

E. POWER BIGGS — Celebrated organist, who will give a series of three concerts on the new organ at Symphony Hall on Monday evenings, Nov. 6 and 20 and Dec. 4. The Symphony Orchestra's official organist will present solo master works and a Bach program based on a recital given by Felix Mendelssohn. The Bach program will include music by brass instruments.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 - 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Conductor, Back From Israel, to Go to Detroit if Asked

Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, who arrived yesterday at Idlewild Airport after a five-week stay in Israel, said that he was willing to go to Detroit to discuss the reorganization of that city's symphony orchestra.

Referring to the invitation that had been tendered from Detroit, the conductor said, "My answer is this: I am willing to help if there is real civic interest. Detroit is a city which must have its music as well as life. To stop that would be a great blow to the city and its culture in general."

Asked if he intended to go to Detroit to discuss the problem there, he replied:

"Of course—if they ask me."

In Israel, Dr. Koussevitzky has been preparing the Israel Symphony for its forthcoming tour of the United States, which will be presented by the American Fund for Israel Institutions. The tour will be launched by an inaugural dinner concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on Jan. 8.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

Symphony Rehearsals Open to Pupils

The majority of the tickets, but not all, have been subscribed by students for the series of five open rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which the first will take place next Thursday evening in Symphony Hall, starting at 7:30, and ending between 9:30 and 10. The remaining seats for the first rehearsal are now on sale to the general public at the box office.

These will not be concerts in the formal sense, since Charles Munch will stop the orchestra and repeat passages where necessary, affording an interesting glimpse at the steps necessary to perfect a performance. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's pension fund. These open rehearsals have a historic model—the regular Friday afternoon concerts, while originally were known as "public rehearsals" for the Saturday concerts.

[149]

—Diamond's Third Symphony in Première

THE BOSTON HERAL

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth program of its 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony No. 3.....David Diamond
Bacchus et Ariane," Op. 43....Roussel
Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A....Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Yesterday's concert was what is known, for want of a more expressive term, a hair-raiser. It was everything else, too, filled as it was with a new symphony, a very atmospheric item not too often encountered, and one of the most exciting works in all the repertoire.

The new work produced, in me at least, very mingled impressions, but on the whole I found David Diamond's Third Symphony a work of considerable expressive power, of abundant invention and of great technical mastery of the orchestra. Its first movement contrasts a strong rhythmic figure of American Indian-like character with a long-breathing lyrical phrase for strings, the whole establishing the cyclical development—and very novel—atmosphere of piano, harps and flutes in a low register, invokes a flavor of open spaces, of Panoramic serenity, of repose and warmth. There follows one of the best and most amusing orchestral scherzos I've heard in any work. The orchestral combinations, the surprises, the bitter-sweet whimsies are thoroughly entertaining, but it does go on after it has made its point.

Oddly enough, although the adagio that follows again captures the note of lyrical expressivity of the second movement, and although the finale is muscular and vigorous, something occurs somewhere along the line to undermine the interest the first three movements achieve. It is true a contrasting slow movement seems required between the scherzo and the finale (and it would be a pity to sacrifice this one), but there is something too much of Mr. Diamond's rather special musical language before this 35-minute piece comes to an end. It is a good language, an original and a forceful sound that is lucid and transparent yet urgent and telling; perhaps too telling to extend itself beyond its proper time.

Roussel's Second Ballet Suite to "Sacchus et Ariane" one of the pieces which introduced us to the singularly vivid art of Charles Munch in 1946, is a pleasure from beginning to end. Although it reflects none of the sound of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," it does parallel its musical course, taking us through a mythical romance to a bacchanale of intoxicated vehemence. The orchestral textures are at onee subtle and clamorous, poetic and invigorating, and Mr. Munch brought out every detail with the orchestra in the top of its form tonally and technically.

As for the performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in Mr. Munch's hands it fulfills every qualification of its title. I know of no conductor who can achieve the heart-stopping sense of misterioso he he can, with the result that the moments of extreme pianissimo (as in the entrance of the violas in the slow movement) proved to be as exciting as the ferocious climaxes for full orchestra.

He had brought back from France a new set of bells for this work, and it must be said their debut lent additional impact to the "Witches' Sabbath," the passages involving the "Dies Irae" being all but overwhelming. How the musicians ever negotiated the concluding round at the speed demanded of them I cannot imagine. It may be added, incidentally, that Louis Speyer's playing of the English horn was, as always, superb, and that both of the new first desk artists (Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Gino Cioffi, clarinet) had opportunity to reveal again their fine musicianship. The program next week offers Yehudi Menuhin as soloist in Mozart's D major Concerto, the other pieces being Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony and Shumann's Symphony No. 1 in B flat.

E. POWER BIGGS, cel organist, will present som great works of organ lit at a concert in Sympho Monday night.

Program Includes Works by Roussel, Berlioz

By Harold Rogers

David Diamond is a young American composer of dynamic talent and, to judge by the first performance of his Third Symphony, of untempered zeal. But this symphony, which had its delayed première yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, is already five years old. His Fourth Symphony was heard here in 1948; he is presently at work on his Fifth. Any evaluation of the composer of 1945 may not, therefore, have much relation to the composer of 1950.

Charles Munch opened the Boston Symphony program yesterday with Mr. Diamond's Third, continued it with Albert Roussel's Second Suite from the "Bacchus et Ariane" Ballet, and brought it to a resounding close with his colossic reading of the Berlioz Symphony, "Fantastique."

♪ ♪ ♪

Since Ms. Diamond admits that, while a student in France, he came strongly under Roussel's influence, it was interesting to hear works by both men on the same program. Any comparison of the two suggests that the differences between them are similar to the cultural differences between America and France. America artistically is still a heady youngster, vigorous, explosive, and largely untamed. French culture is the distillation of centuries, rarified, mellowed, and controlled.

Mr. Diamond's symphony, conceived in absolute terms, has great originality and movement, all bound together in good form, and flavored with strong, exotic spices. The first and fifth movements are much alike in allegro motion and staccato rhythms, an intentional likeness since the form is cyclical. The third movement, though in lighter humorous mood, also resembles the end movements in its flavoring. By the time we reach the finale, therefore, we are surfeited with the same dish.

But the second movement is a serenely songful Andante that comes in excellent contrast to the first. The fourth movement, an Adagio, is least American in feeling, though the modal harmonies and parallel motion are well employed for the elegiac mood.

In the "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite, which dates from 1932, Roussel has chosen his condiments with greater care than Mr. Diamond and has been economical in their use. He summons up classical scenes and peoples them with pagan gods. The moods are in turn dreamy, idyllic, sensuous, lyrical, and culminate in a dithyrambic Bacchanale. Roussel's music is a successful bridge between the impressionistic and the modern schools. There is much to satisfy those of the older school or the advance guard.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Munch has chosen a program that is compelling from first to last. It is obviously music that he loves to play, for he played it all with a fierce enthusiasm. The listeners were accordingly instant and vociferous in their response. When Mr. Munch conducts works that fall naturally into his métier, as these works did, he is difficult to equal.

The Berlioz "Fantastique" was presented by Mr. Munch in Symphony Hall when he was on tour two seasons ago with his French National Orchestra. Last April he was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque by L'Academie Charles Gros for his recording of this symphony with the same orchestra. It is a work on which he has lavished his loving care. Though hopelessly ahead of its time when composed 120 years ago, many of its ingenious effects are now less than commonplace. But Mr. Munch has revivified it brilliantly with a fiery life. The two new bells, cast in France expressly for the Boston Symphony, are hauntingly effective as they toll through the Dies Irae on the "Witches' Sabbath."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
1[illegible] 1950

Dr. Koussevitzky Back, Israel Orchestra Coming

Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Wednesday he would be willing to help reorganize the Detroit Symphony Orchestra if there was "real civic interest" in that city, but that so far he had not been invited to do so.

Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at Idlewild Airport from Israel, where he has been preparing the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra for a tour of the United States. He said the American public would find the Israel orchestra "not only a great orchestra but one which combines the greatest enthusiasm with a profound love and devotion to the art—to a degree which is found rarely even among the great nations of the world." The tour will begin Jan. 8 in New York.

The conductor said he had received a telegram from a Detroit civic group asking if he would be available to conduct the Detroit orchestra, which has been dissolved for more than a year. He said his reply was that he would accept such an invitation if it was tendered. Dr. Koussevitzky left the airport for his home at Lenox, Mass. Since his retirement from the Boston Symphony he has conducted at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
Nov 4 1950

Symphony Rehearsals Open to Pupils

The majority of the tickets, but not all, have been subscribed by students for the series of five open rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which the first will take place next Thursday evening in Symphony Hall, starting at 7:30, and ending between 9:30 and 10. The remaining seats for the first rehearsal are now on sale to the [illegible] at the box office.

These will not be [illegible] in the formal sense, since Charles Munch will stop the orchestra and repeat passages where necessary, affording an interesting glimpse at the steps necessary to perfect a performance. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's pension fund. These open rehearsals have a historic model—the regular Friday afternoon concerts, while originally were known as "public rehearsals" for the Saturday concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was one to dispel doubts and revive drooping spirits. Either in the matter of program or performance, and for one reason or another, everything in this 70th season had not been just the way we would like it. Sometimes, but not always, the orchestra had its familiar sound, and if Mr. Munch was sometimes on the beam, he was occasionally off it, partly missing the point with Beethoven, for example, and going completely wrong with Franck. Yesterday in the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz and in the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Ariane," conductor and orchestra were alike superb.

With the visiting French orchestra two years ago, Mr. Munch had shown his sympathy for and understanding of the Fantastic, but the orchestra could hardly realize his imaginative intentions. I was especially aware of this, having heard him do the piece with the New York Philharmonic a few months before. The Boston Symphony, of course, gave him everything that he wanted, besides giving Berlioz all that he had desired and certainly more than he would have expected in his day. We were all struck with the real bells used by the Orchestre Nationale in the finale. Since he evidently prefers them to the generally used tubular chimes, Mr. Munch had some made for him in France and they had their christening yesterday.

We had heard the Roussel Suite once before, in December, 1946, when Mr. Munch conducted it here as guest. There is a certain kinship to the "Daphnis and Chloe," of Ravel, on the whole a more striking and original creation. One can still wonder why Dr. Koussevitzky overlooked this particular bet. Tonally this music has about everything and yesterday one could revel in the rich and exciting sounds.

David Diamond's Third Symphony was performed yesterday for the first time. It is well put together and by no means unagreeable to hear. Somehow, it didn't seem to prove much beyond the fact that Mr. Diamond can write a Symphony after the cyclic pattern. The three fast movements were curiously suggestive of the Indian Suite of MacDowell, probably farthest from Mr. Diamond's thoughts. He was present in the audience to acknowledge the warm applause.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1950

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Two Symphonies: 'Fantastic' and Diamond's No. 3

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch conducts two symphonies at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week: the "Fantastic" of Berlioz, and the No. 3 by David Diamond, which receives first performances anywhere. The remaining piece is the Second Suite from Albert Roussel's ballet "Ariane et Bacchus," which Mr. Munch introduced to Boston as guest conductor in 1946.

David Diamond finished his Third Symphony in July, 1945. He has this to say about it in the program book: ". . . it consolidates the cyclic form by amalgamating all thematic harmonic and rhythmic material throughout the five movements." This is compact and highly organized music, and I think you might also call it technically theoretical. It is not so good as the Fourth Symphony, and perhaps there is a reason why the Third has waited five years for its premiere.

You get the impression that the Third, which has a rough exterior and a fairly heavy texture, may look better on paper than it sounds in performance. It is not markedly melodic, apart from the slow movement, although in his Fourth Mr. Diamond proved very inventive in the matter of tunes. The rhythms of the Third are insistent and mechanistic, the accents sudden and strong, and the whole thing gives you a feeling of aiming at abstraction. I was glad to be able to hear it, however, and so must the composer, who bowed from where he sat in the auditorium.

Roussel's musico-ballet treatment of the Ariane-Theseus-Bacchus legend is vastly different from the lush, stylized opera Strauss contrived on the subject. Roussel was writing for stage motion in the form of dancing, however, which accounts for the prevalence of fast tempos, and the quickly-running fragments of melody that burst out of the intricate orchestral fabric and then disappear back into it. Roussel must have absorbed something from Ravel, for that tiny giant of the art of dance music and orchestration lurks behind a good portion of "Ariane." But the fundamental musicularity, the dry, taut quality, those came from Roussel himself and are distinctive. It was good, indeed, to hear this admirable modern French music again.

E. POWER BIGGS — Celebrated organist, who will give a series of three concerts on the new organ at Symphony Hall on Monday evenings, Nov. 6 and 20 and Dec. 4. The Symphony Orchestra's official organist will present solo master works and a Bach program based on a recital given by Felix Mendelssohn. The Bach program will include music by brass instruments.

As he had done here two years ago with the French Orchestre National, Mr. Munch created a sensation with his blazing, virtuoso performance of Berlioz' wonderful old 'Fantastic." Oftentimes Mr. Munch had it go very, very fast, but there was nothing of actual distortion and certainly not of coarseness about it. In fact, the Boston Symphony played like 100-odd angels. But the brilliance, the passion and the gorgeous colors were overwhelming.

Only the Boston Symphony's new bells were something of a disappointment, for they did not equal the French orchestra's clear, true-toned bells we heard in 1948. These new bells are better than the Boston Symphony's old tubular gongs, but it seems we have merely swapped one set of jangling overtones for another.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 - 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Conductor, Back From Israel, to Go to Detroit if Asked

Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony [illegible] who arrived yesterday at Idlewild Airport after a five-week stay in Israel, said that he was willing to go to Detroit to discuss the reorganization of that city's symphony orchestra.

Referring to the invitation that had been tendered from Detroit, the conductor said, "My answer to this: I am willing to help if there is real civic interest. Detroit is a city which must have its musical life. To stop it would be a great blow to the city and its culture in general.

Asked if he intended to go to Detroit to discuss the project there, he replied:

"Of course—if they ask me."

In Israel, Dr. Koussevitzky had been preparing the Israel Symphony for its forthcoming tour of the United States, which will be presented by the American Fund for Israel Institutions. The tour will be launched by an inaugural dinner concert at the Waldorf-Astoria on Jan. 8.

[149]

...emière

...ssel, Berlioz

...al Orchestra. Last April he ...warded the Grand Prix du ...e by L'Académie Charles ...for his recording of this sym... with the same orchestra. It ...work on which he has lav... his loving care. Though ...lessly ahead of its time when ...ed 120 years ago, many of ...genious effects are now less ...commonplace. But Mr. ...n has revivified it brilliantly ...a fiery life. The two new ...cast in France expressly for ...Boston Symphony, are haunt... effective as they toll through ...Dies Irae on the "Witches' ...ath."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 10 1950

...r. Koussevitzky Back, ...rael Orchestra Coming

...Serge Koussevitzky, former con... ...ctor of the Boston Symphony ...chestra, said Wednesday he ...uld be willing to help reorganize ...e Detroit Symphony Orchestra ...here was "real civic interest" in ...t city, but that so far he had not ...en invited to do so.

...Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at Idle... ...d Airport from Israel, where he ...s been preparing the Israel Phil... ...rmonic Orchestra for a tour of ...e United States. He said the ...erican public would find the Is... ...el orchestra "not only a great or... ...estra but one which combines ...e greatest enthusiasm with a ...profound love and devotion to the ...—to a degree which is found ...rely even among the great na... ...ns of the world." The tour will ...gin Jan. 8 in New York.

The conductor said he had re... ...ved a telegram from a Detroit ...ic group asking if he would be ...ailable to conduct the Detroit ...chestra, which has been dis... ...lved for more than a year. He ...id his reply was that he would ...cept such an invitation if it was ...ndered. Dr. Koussevitzky left the ...rport for his home at Lenox, ...ss. Since his retirement from ...e Boston Symphony he has con... ...cted at the Tanglewood Music ...stival in Massachusetts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 - 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

Conductor, Back From Israel, Go to Detroit if Asked

Serge Koussevitzky, former c... ...uctor of the Boston Symphe... ...who arrived yesterday at Idle... ...Airport after a five-week stay ...Israel, said that he was willing ...o to Detroit to discuss the ...rganization of that city's s... ...hony orchestra.

Referring to the invitation ...ad been tendered from Det... ...the conductor said, "My answe... ...this: I am willing to help if t... ...real civic interest. Detroit ...ity which must have "a g... ...usical life. To stop that ...ould be a great blow to a g... ...ty and its culture in general. ...Asked if he intended to go to ...roit to discuss the problem th... ...e replied:

"Of course—if they ask me."

...In Israel, Dr. Koussevitzky ...as preparing the Israel S... ...ony for its forthcoming tou... ...the United States, which will ...esented by the American F... ...r Israel Institutions. The ...ill be launched by an inaug... ...nner concert at the Wald... ...storia on Jan. 8.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Mrs. Coolidge's Aid to Chamber Music Celebrated by Anniversary Festival

By VIRGIL THOMSON

A FESTIVAL of chamber music held in Washington, D. C., at the Library of Congress last week end was timed to include the seventy-fifth birthday of Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, ... also ... the foundation. They can be guessed at from the list of works ... with a accuracy ... dedicated to Mrs. Coolidge and ... seventy-fifth ... bearing ... that of the contemporary manu... musical ... and admin... script scores given by her to the ... Division of ... Library through the Foundation. ... the 150th ... Some of these are known to have ... existence. ... been compliments from composers. ... and ensem... Others may be presumed to rep... ... String ... resent either purchases or private ... String ... commissions. ... New York Quartet (a ... New Hors... ... pianist); ... mezzo-soprano; ... Alex... ... Milton ... Hermann Busch. ... some forty... ... National ... commissioned by ... the festival. ... Coolidge ... String ... by William ... for Strings ... Copland, a ... and Piano by Aaron ... Quintet for Strings and Piano by ... Robert Palmer, and a work by ... Gian-Francesco Malipiero for voice ... and orchestra entitled Cinque ... Favole Fine Fables). Revivals ... from earlier Coolidge festivals in... cluded Ernest Bloch's Suite for ... Viola and Piano, Ravel's Chansons ... Madecasses, Copland's "Appalach... ... Spring" and Stravinsky's ... "Apollon Musagete," the last two ... of these being given without the ... dancing spectacles for which they ... were commissioned. Classical ... works by Bach, Beethoven, Schu... bert and Brahms filled out the ... five programs. All were played at ... the Library of Congress in a con... cert hall seating 500 persons that ... was a gift of Mrs. Coolidge to the ... United States government twen... ...ty-five years back.

Washington's music reviewers were not unanimous about the virtues of the new works. It is notoriously difficult, as a matter of fact, to judge chamber music fairly from one hearing. Aaron Copland's Piano Quartet will be submitted to New York reviewers tonight at another birthday concert, this one offered by the League of Composers to honor the composer's fiftieth anniversary, which falls on Nov. 14.

In the Berkshires

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge's public encouragements to the composing and performing chamber music date from 1918. In that year she initiated the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music, held at her estate on South Mountain, near Pittsfield, Mass. These took place every September through 1924. Since 1925 their chief site has been Washington, though Paris and Venice enjoyed them during the years when the auditorium in the Congressional library was being prepared. In 1928, 1934 and 1938 they returned briefly to Pittsfield.

From 1918 through 1924, excepting for 1923, Mrs. Coolidge awarded annual prizes to chamber works of specified instrumentation submitted in competition. Other works seem to have been commissioned directly. In 1923 two such commissions replaced the competition. Restored the following year, the competition was finally abandoned in 1925. The reasons for this abandonment were never announced publicly, to my knowledge, but they can be imagined as having to do with the immense labor involved in examining scores (eighty-two were submitted the first year) and with the reluctance of many of our best composers to engage in competitions at all. In any case, new works since 1925 have been commissioned directly.

In Washington

IN THAT year Mrs. Coolidge set up at least part of her musical benefactions as a foundation. This was presented, along with a chamber-music auditorium, to the nation and the administration of it placed with the Music Division of the Library of Congress. Its capital amounts to some $600,000 and bears interest at 4 per cent, that rate being guaranteed by the Treasury Department. The sum available annually for musical expenditure by the foundation is therefore $24,000. Further sums are probably expended privately by Mrs. Coolidge without consultation of the trustees, though the extent of these is difficult to surmise from the printed reports of

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The most interesting Symphony Concert of the season, that of yesterday, spanned nearly three and a half centuries of instrumental music. The first number was the Sonata Pian e Forte for brass instruments that the younger Gabrieli wrote in 1957, and immediately after it came the arrangement for full orchestra that Schoenberg made in 1935 of the Chamber Symphony that he had composed 29 years before.

After that Mr. Munch went back to the 18th century in a Violin Concerto in D major attributed to Mozart and introduced to Boston on this occasion by Yehudi Menuhin. The final number, which brought matters to the middle of the 19th century, was the First Symphony of Schumann. And throughout the afternoon, as it seemed to this observer, the Boston Symphony never played better and never sounded better.

The Gabrieli, resembling in style the choral music of the day, gave the brass choir an opportunity such as it seldom receives. One could revel in the sounds that these virtuosi produced. The piece had been played at the Symphony Concerts in 1935 under Sir Adrian Boult. We had heard the Schoenberg three years ago, when Mr. de Carvalho conducted the original version for 16 instruments.

The work gains, at least in a large hall, by its transfer to the full orchestra; and even if you didn't like the music itself, you could hardly fail to be impressed by Shoenberg's amazingly resourceful orchestration. Belonging to his transitional period, or between the frankly romantic and the radical phases of his work, it is predominantly Straussian in character, seeming more so in the new versions and sounding, curiously enough, not only like the Strauss that had already been written, but like the Strauss that was to come. The piece suffers a little from want of organization; its dissonances no longer distress.

The Mozart Concerto, supposedly written by him as No. 7, at the age of 21, contains much that he might well have written and much that might easily have been composed by someone less gifted. Yet such Mozart authorities as Einstein and Saint-Foix have expressed their belief in its authenticity. Anyway, it was a pleasure to hear it, and particularly in so fine a performance as that of Mr. Menuhin.

That which Mr. Munch did last year for the Schumann Fourth he did yesterday for the First. Barring a tendency to sentimentalize, forgivable enough in Schumann, this was a glorious re-creation of a vernal music that had never sounded so fresh. We can now only wait, as patiently as possible, to see what Mr. Munch can do with the Second and Third.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 5 - 1950

Menuhin to Play Mozart Work at Boston Symphony Concerts

Yehudi Menuhin will be soloist at the next "regular" Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30. He will play Mozart's Violin Concerto in D major (K. 271-A), hitherto unheard at these concerts. Although the autograph score has never been found, the work has been accepted as authentic Mozart. These concerts will begin with the new version for full orchestra of Schoenberg's early Chamber Symphony, and will close with Schumann's "Spring" Symphony. Charles Munch will conduct.

The Sunday afternoon series at Symphony Hall will begin at 3 today. Charles Munch will conduct Handel's "Royal Fireworks" Music; the Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Honegger; the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. Mr. Munch will direct the same program at the opening concert of the Cambridge series, in Sanders Theatre, Tuesday evening.

The majority of the tickets, but not all, have been subscribed by students for the series of five open rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which the first will take place next Thursday evening in Symphony Hall, starting at 7:30 and ending between 9:30 and 10. The remaining seats for the first rehearsal are now on sale to the general public at the box office. These will not be concerts in the formal sense, since Charles Munch will stop the Orchestra and repeat passages where necessary, affording an interesting glimpse at the steps necessary to perfect a performance. The proceeds will go to the Orchestra's pension fund. These open rehearsals have a historic model—the regular Friday afternoon concerts, which originally were known as "public rehearsals" for the Saturday concerts.

Menuhin's playing shows him to be a most interesting person.

Mr. Munch was, as always, an expert accompanist.

The orchestra was in good form. Heard for one of the first times was Arnold Schoenberg's chamber symphony. It is a heavy thing, as is all Schoenberg, and is not meant for the daily fare for the general public.

Charles Munch was in his element in a dazzling performance of the Schumann first symphony. It was an exciting vehicle for the sonorous lower strings of the orchestra.—F. S.

MUSIC Nov 11

Yehudi Menuhin Plays Rare Mozart Concerto With Boston Symphony

BY CYRUS DURGIN

Yehudi Menuhin played a rare Violin Concerto of Mozart, the D major, No. 7, at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Conductor Charles Munch began the program with Gabrielli's Sonata Pian e Forte for brass, and further conducted the full orchestral version of Arnold Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony and the "Spring" Symphony by Schumann.

Mozart's Concert (K. 271-A) was new to these concerto, and chances are it never had been performed in Boston. Though thought to have been composed in 1777, and believed genuine by the best Mozart scholars, the Concerto has been suspected by some as partly the work of another composer, a supposition based on certain technical procedures. Mozart, the doubters said, could not have written that way in 1777, and furthermore the original autograph of the score was lost.

No matter. It is a charming and delectable piece, and it sounds very Mozartian. Mr. Menuhin, who with his former teacher, Georges Enesco, has played this Concerto frequently, was at the top of his form, and that means execution, phrasing, style and expression of the finest, all topped by a wonderfully rich and luminous tone. Mr. Munch and the small orchestra required, partnered Mr. Menuhin superbly, and with the utmost delicacy. You could not imagine anything with a lighter or more certain touch, down to the little pizzicato accompaniment of the main theme in the slow movement.

To put it bluntly, Schoenberg's full orchestration of his Chamber Syphony takes the curse off this acrid and tiresome work. There is still plenty of dissonance, and the instrumental wanderings are just as devious, but with so many strings and the richer effect produced, the whole business sounds more palatable.

Perhaps I am wrong, perhaps this is a score of great import and masterly facture. If so, I am out in left field and ready to admit it. The Chamber Symphony has existed since 1906, and has had enough time to make its way. A compound of Wagner, Strauss and Schoenberg, it is pedantic, heavy and dull, and to my mind shows all the worst aspects of the Teutonic musical temperament.

The "Spring" Symphony went beautifully, under Mr. Munch's forceful but straightforward reading. It was warm and romantic but simple, ardent but without strain. The pace was right all the way, the orchestra was splendidly responsive. The net result was a completely satisfying recreation of a great masterpiece. Gabrielli's archaic little piece, showing off the fine brass ensemble which Mr. Munch has now perfected, proved a stimulating opener.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES -
NOV 11 1950

Menuhin Shows Growth Over Years

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert featured Yehudi Menuhin as violin soloist in [redacted] Concerto in D Major. Mr. Menuhin is, by reputation and ability, one of the better violinists on the concert stage in a day when there is a definite drouth in good fiddlers.

The technical passages of the Mozart hardly make any demands on Mr. Menuhin's well-developed technique, but it was especially satisfying to witness the sensitivity which this remarkable violinist injected into this very old piece of music. Menuhin has an odd habit of slithering over notes as if he could not cleanly play them, but we all know that he can.

This small fault is dwarfed even further by the huge perception of Mr. Menuhin's playing. If anything, he has improved over the years.

NEW MUSIC Nov 11

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fifth program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, was the guest soloist. The program:

Sonata Pian E Forte.....Gabrielli
Chamber Symphony, Op. 9B..Schoenberg
Violin Concerto in D (K.271A)..Mozart
Symphony No. 1 in B flat, Op. 38.
Schumann

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The case of Arnold Schoenberg vs. the people (or vice versa, as the situation may be) is one of the most singular things in the history of music.

For here is a composer—the only one with the possible exception of Charles Ives—who operates on the theory that if you know how to put a bunch of notes on a piece of score paper you are, presto, a composer. That Schoenberg WAS a composer is beyond question; "Verklaerte Nacht" remains one of the great compositions in music. But unlike Richard Strauss or Rachmaninoff or any of the other composers trapped in the death-throes of romanticism, Schoenberg could not go on and work out a personal idiom springing from what had gone on before; that, even if it did prove to be a little old-fashioned, was at least of the world. So Schoenberg became an inventor.

12-TONE SYSTEM

He invented the 12-tone system of building music. Nobody liked it very much. In fact nobody but a few disciples liked it at all, but Schoenberg has been making music out of the 12-tone system now for 45 years or more. Still nobody likes it. He has, as a consequence, now become a philosopher and a rather angry one at that, writing articles and books suggesting that people who don't like his music ought to have their heads examined. It may be argued that not many liked the later works of, say, Beethoven, and he also felt those who didn't ought to have their heads examined, though he didn't put it quite in those terms. However, most of Beethoven's music was loved and understood in his own day. It took some years for the musical people to come abreast of the late quartets and sonatas, but not 45 years. Yet 45 years have passed since Schoenberg wrote his Chamber Symphony, and it will certainly be another 45 before it is programmed by popular demand . . . and it isn't even in the 12-tone system at all.

This work, now in a version for full orchestra, is not, however, without its points of interest. On the contrary, save for its over-extension and its amorphous, tenuous quality, it offers a myriad of fascinating sounds, instrumental combinations and tonal convolutions. Yet it never touches any emotion save curiosity, never arouses any mood save speculation on how the conductor can conduct it and how the musicians can count the bars. It may be said that Mr. Munch did conduct it both brilliantly and with conviction, and that the musicians counted and played it skilfully. I am sure, in any case, that if they didn't, we weren't aware of the fact.

WARM RECEPTION

Yehudi Menuhin, always one of the high points of any season, never played better nor made a more gracious appearance than he did yesterday in a violin concerto attributed to Mozart. It is charming, elegant, and beautiful to hear no matter who did it, but I cannot believe Mozart wrote it any more than I can believe Beethoven wrote the Jena Symphony; it just doesn't have the right overall sound. In any case, the violinist, using the Enesco cadenzas, did it superbly and was given a very warm reception.

The concert began with a rare piece by Gabrielli for the brass instruments (a notable novelty it was, too) and ended with a truly superb performance of Schumann's Spring Symphony. As he has with Mendelssohn and so many others, Mr. Munch has shown us an entirely new Schumann, and an extraordinary one. The work did indeed live up to its subtitle; it was as awakening and as beautiful as the first fine day of May.

Serge Koussevitzky returns on Nov. 24, for his first guest appearance since he resigned two years ago, to do Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7; the orchestra is out of town next week.

[150]

FLAIR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV - 1950

RUTH ORKIN

Bernstein pushes and pulls through much analytic music.

PIX

Reiner spread-eagles, makes men work out hard during rehearsals.

ERIC SCHAAL, PIX

Walter's manner encourages, like a gentle pat, singers and symphonies.

GIL FRIEDBERG

Münch rolls with the musical line and makes all the properly Gallic grimaces.

PIX

Ormandy levels off his musicians with meticulous skill.

10 - 11 X

THE JEST IN THE GESTURE

The never-never land musicians in FLAIR cartoonist Hoffnung's orchestra, rehearsing for a nervous breakdown, are being whipped into shape by their leader. Conductors in America, duringthis overture season, should have everything in full swing by now.

Arturo Toscanini, back from a rest-summer in which he conducted the Verdi Requiem at Milan, plays his first NBC concert this month. The Maestro, long may he wave, plans twelve concerts this year.

Leopold Stokowski is guest-conducting this season, has no orchestra of his own and doesn't want one. Half-Irish, he maintains his popularity, particularly among the ladies; renders classic pops sweetly.

Eugene Ormandy, solid at his permanent post with the Philadelphia, specializes in readings of Brahms, Handel. He labels himself a "frustrated fiddler" and years ago really began as a child prodigy violinist.

Leonard Bernstein, as usual, directed at Tanglewood last summer, leads the Israel Philharmonic on its first tour here this fall. The bright boy of the podium is also on Broadway with his songs and music for Peter Pan.

Sir Thomas Beecham, who is British and bold enough to manage any orchestra and hush up any audience, imports himself and the Royal Philharmonic to the U. S. for a happy round of Mozart and the nineteenth-century romantics.

Bruno Walter recently appeared on the Munich concert stage for the first time since he returned to Germany. Back now, he guest-conducts Beethoven's Fidelio at the Met, then is off on tour.

Fritz Reiner once head of the orchestral department at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute, is specially chosen this year to lead the pit through the Metropolitan's current productions of Salome and Die Fledermaus.

Charles Münch begins his second year with the Boston Symphony where a knowing audience and a great orchestra have already learned to admire this thorough artist, reputable musician and complete Frenchman.

COURTESY NBC

Toscanini vocalizes, chides men by saying they play as if operating sewing machines.

SONNEE GOTTLIEB

Stokowski's famous hands draw forth both melody and sentiment.

PIX

Beecham wiggles his goatee, jog[illegible] brasses into order.

10 - 11 X

'n Mozart Concerto

Munch Conducts Symphonies By Schönberg and Schumann

By Harold Rogers

It was a cheerful concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Even Schönberg's "Kammersymphonie," which has its share of storm clouds, could not obscure the impression of sunlight provided by Mozart and Schumann. Yehudi Menuhin gave a radiant performance of Mozart's Concerto in D major, K. 271A. Schumann's "Spring" Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, was all that its title implies. Charles Munch opened the program with an opulent reading of Gabrieli's Sonata Pian e Forte (composed in 1597), played by the brass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This version of Schönberg's Chamber Symphony, re-scored for full orchestra by the composer in 1935, has both emotional and historical appeal. Written in 1906, it is the last work in his first period. He had not altogether let go of Wagner's chromatic harmonies with his left hand, nor had he completely grasped his own new system of atonality with his right.

In the first version, however, in which each of 15 instruments is given something of an equal standing, the effect is far more original and advanced. The full orchestra destroys its sense of compactness, restores Wagnerian tone colors, and has a tendency to draw the work farther back into time than it deserves.

The harmonic basis of the piece —radical enough in 1906 but almost trite in 1950—makes use of the fourth-tone row in melodic and harmonic relation to the whole-tone scale. But the old chromaticism, often attenuated to a point where it can hardly be recognized, is still much in evidence. One's personal response to the work, either pro or con, should not interfere with his respect for its historical place as a trail blazer. Schönberg is believed by many to have exerted the greatest single influence upon contemporary music.

* * *

After the rehearsal Thursday night Mr. Menuhin assured friends backstage that the Mozart concerto he is playing this week end is authentic. It's true, he said, that the autograph is lost, but added that Mozart scholars, including Alfred Einstein, consider its authenticity incontestable.

"And besides, there's this section in the minor in the slow portion," Mr. Menuhin pointed out, referring to the score. "Whenever Mozart writes in the minor, there'e always something quite touching about it." The cadenzas, he reported, are by Georges Enesco, with whom he has performed the concerto on several occasions.

Mr. Menuhin was in excellent form yesterday, playing with even greater warmth and brilliance than he did at the Thursday rehearsal. One could relax in the security of knowing that he was completely secure in all departments—intonation, style, and an impeccable technique. Enesco's cadenzas, though somewhat of a departure from Mozartian simplicity, were ingeniously worked out and sparkling in performance.

* * *

The Schumann First is one of those architectural masterpieces that were apparently constructed with no engineering problems whatever. Its shape and flow so clearly assert themselves that the conductor and musicians need but open their hearts and respond.

This is not to say that it will play itself; few symphonies will. Mr. Munch gave it his most careful and loving direction. He clearly revealed the serene beauties of the Larghetto. He pointed up the lightness and gayety of the Scherzo with its two contrasting Trios. He built the final Allegro movement into a spinning climax.

If Mr. Munch has been criticized for a baton that gains in momentum, in this instance he was acting under Schumann's authority. Ten pages before the double bar (in Peter's edition) the tempo marking is "Poco a poco accelerando"!

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 12 1950

Koussevitzky Returns as Guest Conductor of Symphony Nov. 24

Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Tel Aviv, will be the first of the two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who have been invited by Charles Munch in its 70th anniversary season to return as guests. Pierre Monteux will conduct in January.

The orchestra's first visit to New York, New Haven and Washington will occupy the week to come. Dr. Koussevitzky announces for the sixth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Nov. 24 and 25, Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony and the Seventh Symphony by Anton Bruckner. The programs for the second Tuesday concert on Nov. 21 and for later concerts will be announced. The last pair in the regular series, to be conducted by Koussevitzky, will include the American premiere of Henri Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Innocents," composed in memory of Jean Barraud, shot by the Nazis Aug. 1, 1944. The Chorus Pro Musica will assist.

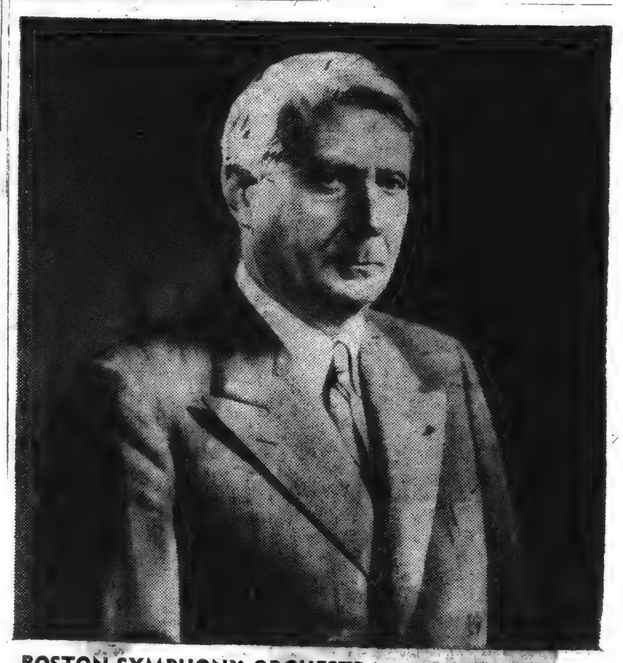
Since retiring as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, after a memorable tenure of a quarter of a century, Dr. Koussevitzky plunged into a strenuous round of activities. Hardly had he concluded the 1949 Berkshire Festival, than he was fulfilling his first California engagement in the Hollywood Bowl which was hailed as a revelation.

In early October he was conducting the Brazil Symphony Orchestra in Rio de Janeiro, his first appearance in South America.

After flying back to the States and dividing some time between his homes in Lenox, Mass., and Scottsdale, near Phoenix, Ariz., he took off again in January, 1950, to fill engagements until June in Havana, Israel (debuts in each case), Rome, Brussels, Paris and London.

From July 8 to Aug. 13 this year he conducted at the Berkshire Festival. He flew from New York to Paris on Sept. 21, and within the week had flown to Israel. After filling return engagements there until November, he flew on the sixth of the month to Paris, and thence to New York, arriving last Wednesday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 12 1950



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Charles Munch conducting, will open its annual series Friday evening at the Academy of Music.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 12 1950

MUSIC

Charles Munch To Conduct Boston Symphony Tuesday

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Once again it is Boston Symphony time! Twice each season we are privileged to hear this great orchestra in regular programs of the Woolsey Hall Series. Charles Munch and his musicians will provide "something old, something new" in a typical Boston program as the second event of the Woolsey Series on Tuesday evening. With regard to programs, Mr. Munch is following pretty much in the Koussevitzkian traditions. The three B's are still the mainstay of the orchestra's programs and the choice of new works finds a generous sprinkling to date of works by composers for whom the good Doctor had a weakness.

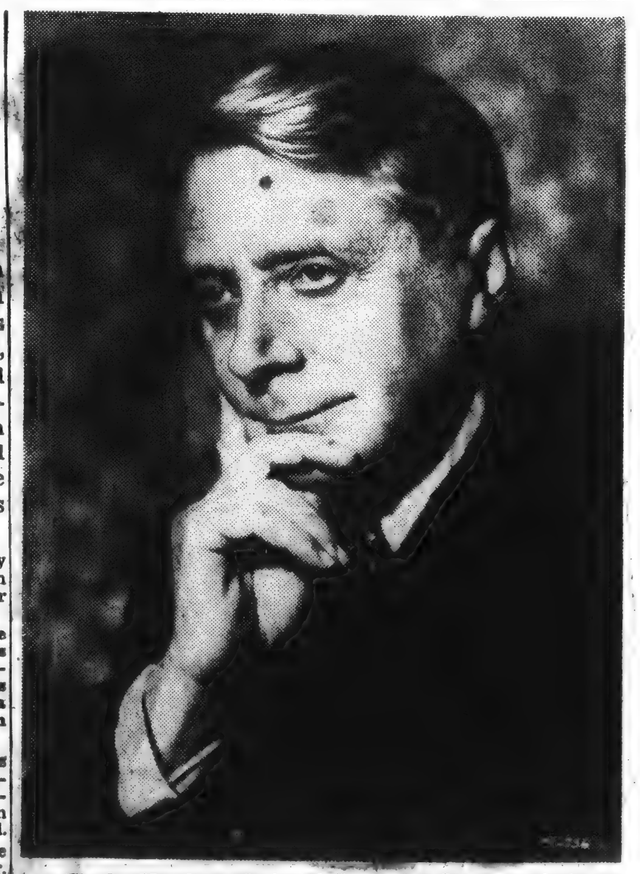
In Tuesday's program, for instance, we find Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica," as the piece de resistance with Handel's Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks (transcribed for Orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty) making up the complement of older music.

As for works in the newer category on Tuesday's program, we have Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, and Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," Second Suite, Op. 43. Both of these composers were well represented in programs of the Boston Orchestra during Dr. Koussevitsky's tenure. Just a few seasons back, the former conductor of the orchestra played here Honegger's Symphony for String Orchestra, a work which had received its American premiere under his baton a year previously.

Those who heard the program by the French Orchestra two years ago when a local audience had its first glimpse of Mr. Munch will remember that his all French program (with the exception of the Piston Toccata) included the Roussel work to be heard on Tuesday evening. In that concert also, the "Symphonic Liturgique" by Honegger was played.

In Mr. Munch's short reign with the orchestra, it is evident that he is well on his way towards attaining the popularity of his predecessor, both in a musical and a personal sense. While it is not recorded that he is carrying on the delightful practice of "kissing in the Green Room" at Symphony Hall, he is immensely popular with his musicians, for he has a way with people. It is said that he speaks with the same respect to important personages and to the usherettes at Carnegie Hall, whom he addresses as "mes enfants."

It will be a "large evening" on Tuesday, both on the platform and in the auditorium at Woolsey Hall.



Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will give the first of its annual concerts at Woolsey Hall Tuesday night.

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
NOV 5 - 1950

Two New Books Deal With Life In Music World

SYMPHONY HALL, by H. Earle Johnson. Little, Brown Co. $6.00.

MY LIFE IN MUSIC, by John Erskine. William Morrow & Co. $3.50.

By G. CRISS SIMPSON

These two books on musical topics are very different from each other. Mr. Johnson's is a very Bostonian product which gives a year-by-year account of doings in famed Symphony Hall from the first concert, Oct. 19, 1900, to the moment copy went to the publishers.

Boston music critics are quoted so profusely that the book is a virtual anthology of Hub music criticism. This is all to the good, since the quoted passages have a distinction that Mr. Johnson cannot begin to approach in his own writing.

Of these storied critics, Philip Hale had the most devastating wit. He wrote of a performance of Huss' piano concerto, "There were a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them." Emma Eames' singing of "Who Is Sylvia?" caused him to remark, "From the manner in which she inquired 'Who Is Sylvia?' it was evident that Sylvia's name was not on her visiting list, and that there was grave doubt as to the desirability of an acquaintance."

H. T. Parker wrote criticism of much poetic feeling. He found in Debussy's "La Mer" "perfect fluidity and incessant motion." While of the old fogy, Louis Elson, "It was terrible while it lasted."

Concerts by the Boston Orchestra and by solo [illegible] are treated fully, but that characteristic Boston institution, the "Pops," is allotted only four pages. This is a pity, because to countless improper Bostonians "Symphony Hall" and "Pops" are synonymous.

Mr. Johnson has provided such appurtenances as a complete list of works performed by the Boston Orchestra from 1881 to 1949, of conductors and soloists with the orchestra, as well as a selective list of concert artists who have given solo recitals in Symphony Hall. However, for some strange reason, he has omitted a general index. This drastically reduces the practical value of his book.

Moving from Boston to New York, we find John Erskine's "My Life in Music" a sadly disappointing work from an eminent man of letters. It is hard to believe that the author of "The Private Life of Helen of Troy" could be guilty of such chiton. Either Mr. Erskine is in his dotage or he didn't give a hoot's darn when he wrote these musical reminiscences. The most [illegible] prima donna couldn't have done worse.

Then, the digs Mr. Erskine takes at certain people are not amusing, as gustily written invective can be, but merely boring. And why was it necessary for him to air his peeve at Mrs. MacDowell because she chose someone else to write MacDowell's biography?

Mr. Erskine has done much for the cause of music, but this opus will not advance music an inch.

[153]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD

Times-Herald Sketch by Brian Brown

BOSTON'S LEADING MAN: Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in its first Washington concert of the season in Constitution Hall on Thursday night. Dr. Munch, an Alsatian who scored a triumph when he brought the Orchestre National de France to the Capital two years ago, subsequently succeeded Serge Koussevitzky in Boston.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 12 1950

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

CHARLES MUNCH, conductor of the Boston Symphony, playing in Constitution Hall Thursday

Mrs. Truman To Entertain At Symphony

Mrs. Truman will have a party of guests with her in the White House box when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays the first concert of its Washington series here Thursday evening.

Conducting the program, which will open with the Star-Spangled Banner, will be Charles Munch who came from France last year to succeed Serge Koussevitzky.

Boxholders from the diplomatic corps will include the conductor's countrymen, French Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet, Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Paul Schweitzer and Mr. and Mrs. Andre Visson.

Other boxholders will be the New Zealand Ambassador and Lady Berendsen, the Ambassador of the Philippines, Mr. Joaquin M. Elizalde; the Spanish Military Attache, Col. Angel G. de Mendoza and Dr. Jorge Barreiro, First Secretary of the Embassy of Uruguay.

Residential Washington will be represented by Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Edwin M. Watson, Mrs. Matthew J. Whittall, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grew, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss.

Boston Symphony Will Open Season Here Thursday Night

The Boston Symphony will make its first visit of the current season to Washington for a concert on Thursday evening.

Charles Munch, the music director of the Bostonians, lists for performance some old and some new works. Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, subtitled the "Eroica," and Handel's "Music for the Royal Fireworks," as arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty, form the time-tested staples of the program.

Munch's important novelty for Thursday is the new Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by the Swiss modernist, Arthur Honegger. The Boston Symphony will also give the Washington premiere of the Second Suite from the ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," by Albert Roussel.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 13 1950

Mrs. Truman Will Applaud Boston's Return

"Le Beau Charles" Munch, French conductor who came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, returns to Constitution Hall with his men Thursday evening. Mrs. Truman, heading the list of boxholders, will be there to hear him. In the dress circle will be Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William Crozier, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grew, Mrs. James Patton, Mrs. Matthew J. Whittall, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, and Mr. and Mrs. William Castle, who will have as their guests the former Ambassador of Poland and Mme. Ciechanowska.

From the diplomatic circle will come the Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen, the Ambassador of the Philippines, Joaquin M. Elizalde; the Spanish Miliary Attache, Col. Angel G. de Mendoza, and the First Secretary of the Embassy of Uruguay, Dr. Jorge Barreiro.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Gen. Joseph Lawton Collins, and Mrs. Collins will be guests in the Jouett Shouse box. Mrs. Philip L. Graham, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, will occupy the Meyer box.

Mme. Munch hopes to make the trip from Boston to hear the concert, and George Judd, manager of the orchestra, will be there with a party of friends.

Other Washingtonians who have taken boxes are Mrs. Margaretta Stroup Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell, Martin Braverman, Mr. and Mrs. Ray Henle, Mrs. Florence Keep, Judge and Mrs. George Neilson, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew J. Snow and Mrs. Edwin M. Watson.

After their concert on Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony will return to Washington twice again this winter—on December 7, when Koussevitzky will conduct, and on February 13.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS

NOV 15 1950

Truman Rules Tomorrow On Recall of Congress

Washington, Nov. 15 (AP)—President Truman will disclose tomorrow whether he will call Congress back to session earlier than the Nov. 27 date now scheduled.

Presidential Secretary Ross said Mr. Truman will "speak for himself on that subject" at his news conference tomorrow.

The President, now even more heavily guarded than during wartime, will make two public appearances during the next four days.

He plans to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mrs. Truman tomorrow night at Constitution Hall here. Sunday afternoon he will be guest of honor at a reception given by the Women's National Democratic Club.

[154]

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

NOV 15 1950

Well-Guarded Truman Plans Two Public Appearances Soon

President Will Attend Symphony Concert Tomorrow Night, Democratic Women's Affair Sunday; Protection Is Greatly Increased Since Death Plot Failed

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 (AP).—President Truman, now more heavily guarded than even during wartime, will make two appearances during the next four days.

He plans to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mrs. Truman tomorrow night at Constitution Hall here. Sunday afternoon he will be guest of honor at a reception given by the Women's National Democratic Club at their clubhouse.

The White House, in announcing the schedule today, described the reception as a purely social affair at which the President would not speak.

The attempt of two fanatics to shoot him down two weeks ago have led to extraordinary precautions for Mr. Truman's safety.

In the 14 days since two Puerto Rican revolutionaries tried to shoot their way into Blair House and kill Mr. Truman, these and other steps have been taken to insure no plot upon his life could succeed:

All Traffic Barred

A block-long street closest to the White House executive offices—West Executive Avenue—has been blocked to all traffic. Exits from the old State Department building leading into that street have been sealed.

Blair House has been roped off and only those with special passes may approach nearer than the broad width of Pennsylvania Avenue, on which it fronts. The government has purchased the two adjacent buildings whose windows look down upon the President's temporary living quarters.

Swarms of uniformed and plain-clothes police and Secret Service men have been added to the White House guard. Strangers who approach get coldly appraising stares.

Liked To Walk Alone

There was a time, in his early days in the White House, when Mr. Truman liked to steal away from his guards and go about his affairs without a bodyguard. His guards, for instance, became nearly apoplectic when they learned once he had strolled out to the bank while they thought he was safely inside his office.

He got the idea quickly, however, and these episodes are now old history.

Since the shooting, Mr. Truman's early morning two-mile hikes, his favorite exercise, have been fewer, but he plans to attend the Army-Navy football game in Philadelphia, Dec. 2. It has not been settled whether he will spend Christmas in his home town, Independence, Mo.

The Secret Service declines to discuss what added security steps it has taken, but the presence of extra guards at points the President will pass when he moves about Washington tells the story.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1950

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTED HERE BY MUNCH AIDE

The first concert here last season by the Boston Symphony found a new conductor on the podium — Charles Munch. By an odd coincidence, the initial appearance of the orchestra in Woolsey Hall this season also displayed a "new" conductor. Mr. Munch was not able to conduct last evening's concert by the orchestra because of illness, so Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert-master, stepped into the conductor's role with great success and with no apparent change in the usual brilliance of the Boston musicians' style.

Mr. Munch became ill on Monday at the orchestra's rehearsal in Boston. He had chills and other symptoms which prompted his physician to order him to bed for a couple of days. There is still some doubt as to whether he will conduct the orchestra in its scheduled New York concert this evening. The Boston conductor reportedly is quite disturbed over his indisposition at this time, but he is extremely fortunate in having such a capable assistant-conductor and certainly will have no worries over the latter's abilities.

Mr. Burgin is no stranger to the podium. In his 30-year association with the orchestra as a first-desk violinist, he has conducted the Boston Symphony many times and also appeared as its soloist on numerous occasions over the years. His membership in the orchestra antedates the reign of Serge Koussevitzky, for last evening's conductor joined the Boston group in 1920 at the time that Pierre Monteaux assumed the director's post. Before joining one of the world's great orchestras, Mr. Burgin had won renown as a concert-master in Helsingfors and Christiana. He and Jascha Heifetz, the famous violinist, had been fellow pupils of the great Leopold Auer.

As a conductor, Mr. Burgin is not the showman on the podium that both Mr. Munch and Dr. Koussetvitzky are. He is what might be called a "straight man," with no fancy motions, though his beat is decisive and when necessary, vigorous. As a "pupil" of two conductors who lean towards bright tempos and tonal fireworks, with bright colorings and extremes in dynamics, Mr. Burgin's directing last evening provided a typical Boston program, winning him the plaudits of both the musicians and the audience.

Though Handel's Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks and Beethoven's Third Symphony were possibly the works which provided the most enjoyment in the program, the greater interest centered in two works in modern vein. These were Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, played here for the first time, and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," ballet music heard locally in Mr. Munch's appearance with the French Orchestra two years ago. The Honegger work is mild harmonically as compared with some of his extreme tonal excursions, and the more dissonant Roussel opus, predominantly rhythmic, is one of the most intriguing things that the writer has heard in some time.

Someone has said that the Boston Orchestra has everything! The statement surely includes a first-rate assistant conductor. Mr. Burgin is all of that. —G. E. A.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD

Times-Herald Sketch by Brian Brown

BOSTON'S LEADING MAN: Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in its first Washington concert of the season in Constitution Hall on Thursday night. Dr. Munch, an Alsatian who scored a triumph when he brought the Orchestre National de France to the Capital two years ago, subsequently succeeded Serge Koussevitzky in Boston.

Boston Symphony Will Open Season Here Thursday Night

The Boston Symphony will make its first visit of the current season to Washington for a concert on Thursday evening.

Charles Munch, the music director of the Bostonians, lists for performance some old and some new works. Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, subtitled the "Eroica," and Handel's "Music for the Royal Fireworks," as arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty, form the time-tested staples of the program.

Munch's important novelty for Thursday is the new Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by the Swiss modernist, Arthur Honegger. The Boston Symphony will also give the Washington premiere of the Second Suite from the ballet, "Bacchus et Ariane," by Albert Roussel.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 13 1950

Mrs. Truman Will Applaud Boston's Return

"Le Beau Charles" Munch, French conductor who came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, returns to Constitution Hall with his men Thursday evening. Mrs. Truman, heading the list of boxholders, will be there to hear him. In the dress circle will be Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. William Crozier, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grew, Mrs. James Patton, Mrs. Matthew J. Whittall, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, and Mr. and Mrs. William Castle, who will have as their guests the former Ambassador of Poland and Mme. Ciechanowska.

From the diplomatic circle will come the Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen, the Ambassador of the Philippines, Joaquin M. Elizalde; the Spanish Miliary Attache, Col. Angel G. de Mendoza, and the First Secretary of the Embassy of Uruguay, Dr. Jorge Barreiro.

The Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Gen. Joseph Lawton Collins, and Mrs. Collins will be guests in the Jouett Shouse box. Mrs. Philip L. Graham, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Meyer, will occupy the Meyer box.

Mme. Munch hopes to make the trip from Boston to hear the concert, and George Judd, manager of the orchestra, will be there with a party of friends.

Other Washingtonians who have taken boxes are Mrs. Margaretta Stroup Austin, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell, Martin Braverman, Mr. and Mrs. Ray Henle, Mrs. Florence Keep, Judge and Mrs. George Neilson, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew J. Snow and Mrs. Edwin M. Watson.

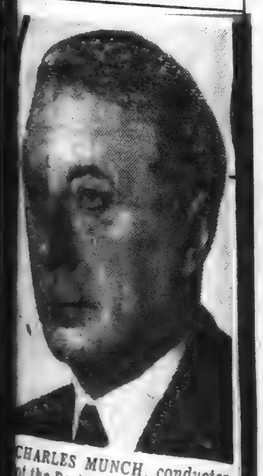
After their concert on Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony will return to Washington twice again this winter—on December 7, when Koussevitzky will conduct, and on February 13.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 12 1950

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV [illegible]



CHARLES MUNCH, conductor of the Boston Symphony, playing in Constitution Hall Thursday.

Mrs. Truman To Entertain At Symphony

Mrs. Truman will have a party of guests with her in the White House box when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays the first concert of its Washington series here Thursday evening.

Conducting the program, which will open with the Star Spangled Banner, will be Charles Munch who came from France last year to succeed Serge Koussevitzky.

Boxholders from the diplomatic corps will include the conductor's countrymen, French Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet, Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Paul Schweitzer and Mr. and Mrs. Andre Visson.

Other boxholders will be the New Zealand Ambassador and Lady Berendsen, the Ambassador of the Philippines, Mr. Joaquin M. Elizalde; the Spanish Military Attache, Col. Angel G. de Mendoza and Dr. Jorge Barreiro, First Secretary of the Embassy of Uruguay.

Residential Washington will be represented by Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Edwin M. Watson, Mrs. Matthew J. Whittall, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grew, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

NOV 15 1950

Well-Guarded Truman Plans Two Public Appearances Soon

President Will Attend Symphony Concert Tomorrow Night, Democratic Women's Affair Sunday; Protection Is Greatly Increased Since Death Plot Failed

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 (AP).—President Truman, now more heavily guarded than even during wartime, will make two appearances during the next four days.

He plans to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mrs. Truman tomorrow night at Constitution Hall here. Sunday afternoon he will be guest of honor at a reception given by the Women's National Democratic Club at their clubhouse.

The White House, in announcing the schedule today, described the reception as a purely social affair at which the President would not speak.

The attempt of two fanatics to shoot him down two weeks ago have led to extraordinary precautions for Mr. Truman's safety.

In the 14 days since two Puerto Rican revolutionaries tried to shoot their way into Blair House and kill Mr. Truman, these and other steps have been taken to insure no plot upon his life could succeed:

All Traffic Barred

A block-long street closest to the White House executive offices—West Executive Avenue—has been blocked to all traffic. Exits from the old State Department building leading into that street have been sealed.

Blair House has been roped off and only those with special passes may approach nearer than the broad width of Pennsylvania Avenue, on which it fronts. The government has purchased the two adjacent buildings whose windows look down upon the President's temporary living quarters.

Swarms of uniformed and plain-clothes police and Secret Service men have been added to the White House guard. Strangers who approach get coldly appraising stares.

Liked To Walk Alone

There was a time, in his early days in the White House, when Mr Truman liked to steal away from his guards and go about his affairs without a bodyguard. His guards for instance, became nearly apoplectic when they learned once he had strolled out to the bank while they thought he was safely inside his office.

He got the idea quickly, however, and these episodes are now old history.

Since the shooting, Mr. Truman's early morning two-mile hikes, his favorite exercise, have been fewer, but he plans to attend the Army-Navy football game in Philadelphia, Dec. 2. It has not been settled whether he will spend Christmas in his home town, Independence, Mo.

The Secret Service declines to discuss what added security steps it has taken, but the presence of extra guards at points the President will pass when he moves about Washington tells the story.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1950

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTED HERE BY MUNCH AIDE

The first concert here last season by the Boston Symphony found a new conductor on the podium — Charles Munch. By an odd coincidence, the initial appearance of the orchestra in Woolsey Hall this season also displayed a "new" conductor. Mr. Munch was not able to conduct last evening's concert by the orchestra because of illness, so Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert-master, stepped into the conductor's role with great success and with no apparent change in the usual brilliance of the Boston musicians' style.

Mr. Munch became ill on Monday at the orchestra's rehearsal in Boston. He had chills and other symptoms which prompted his physician to order him to bed for a couple of days. There is still some doubt as to whether he will conduct the orchestra in its scheduled New York concert this evening. The Boston conductor reportedly is quite disturbed over his indisposition at this time, but he is extremely fortunate in having such a capable assistant-conductor and certainly will have no worries over the latter's abilities.

Mr. Burgin is no stranger to the podium. In his 30-year association with the orchestra as a first-desk violinist, he has conducted the Boston Symphony many times and also appeared as its soloist on numerous occasions over the years. His membership in the orchestra antedates the reign of Serge Koussevitzky, for last evening's conductor joined the Boston group in 1920 at the time that Pierre Monteaux assumed the director's post. Before joining one of the world's great orchestras, Mr. Burgin had won renown as a concert-master in Helsingfors and Christiana. He and Jascha Heifetz, the famous violinist, had been fellow pupils of the great Leopold Auer.

As a conductor, Mr. Burgin is not the showman on the podium that both Mr. Munch and Dr. Koussetvitzky are. He is what might be called a "straight man," with no fancy motions, though his beat is decisive and when necessary, vigorous. As a "pupil" of two conductors who lean towards bright tempos and tonal fireworks, with bright colorings and extremes in dynamics, Mr. Burgin's directing last evening provided a typical Boston program, winning him the plaudits of both the musicians and the audience.

Though Handel's Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks and Beethoven's Third Symphony were possibly the works which provided the most enjoyment in the program, the greater interest centered in two works in modern vein. These were Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, played here for the first time, and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," ballet music heard locally in Mr. Munch's appearance with the French Orchestra two years ago. The Honegger work is mild harmonically as compared with some of his extreme tonal excursions, and the more dissonant Roussel opus, predominantly rhythmic, is one of the most intriguing things that the writer has heard in some time.

Someone has said that the Boston Orchestra has everything! The statement surely includes a first-rate assistant conductor. Mr. Burgin is all of that. —G. E. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS

NOV 15 1950

Truman Rules Tomorrow On Recall of Congress

Washington, Nov. 15 (AP)—President Truman will disclose tomorrow whether he will call Congress back to session earlier than the Nov. 27 date now scheduled.

Presidential Secretary Ross said Mr. Truman will "speak for himself on that subject" at his news conference tomorrow.

The President, now even more heavily guarded than during wartime, will make two public appearances during the next four days.

He plans to attend a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mrs. Truman tomorrow night at Constitution Hall here. Sunday afternoon he will be guest of honor at a reception given by the Women's National Democratic Club.

[154]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & The Sun
NOV 16 1950

Music

Boston Symphony Opens With New French Work

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

To celebrate the Boston Symphony's first visit to New York this season, Charles Munch conducted a beautiful new work by his French compatriot, Arthur Honegger, in Carnegie Hall last night.

The score was titled simply, "Prelude, Fugue and Postlude." Behind it was an involved story of how an earlier composition written for a mythical ballet about Amphion, Jupiter and other ancient Greek solemnities was reworked by Honegger for concert purposes.

Since the score was offered last night as symphonic music, I see no point in outlining the myth of how the Muses were transformed into columns for the temple of Apollo.

Stirring Theme.

The music was a stirring fabric of instrumental themes and color. What drama there was lurked in the contrast not only of themes but of orchestral masses, the shrewdly shifting tempi serving to heighten the suspense.

One of the best uses of the alto saxophone in modern music occurs in a passage ushering in the main body of the prelude. After that comes a broad and sonorous fugue, which relaxes into the "Postlude"—a thing of quiet but unforgettable beauty.

Exalted Standards.

Mr. Munch conducted the novelty con amore, and the Bostonians performed it that way—which is the style they have accustomed us to for years. The same exalted standard held for Handel's "Royal Fireworks" music and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" ballet suite. Beethoven's "Eroica" rounded out the program.

What becomes increasingly evident in Mr. Munch's directing is his intensity. He has a way of making the whole orchestra vibrate like one string—a faculty that brings him close to those other masters of living tone—Arturo Toscanini and Dimitri Mitropoulos. One might say of the way he conducts French music that it is without trace of accent.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 16 1950

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Charles Munch; first New York concert of the season last night. The program:

Suite from Royal Fireworks Music, Handel, arr. Harty
Prelude, Fugue and Postlude.....Honegger (First New York performance)
"Bacchus et Ariane," Ballet Suite No. 2, Roussel
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Eroica"), Beethoven

Amplitude and Good Sounds

Charles Munch, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall for its first New York concert of the season, gave delight through clear readings and lovely sounds produced. He also gave a new piece and another not yet hackneyed. The beginning and the ending of his program, a Handel suite and a Beethoven symphony, were familiar, though none the less a pleasure.

* * *

The Handel suite, arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty from the Royal Fireworks music, was handsomely rendered as tone; but its metrics were lacking in strength. Tempos both slower and faster than were comfortable for the orchestra produced a vagueness of the whole expression, in fact, that seemed to your reviewer not becoming to Handel, not, in any case, a rendering of the grace and the forthrightness he is accustomed to cherish in this composer's music.

* * *

The Beethoven "Eroica," on the other hand, he found, as a performance, notable for clarity, shapeliness and a manly directness. It was not without its welcome subtleties, too; and its chord balances were unusually just, its color mixtures delicate, refined. If the whole moved forward at a leisurely pace, it moved no less relentlessly for that; and every measure was interesting. The scherzo has rarely been articulated with such exactitude, though many a conductor has played it faster. The rendering of the symphony throughout was at the same time expansive and precise, eloquent and careful, slow, loving and ever observant of the musical amenities.

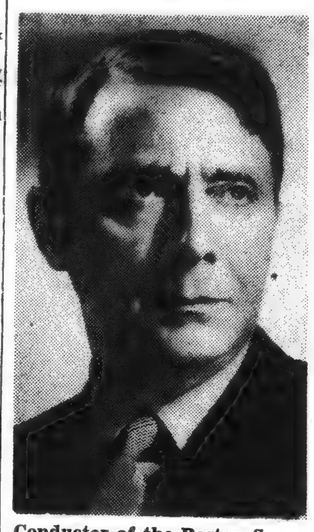
* * *

Arthur Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude, the new work of the evening, is an evocation of Baroque Protestant organ music. Its chord language is modern, its melodic material germanic of cast, its expressive tone informed with a churchly dignity. The prelude resembles somewhat (heard through a distorting mirror, of course) the free keyboard fantasias of Sebastian Bach. It is oratorical, eloquent and grandiose. The fugue subject is long and sedate. The Postlude is a calming down of everything, after the fugal developments, to a mood of meditation and utmost calm. The work has good musical thought, its good themes, serious intentions and a fine dark-hued nobility.

* * *

Albert Roussel's Second Suite from the ballet "Bacchus et Ariane" remains a tuneful and subtly colored emulation of Ravel's Daphni's et Chloé." It has alacrity, brightness of sound, solidity of form and a dazzling brilliance throughout. Why no one but Munch ever plays it I have never known. Perhaps that is just as well, for he does play it to perfection.

Charles Munch



Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 16 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Charles Munch Leads Orchestra in Seasonal Debut Here —Roussel Suite Offered

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is in the midst of its seventieth season, paid its first visit of the new musical year to New York at Carnegie Hall last night, and it indicated at once that it carries its age with no loss of vigor. Under the direction of Charles Munch, the orchestra, in fact, plays with unusual drive and ruggedness and an almost abandoned intensity.

These qualities, which seem to be a reflection of Mr. Munch's personality and musical orientation, can mean strength and weakness, depending on the music in hand. But whether the music is illuminated or driven, it is never just respectable or indifferent. It is alive; it is the natural outgrowth of the conductor's point of view.

Thus the most brilliant playing of the evening occurred in Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2, Op. 43. Mr. Munch's gift for bringing out the special colors of the woodwinds, and his fondness for whipping things—both had full and justifiable play in this piece. The closing bacchanalian pages were taken at a whirlwind pace that was breathtaking. How the string players managed to play notes so rapidly, while maintaining clarity of articulation, firmness of rhythm and unity of ensemble, will remain a mystery to some listeners. If there was any doubt that this orchestra had retained its virtuosity, here was full confirmation that it had.

In Honegger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude, which Mr. Munch and the orchestra were playing for the first time in New York, there were contrasts of delicate strands of tone in the end sections of the pieces and layers of sonority in the fugue. Here again was music up Mr. Munch's alley. As to the piece itself, it seemed harsh and aggressive, particularly in the central fugue. While there is no denying its power or the skill of its fabrication, one is not left with an overwhelming desire to hear it soon again.

The evening began with Sir Hamilton Harty's transcription of Handel's Suite from the "Music for the Royal Fireworks." The music requires sweep, and Mr. Munch provided it. But there was some roughness in the orchestral sound and in the shaping of the phrases.

Beethoven's "Eroica" occupied the second and culminating half of the program. It was performed with compelling effectiveness. Here again the tone was sometimes rough and there were certain rhetorical touches which flowed out of Mr. Munch's thoroughly consistent approach. His is a rough-hewn, dramatic "Eroica." In other hands the music may be purer and nobler, but Mr. Munch's conception has sound reasons.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
NOV 16 1950

Music...

Boston Symphony In 65th N. Y. Season

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The impressive Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 65th New York season last night in Carnegie Hall with the national anthem, followed by what might be loosely called a supplement to fireworks. Handel's "Music for the Royal Fireworks" was written to accompany the high points of a gigantic display of fireworks sponsored in 1749 by the British government in celebration of the "Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle." The lavish illumination was such a novelty in those days that it was the topic of conversation for months and drew a crowd of 12,000. Last night the score played to a sold-out house—if in numbers slightly less than 3,000.

Its festive character served as well to open a 20th century indoor concert series as it apparently had served the 18th century for an outdoor spectacle. The music was joyous but never bombastic. Fortunately, Handel left the latter to the fireworks proper. The bright timbre of the visiting ensemble also suited the piece well.

Charles Munch, music director of the ensemble, followed this music by the first New York performance of Honegger's "Prelude, Fugue and Postlude." Completed in 1948, this suite is a reworking of an earlier work, a ballet written for a stage piece by Paul Valery. The story of the older piece was built around the character of Amphion, the son of Jupiter and Antiope. But this is unimportant. Honegger's music is poignantly convincing on its sound-merits alone.

The dynamic Munch gave this piece and also Roussel's ballet, second suite, "Bachus et Ariane," expert performances. The evening closed with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Boston Plays Tomorrow in Bklyn

At the Academy of Music in Brooklyn tomorrow night and in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon the orchestra features the first local performances of Martinu's Third Piano Concerto with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
NOV 17 1950

Trumans Attend Capital Concert

Washington—(AP)—President Truman attended a symphony concert Thursday night—his first social night out since the Nov. 1 attempt on his life.

He and Mrs. Truman attended the Boston Symphony's concert in heavily-guarded Constitution hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
NOV 17 1950

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENTERTAINS PRESIDENT — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chats with President and Mrs. Truman after they attended concert in Washington's Constitution Hall. It was the President's first social night out since the abortive attempt on his life by two Puerto Rican fanatics.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 16 1950

Boston Symphony at Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Two stirring performances marked the opening of the Boston Symphony's 65th season in New York in Carnegie Hall last night. One of them introduced Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude. The other revealed Charles Munch's humble identification with Beethoven's Eroica Symphony.

Though derived from the ballet score Amphion of 20 years standing, the Honegger music may be considered absolute by nature of its formal character as well as by its content.

It is an absorbing work from its striking opening chords through the ethereal quality of the postlude. Played with intense devotion last night, it won definite response from the audience.

Interest naturally centered on Munch's interpretation of the Eroica. He played it straight. In so doing he let Beethoven shine through his music in unmistakable terms.

Another French work was included in the program: Roussel's Second Suite from the ballet Bacchus et Ariane. It is attractive programmatic music, tastefully stylized, admirably written, and entertaining.

[155]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

News of Music

Trumans Attend as Munch Conducts Bostonians in Concert

By Alice Eversman

President and Mrs. Truman headed the distinguished audience that gathered in Constitution Hall last night for the first concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch, the orchestra's eminent new conductor, was given a cordial welcome on his entrance, followed by prolonged applause when the President and his party entered their box. As announced in the program, the National Anthem was played, specifically as [illegible] the orchestra's 17th season.

Mr. Munch's long tenure of office as conductor of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire in Paris and his intimate acquaintance with the music of his adopted country made the inclusion of Honegger's "Prelude, Fugue and Postlude," and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Second Suite, in the program, of special interest. It would mean as correct a presentation of these works as could be had by a man steeped in the modern French style and who, almost certainly, knows Honegger personally and probably knew Roussel, before his death.

He utilized all the fine skill of the Boston musicians to present the Honegger work at its best. It is a noisy, hard-wrought composition that has only a few flashes of real inspiration. When this operates, as in the Postlude with its quite ending, the writing flows effectively but in other places, its hard texture overshadows the ideas. Exception can be made of the Fugue, with its intriguing theme and climax.

There is always, in Roussel's music, a particular luminosity and the glimpse of bright vistas. From the opening viola and violin solos, depicting the awakening of Ariane, to the final Bacchanale, the music achieves its descriptiveness in a gladsome way in spite of its modern speech. Both numbers were vociferously applauded, although the wide differences between them should have been apparent in the reception.

At that, it probably was more Mr. Munch's directing that was applauded than the compositions themselves. His frenetic manner of building up climaxes is communicative. Why he feels that such long experienced musicians as those of the Boston Symphony need to be prodded and violently urged to greater effort is hard to understand. He is a man evidently of vast energy who cannot make haste slowly or draw forth sonorous volume without great personal exertion. The effect is not always felicitous, even with these routined players. His urgency for ever quicker tempi results in that kind of precipitate playing that leaves a feeling of unrest in the listener.

There are few moments of restfulness in Mr. Munch's conducting. It was more apparent throughout the Suite from Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music" with which the program opened and which received the most poised reading. As a musician of unquestionable distinction, the conductor has keen insight into the properties resulting from the balanced orchestral voices and the value of strongly contrasted dynamics. He found a more sympathetic medium to his particular approach in the virility and ruggedness of Beethoven, whose "Eroica" Symphony brought the concert to a close.

It was presented in a clear-cut reading of admirable breadth. The splendor of sound the Boston Orchestra musicians produce gave nobility to the first movement. If the Funeral March was dryly solemn and without the poignancy usually sought for, and the Scherzo rather matter-of-factly stated, the concept, on the whole, was of an elevated order. There was plenty of enthusiasm expressed during the program by the capacity audience.

NOV. 17, 1950
WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

The President Couldn't Quarrel With the Handel

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch at Constitution Hall last night was thrilling enough for one evening.

But the packed house had the additional excitement of seeing President and Mrs. Truman in their first public appearance together since the Blair House assassination attempt two weeks ago.

With them in presidential box 13 were Comdr. and Mrs. B. Harrison Lingo and their daughter Jane who is an old schoolmate of Margaret Truman. Miss Truman was busy on her singing tour.

The President's visit brought to the hall probably the largest contingent of Secret Service men the place has ever seen.

Posted at each entrance and on the stairs near box 13 that led to the upper seats as well as in the audience itself, the Secret Service men didn't relax for a second. They sprang to alert attention when a photographer's bulb exploded for a "shot" of the President greeting Mr. Munch before the concert.

Mr. Truman amused, made a wisecrack about Communists.

The President's first meeting with the German-born Charles Munch was handicapped by the conductor's poor English. They exchanged only a few halting sentences.

As the presidential party entered the hall there was a flash of applause that gave way to the orchestra's playing of the Star Spangled Banner. After that, the show belonged entirely to Mr. Munch.

With the opening work—the Handel Royal Fireworks Suite—it became apparent that the Boston Symphony is still the virtuoso instrument it was under Serge Koussevitzky. None of the rich tonal beauty or the impeccable phrasing has been lost in the transition to Mr. Munch.

The President could certainly have had no quarrel with the Handel or the tremendous Beethoven "Eroica" that closed the program.

He might have had a few mental reservations about the rest of the program — Honneger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite.

For one thing, these two modern works were in too much the same vein. For another, it was the sort of angular and subjective approach that Mr. Truman finds so distasteful in modern art. At any rate he must have at least enjoyed the way Mr. Munch and the orchestra performed them.

MILTON BERLINER

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 17 1950

Postlude

First Munch Concert Heard Here

By Paul Hume

President and Mrs. Truman paid their first visit of the season to Constitution Hall last night.

So did the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its [illegible] conductor, Charles Munch.

The president's party occupied its usual box, number 13. And as usual, orchestra and conductor contented themselves with the enlarged stage.

There are always Secret Service men in attendance when the President goes to a concert. But last night, since it was the President's first concert after the attempted assassination two weeks ago, his bodyguard was more in evidence than usual.

More than one music critic sat next to a model of polite, strong-armed protection. I asked one guard how many Secret Service men were in the hall and he said very cordially, but with a voice of steel, "You'd better ask the boss."

Asked for an opinion about the concert, he said, just as briefly, "Very nice." Which is all right with me. He was doing his job, and an important one. And he let the audience do theirs.

The full house may have been a problem to the presidential guard. But to the orchestra and conductor it must have been a pure joy. The applause after every work on the program is the sort of thing musicians live on.

Handel's Royal Fireworks Suite started things off with a flourish. If Munch likes to take the allegro in the overture much faster than it should go, he has players who can keep up with him. The rest could not have been better.

A Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Honegger was the only real novelty on the program, though Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane Suite has been heard only once before.

Honegger's Prelude is a wonderful bit of sonority never sacrificed to clarity. More impressive than the rest of the work, it is forgotten under the weight of the ponderous fugue. The Postlude merely draws a pleasant veil over the real close of the work, which occurs with the ending of the fugue.

Roussel's suite was premiered here by Munch several seasons back, when he conducted his French National Orchestra. It is every bit as handsome a work in content and construction as it then seemed. It was played with the greatest beauty of the evening. Mr. de Pasquale's viola opened it with exemplary elegance.

Beethoven's third, the Eroica, symphony closed the concert. The first and third movements were well handled by both conductor and orchestra. The violins control a precision within phrases that is thrilling. They do not always arrive at the beginning of a phrase together. This remains as true of them under Munch as it was under Koussevitsky.

The funeral march was seriously weakened by Munch's constant fiddling with tempos. It is not out of order to vary the tempo between sections of this famous passage. But to hold back here, and pick up there in the very midst of its moving phrases robs the entire movement of its true gravity.

This sort of thing is not left up to the conductor by the composer. It is a conductor superimposing his will upon the directions of the composer. It is disappointing to see Munch take his position on the side of those who prefer their interpretation to that of Beethoven.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 17 1950

Society

Box Guests Listed For Boston Symphony

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open this evening with a capacity audience in attendance to welcome Charles Munch, the conductor, and the orchestra.

There will be many box parties. Mrs. William H. Good in Box 1 will entertain Official Referee and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Official Referee and Mrs. George E. Brower.

In Box 2 will be the guests of Friends School, including Miss Ruth Korzenik, Miss Ann Adler, Miss Marna Press, Edward Murray, Philip Schwartz, David Bernstein and Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hermann. Box 3 will be occupied by guests of Berkeley Institute.

Seated in Box 4 will be a group of children from the Brooklyn Home for Children and their chaperone, Miss Betsy Brown, who will be guests of Mrs. Darwin R. James Jr. The children who will attend are pupils of Louis Pietrini of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, who volunteers his services as music instructor.

Seated in Box 5 will be alumnae of Adelphi Academy: Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest; Mrs. William B. Parker and her guest, Mrs. Cornelius Hearn Jr., and Mrs. Augusta Uhlich and her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Workman.

Officers from the United States Army Station at Fort Hamilton will be present in Box 7 as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and seated in Box 8 will be the blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who will attend as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The program will consist of the Symphony No. 3 by the contemporary American composer, David Diamond, the Piano Concerto No. 3 by Bohuslav Martinu, and the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck. Rudolf Firkusny will be the soloist in the concerto.

The series is presented each season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in co-operation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 17 1950

Boston Music Writer

John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has edited "Letters of Richard Wagner: The Burrell Collection" for December publication by Macmillan.

The Wagner letters and documents, collected in the 19th Century by Mary Burrell, were closely guarded for many years and made unavailable for study.

The collection of 840 items was bought by Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist in 1931 and placed at the disposal of music experts. A majority of the letters have not been published.

NICHOLAS ZOOK.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX
TIMES

Truman Has First Night Out Since Murder Try

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17. (AP)—President Truman attended a symphony concert last night — his first social night out since the Nov. 1 attempt on his life.

He and Mrs. Truman attended the Boston Symphony's concert in heavily-guarded Constitution Hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

Trumans Applaud Boston Symphony Concert Program

By the United Press

Washington

President Truman forgot the world's problems long enough Nov. 16 to enjoy a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Mr. and Mrs. Truman's first public appearance together since the Nov. 1 assassination attempt on the President.

Secret service agents surrounded the President as he chatted with Conductor Charles Munch, and the 20-man force jumped to attention when a photographer's flash bulb suddenly exploded.

Mr. Truman shrugged off the agents' concern with a smile.

It was the Boston Symphony's first Washington engagement under Mr. Munch's baton. He took over when Serge Koussevitzky retired.

The President applauded enthusiastically as Mr. Munch took five bows at the end of the program. Mr. Munch bowed toward Mr. Truman several times. Mr. Munch said later he was "honored" to have met Mr. Truman.

The Trumans shared their box in Constitution Hall with Cmdr. and Mrs. B. Harrison Lingo and their daughter, Jane. Miss Lingo is an old school friend of Margaret Truman. Miss Truman did not attend because of singing engagements.

BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
NOV 17 1950

Washington Whirl'

No. 13 Scares Mrs. Truman

By AUSTINE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17—Box No. 13 doesn't raise a hair on Bess Truman's head . . . She'll be sitting there tonight happy and far from the frightened in Constitution Hall, listening to the Boston Symphony's opening . . . In fact, the White House ALWAYS holds tickets for Box 13 . . . I telephoned Mrs. Helm at the White House to find out WHY, but as that estimable social secretary was out of town I talked to two other people, Helm at the White House to find out WHY, but as that estimable social secretary was out of town I talked to two other people, neither of whom had a clue . . . Finally nailed down a Mr. Tolley in Mrs. Helm's office . . . Far back as he could remember the Trumans had Box 13 tickets, and apparently never felt the least superstitious . . . The Daughters of the American Revolution, who control the Hall, advised me that they gave the White House that box . . . Not because they wanted to put the curse on anybody but because this box is in a good position to see and be seen, and yet is close to the D Street exit . . . Secret Service men could whisk presidents in and out with ease and safety.

Occupational diseases such as Fancy-Food-'n-Drink Indigestion and Receiving-Line Feet plague most ambasasdors but Norway's Ambassador Wilhelm de Morgensteirne has built up immunity over the years . . . And he's far from a spring chicken . . . He still gets a bang instead of a backache out of his job . . . To some it might be an official chore but to him it's a real jamboree, entertaining their Royal Highnesses Prince Olav and Princess Martha of Norway, who arrive on a private visit to the U. S. this Sunday

[156]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

News of Music

Trumans Attend as Munch Conducts Bostonians in Concert

By Alice Eversman

President and Mrs. Truman headed the distinguished audience that gathered in Constitution Hall last night for the first concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch, the orchestra's eminent new conductor, was given a cordial welcome on his entrance, followed by further applause when the President and his party entered their box. As announced in the program, the National Anthem was then played, specifically stated as opening the orchestra's 17th season.

Mr. Munch's long tenure of office as conductor of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire in Paris and his intimate acquaintance with the music of his adopted country, made the inclusion of Honegger's "Prelude, Fugue and Postlude," and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Second Suite, in the program, of special interest. It would mean as correct a presentation of these works as could be had by a man steeped in the modern French style and who, almost certainly, knows Honegger personally and probably knew Roussel, before his death.

He utilized all the fine skill of the Boston musicians to present the Honegger work at its best. It is a noisy, hard-wrought composition that has only a few flashes of real inspiration. When this operates, as in the Postlude with its quite ending, the writing flows effectively but in other places, its hard texture overshadows the ideas. Exception can be made of the Fugue, with its intriguing theme and climax.

There is always, in Roussel's music, a particular luminosity and the glimpse of bright vistas. From the opening viola and violin solos, depicting the awakening of Ariane, to the final Bacchanale, the music achieves its descriptiveness in a gladsome way in spite of its modern speech. Both numbers were vociferously applauded, although the wide differences between them should have been apparent in the reception.

At that, it probably was more Mr. Munch's directing that was applauded than the compositions themselves. His frenetic manner of building up climaxes is communicative. Why he feels that such long experienced musicians as those of the Boston Symphony need to be prodded and violently urged to greater effort is hard to understand. He is a man evidently of vast energy who cannot make haste slowly or draw forth sonorous volume without great personal exertion. The effect is not always felicitous, even with these routined players. His urgency for ever quicker tempi results in that kind of precipitate playing that leaves a feeling of unrest in the listener.

There are few moments of restfulness in Mr. Munch's conducting. It was more apparent throughout the Suite from Handel's "Royal Fireworks Music" with which the program opened and which received the most poised reading. As a musician of unquestionable distinction, the conductor has keen insight into the properties resulting from the balanced orchestral voices and the value of strongly contrasted dynamics. He found a more sympathetic medium to his particular approach in the virility and ruggedness of Beethoven, whose "Eroica" Symphony brought the concert to a close.

It was presented in a clear-cut reading of admirable breadth. The splendor of sound the Boston Orchestra musicians produce gave nobility to the first movement. If the Funeral March was dryly solemn and without the poignancy usually sought for, and the Scherzo rather matter-of-factly stated, the concept, on the whole, was of an elevated order. There was plenty of enthusiasm expressed during the program by the capacity audience.

NOV. 17, 1950
WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

The President Couldn't Quarrel With the Handel

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch at Constitution Hall last night was thrilling enough for one evening.

But the packed house had the additional excitement of seeing President and Mrs. Truman in their first public appearance together since the Blair House assassination attempt two weeks ago.

With them in presidential box 13 were Comdr. and Mrs. B. Harrison Lingo and their daughter Jane who is an old schoolmate of Margaret Truman. Miss Truman was busy on her singing tour.

The President's visit brought to the hall probably the largest contingent of Secret Service men the place has ever seen.

Posted at each entrance and on the stairs near box 13 that led to the upper seats as well as in the audience itself, the Secret Service men didn't relax for a second. They sprang to alert attention when a photographer's bulb exploded for a "shot" of the President greeting Mr. Munch before the concert.

Mr. Truman amused, made a wisecrack about Communists.

The President's first meeting with the German-born Charles Munch was handicapped by the conductor's poor English. They exchanged only a few halting sentences.

As the presidential party entered the hall there was a flash of applause that gave way to the orchestra's playing of the Star Spangled Banner. After that, the show belonged entirely to Mr. Munch.

With the opening work—the Handel Royal Fireworks Suite—it became apparent that the Boston Symphony is still the virtuoso instrument it was under Serge Koussevitzky. None of the rich tonal beauty or the impeccable phrasing has been lost in the transition to Mr. Munch.

The President could certainly have had no quarrel with the Handel or the tremendous Beethoven "Eroica" that closed the program.

He might have had a few mental reservations about the rest of the program — Honneger's Prelude, Fugue and Postlude and Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite.

For one thing, these two modern works were in too much the same vein. For another, it was the sort of angular and subjective approach that Mr. Truman finds so distasteful in modern art. At any rate he must have at least enjoyed the way Mr. Munch and the orchestra performed them.

MILTON BERLINER

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
NOV 17 1950

Postlude

First Munch Concert Heard Here

By Paul Hume

President and Mrs. Truman paid their first visit of the season to Constitution Hall last night.

So did the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its [redacted] conductor, Charles Munch.

The president's party occupied its usual box, number 13. And as usual, orchestra and conductor contented themselves with the enlarged stage.

There are always Secret Service men in attendance when the President goes to a concert. But last night, since it was the President's first concert after the attempted assassination two weeks ago, his bodyguard was more in evidence than usual.

More than one music critic sat next to a model of polite, strong-armed protection. I asked one guard how many Secret Service men were in the hall and he said very cordially, but with a voice of steel, "You'd better ask the boss."

Asked for an opinion about the concert, he said, just as briefly, "Very nice." Which is all right with me. He was doing his job and an important one. And he let the audience do theirs.

The full house may have been a problem to the presidential guard. But to the orchestra and conductor it must have been a pure joy. The applause after every work on the program is the sort of thing musicians live on.

Handel's Royal Fireworks Suite started things off with a flourish. If Munch likes to take the allegro in the overture much faster than it should go, he has players who can keep up with him. The rest could not have been better.

A Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Honegger was the only real novelty on the program, though Roussel's Bacchus and Ariane Suite has been heard only once before.

Honegger's Prelude is a wonderful bit of sonority never sacrificed to clarity. More impressive than the rest of the work, it is forgotten under the weight of the ponderous fugue. The Postlude merely draws a pleasant veil over the real close of the work, which occurs with the ending of the fugue.

Roussel's suite was premiered here by Munch several seasons back, when he conducted his French National Orchestra. It is every bit as handsome a work in content and construction as it then seemed. It was played with the greatest beauty of the evening. Mr. de Pasquale's viola opened it with exemplary elegance.

Beethoven's third, the Eroica, symphony closed the concert. The first and third movements were well handled by both conductor and orchestra. The violins control a precision within phrases that is thrilling. They do not always arrive at the beginning of a phrase together. This remains as true of them under Munch as it was under Koussevitsky.

The funeral march was seriously weakened by Munch's constant fiddling with tempos. It is not out of order to vary the tempo between sections of this famous passage. But to hold back here and pick up there in the very midst of its moving phrases robs the entire movement of its true gravity.

This sort of thing is not left up to the conductor by the composer. It is a conductor superimposing his will upon the directions of the composer. It is disappointing to see Munch take his position on the side of those who prefer their interpretation to that of Beethoven.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 17 1950

Society

Box Guests Listed For Boston Symphony

The Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open this evening with a capacity audience in attendance to welcome Charles Munch, the conductor, and the orchestra.

There will be many box parties. Mrs. William H. Good in Box 1 will entertain Official Referee and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport and Official Referee and Mrs. George E. Brower.

In Box 2 will be the guests of Friends School, including Miss Ruth Korzenik, Miss Ann Adler, Miss Marna Press, Edward Murray, Philip Schwartz, David Bernstein and Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hermann. Box 3 will be occupied by guests of Berkeley Institute.

Seated in Box 4 will be a group of children from the Brooklyn Home for Children and their chaperone, Miss Betsy Brown, who will be guests of Mrs. Darwin R. James Jr. The children who will attend are pupils of Louis Pietrini of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, who volunteers his services as music instructor.

Seated in Box 5 will be alumnae of Adelphi Academy: Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest; Mrs. William B. Parker and her guest, Mrs. Cornelius Hearn Jr., and Mrs. Augusta Uhlich and her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Workman.

Officers from the United States Army Station at Fort Hamilton will be present in Box 7 as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and seated in Box 8 will be the blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who will attend as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The program will consist of the Symphony No. 3 by the contemporary American composer, David Diamond, the Piano Concerto No. 3 by Bohuslav Martinu, and the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck. Rudolf Firkusny will be the soloist in the concerto.

The series is presented each season under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in co-operation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 17 1950

Boston Music Writer

John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has edited "Letters of Richard Wagner: The Burrell Collection" for December publication by Macmillan.

The Wagner letters and documents, collected in the 19th Century by Mary Burrell, were closely guarded for many years and made unavailable for study.

The collection of 840 items was bought by Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist in 1931 and placed at the disposal of music experts. A majority of the letters have not been published.

NICHOLAS ZOOK.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX
TIMES
NOV 17 1950

Truman Has First Night Out Since Murder Try

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17. (AP)—President Truman attended a symphony concert last night — his first social night out since the Nov. 1 attempt on his life.

He and Mrs. Truman attended the Boston Symphony's concert in heavily-guarded Constitution Hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

Trumans Applaud Boston Symphony Concert Program

By the United Press

Washington

President Truman forgot the world's problems long enough Nov. 16 to enjoy a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Mr. and Mrs. Truman's first public appearance together since the Nov. 1 assassination attempt on the President.

Secret service agents surrounded the President as he chatted with Conductor Charles Münch, and the 20-man force jumped to attention when a photographer's flash bulb suddenly exploded.

Mr. Truman shrugged off the agents' concern with a smile.

It was the Boston Symphony's first Washington engagement under Mr. Munch's baton. He took over when Serge Koussevitzky retired.

The President applauded enthusiastically as Mr. Münch took five bows at the end of the program. Mr. Münch bowed toward Mr. Truman several times. Mr. Münch said later he was "honored" to have met Mr. Truman.

The Trumans shared their box in Constitution Hall with Cmdr. and Mrs. B. Harrison Lingo and their daughter, Jane. Miss Lingo is an old school friend of Margaret Truman. Miss Truman did not attend because of singing engagements.

BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
NOV 17 1950

Washington Whirl'

No. 13 Scares Mrs. Truman

By AUSTINE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17—Box No. 13 doesn't raise a hair on Bess Truman's head . . . She'll be sitting there tonight happy and far from the frightened in Constitution Hall, listening to the Boston Symphony's opening . . . In fact, the White House ALWAYS holds tickets for Box 13 . . . I telephoned Mrs. Helm at the White House to find out WHY, but as that estimable social secretary was out of town I talked to two other people, Helm at the White House to find out WHY, but as that estimable social secretary was out of town I talked to two other people, neither of whom had a clue . . . Finally nailed down a Mr. Tolley in Mrs. Helm's office . . . Far back as he could remember the Trumans had Box 13 tickets, and apparently never felt the least superstitious . . . The Daughters of the American Revolution, who control the Hall, advised me that they gave the White House that box . . . Not because they wanted to put the curse on anybody but because this box is in a good position to see and be seen, and yet is close to the D Street exit . . . Secret Service men could whisk presidents in and out with ease and safety.

Occupational diseases such as Fancy-Food-'n-Drink Indigestion and Receiving-Line Feet plague most ambasasdors but Norway's Ambassador Wilhelm de Morgensteirne has built up immunity over the years . . . And he's far from a spring chicken . . . He still gets a bang instead of a backache out of his job . . . To some it might be an official chore but to him it's a real jamboree, entertaining their Royal Highnesses Prince Olav and Princess Martha of Norway, who arrive on a private visit to the U. S. this Sunday

[156]

Washington Times-Herald
Nov. 17, 1950

Munch, Boston Sympony Give Notable Recital

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The President and Mrs. Truman, their guests, Comdr B. Harrison Lingo, Mrs. Lingo and their daughter, Jane, together with thirty-eight hundred other music lovers, heard the Boston Symphony in its first concert of the season last night in Constitution hall.

Because of the recent attempt upon the President's life the most extraordinary precautions were taken. There were heavy guards of secret service men and police. Traffic was rerouted. So the concert began late but observed the usual ritual. The National Anthem was played when the Presidential party entered their box, No. 13.

Program Under Way

Whereupon the music-making began with another and better example of English music, Sir Hamilton Harty's version of Handel's "Royal Fire Works" suite.

The Boston Symphony has not languished under the new conductor, Charles Munch, Alsatian-French artist. In fact to these experienced ears it seems to have advanced, notably in the vital matter of the string choir's tone. This, as many experienced listeners agree, is the finest to be heard at the moment in American concert halls.

This string tone has nobility. It retains its quality in every degree of power, never substituting shrillness for true brilliance nor losing vitality in the softest inflections. It is not a sentimental tone. It has none of the excessive vibrato that results in the oily sonority called schmalz in the jargon of the fiddlers.

Symphonic Theater

Munch, as Washington learned last season when he brought the Orchestre National de France to Constitution hall, is master of symphonic theater. He knows how to create the orchestral drama that is so varied and so exciting. This tonal pageantry last night began with contrasts of vigor and delicacy that made the Handel-Harty page an arresting exhibit.

It continued with the still more rugged and varied Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude by Honegger, French modernist who blends bewildering dissonance with strong melody. The next act in the pageant, to continue the simile, brought the little known music of Roussel to the first complete realization of a new personality in the art. Toscanini tried his hand at this French composer with slight success. Munch knows this elusive art better.

Interesting Contrast

The contrast between Honegger and Roussel is interesting. Both are completely Gallic. Honegger is virile, aggressive, an epic poet. Roussel began the "Bacchus et Ariane" suite with tonal cobwebs that grew ever stronger and weightier until the whole expression ended in a vortex of swift and intoxicating movement. Evidently there is more in these Roussel scores than a literalist such as Toscanini can discern.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Eroica," the symphony he is said to have regarded as his best. Again Munch is no literalist. Without slighting any essential of the Beethoven tradition he contrived a freedom in his address, a flexibility of tempo as well of dynamics which quite renewed the noble and ancient work.

The public paid extravagant tribute to the conductor and his men.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
NOV 17 1950

President And Wife Hear Hub Symphony

Washington, Nov. 16. (UP) — President and Mrs. Truman attended a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight in their first public appearance together since the assassination attempt against the President two weeks ago.

The Blair House shooting apparently was on the mind of the President's guards as he greeted visiting conductor Charles Munch. A photographer's flash bulb exploded, and the 20-man secret service guard leapt to startled attention.

Mr. Truman dismissed the incident with a smile, a shrug, and a wisecrack about Communists.

New Yorker Staatzeitung & Herold Nov. 17, 1950

Aus der Musikwelt

Von FRED LOW

Boston Symphonie eröffnet die Saison

Charles Munch dirigierte das erste New Yorker Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters in dieser Saison am Mittwoch abend in der Carnegie Hall. Seine Programmauswahl berücksichtigte ebenso die konservativen Hörer mit Beethovens "Eroica" und Händels Feuerwerkmusik, wie die Freunde moderner Kompositionen mit Roussels "Bacchus und Ariane"-Suite und Honeggers "Prelude, Fuge und Postlude". Die Suite aus der "Musik für das königliche Feuerwerk" ist der Komposition entnommen, die Händel anläßlich der Unterzeichnung des Friedensvertrages 1748 als Begleitmusik zu einem gigantischen Feuerwerk geschrieben hat. Das Feuerwerk versagte — nach Berichten von Zeitgenossen —, aber die Musik Händels hatte solchen Anklang gefunden, daß sie bald darauf in einem Wohltätigkeitskonzert wiederholt werden mußte.

Die Boston Symphonie spielte das Werk klangschön, die mehrstimmigen Trompetenthemen des zweiten Satzes, die getragenen Melodien der Cantilene und der straffe Rhythmus des Menuetts kamen in der Interpretation des Dirigenten zu allerbester Wirkung.

Charles Munch hat die Uraufführung der Ballettsuite "Bacchus und Ariane" 1936 in Paris geleitet, die Suite ist dem gleichnamigen Ballett entnommen, das bereits 1931 in der Pariser Oper aufgeführt worden war. Der Dirigent hat nach dem großen Erfolg der Erstaufführung das Werk in seinem Repertoire behalten; der Erfolg ist ihm auch im Mittwoch-Konzert treu geblieben. Die Soloviola, prachtvoll gespielt, stimmt das Thema an, das von der Geige übernommen wird, der Hörer bleibt bis zum Schlußtakt im Bann der dynamisch und rhythmisch effektvollen Komposition, die von dem ausgezeichnet disponierten Orchester brillant wiedergegeben wurde.

Vorher gelangte "Prelude, Fugue und Postlude" von Honegger zur New Yorker Erstaufführung, ein Werk, in dem der Esprit dominiert; die Instrumentation ist farbenfreudig, der Orchesterklang hervorragend. Der Schluß kommt überraschend mit einer zarten, getragenen Weise des Fagotts, von Harfenakkorden sekundiert.

Charles Munch brachte im zweiten Teil des Programms die "Eroica"-Symphonie Beethovens; der erste Satz animiert, das Tempo, wie bei allen romanischen Dirigenten etwas rascher als gewöhnlich, das Scherzo aber eher etwas verhalten, mit unvergleichlicher Präzision im Rhythmus. Auch der Trauermarsch war bis auf einige stringendo Stellen mehr zurückhaltend, doch mächtig im Aufbau der dramatischen Themen. Charles Munch interpretiert die klassischen Werke nicht immer streng traditionell; die Wiedergabe ist aber durchwegs transparent und klar, die Komposition ersteht plastisch vor dem Hörer. Das Orchester spielte hervorragend, die Einheitlichkeit des Zusammenspiels der Streicher ist bewundernswert.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 18 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony Gives Fine Concert But Program Selections Dim Luster

Since Charles Munch took over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Brooklyn has been allowed to come of age musically. Last night's concert at the Academy of Music, the orchestra's first here this season, was a case in point. Instead of getting a watered-down pop concert, as used to be the case, we were given a preview of the program the orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall this afternoon. This comprised the Third Symphony of David Diamond, the first New York performance of the Piano Concerto No. 3 by the contemporary Czech-American composer, Bohuslav Martinu, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

We don't want to complain; we're mighty glad that Munch and his players consider us grown-up enough to hear new music along with the old and familiar, but last night's choices were poor ones for any program—be it at the Academy of Music, Carnegie Hall or Boston's own Symphony Hall.

Lacks Sufficient Contrast

The Diamond Symphony, like its more illustrious model by Franck, is in a sort of cyclical form, with two principal themes treated in different forms throughout the five movements. There is much skillful writing from the purely technical standpoint, with some fine handling of the thematic material, some spirited rhythms and some excellent counterpoint. What the work lacks is sufficient contrast within each movement. The composer sets forth his idea at the beginning, then proceeds to develop it contrapuntally, ad nauseum, until the movement ends. Everything is the same; even the dynamic range is limited. Of course, some of the shortcomings of the work stood out in bold relief, owing to the fact that neither the conductor nor his musicians seemed too familiar with the symphony. There was little attempt at interpretation, and far too many false entrances and wrong notes.

Pale Version of Brahms

We have always admired the music of Martinu, and have felt that it is not performed frequently enough. Perhaps that is why this new Third Concerto came as such a shock, for there is practically no original writing in the entire score. It is Brahms from beginning to end. Practically every familiar melodic, harmonic and rhythmic cliche of Brahms is included in the course of the Concerto's three movements. Since these are not put together as skillfully as Brahms would have done it, the work comes off as a pretty pale version of late—and sometimes early—19th century music. Even the scoring lacks inventiveness. The burden of the work falls to the strings, and when an accent is required, even at a calm moment, the composer rings in a cymbal crash.

Applauded by Audience

The writing for the solo piano is also quite conservative. Firkusny may like it—or may have to like it—because it was written especially for him. But it gave him little opportunity to display his pianistic prowess, though what he had to do he did well. The generally pleasing, if ineffective, sounds of the Concerto evidently pleased the capacity audience, for its applause was loud and long.

It has been two seasons or more since we last heard Munch conduct the Franck Symphony, and we are gratified to report that he has modified his interpretation considerably, all to the advantage of the music. He has slowed down his tempi and broadened his whole conception of the work. As a result, we were treated to an eloquent, dramatic and sensitive account of this popular score.

Woodwinds Improved

Munch has done tricks with his orchestra, too. A few changes of personnel have improved and strengthened the woodwind section notably, and though the brasses still have a somewhat harsh sound, they have been toned down and made to blend more effectively with the rest of the ensemble. The whole orchestra plays with somewhat less sheen than it did in former seasons, but it has a more youthful, more enthusiastic approach to what it performs. It will be interesting to listen for further developments in this famous orchestra, which is now celebrating its 17th season.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
NOV 18 1950

Rehearsals Opened To Students in Boston

Boston.—A new experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, this month. The final rehearsal of the week was thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, due to a completely subscribed season. The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. These rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony which are far from sufficient for present demands.

Mr. Munch appeared in the loose jacket and crepe-soled lounging shoes which he wears at rehearsals, and many of the orchestra members were in shirt sleeves. According to one newspaper report: "Blazing sweaters turned the floor of the hall into a many-hued rug from above," this in contrast to the formal attire of the customary Bostonian subscription audience.

Yehudi Menuhin, who was to be the soloist of the weekend concerts

Student tickets for the five Boston Symphony rehearsals Nov. 19, Dec. 14, Jan. 24, Mar. 1, April 26 are still available. Students of music schools and upper grade schools are eligible. Tickets can be obtained by calling Norman S. Shirk at CO 6-1492.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST Herald
NOV 18 1950

President Attends Symphony Concert

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17 (U.P.) — President Truman forgot the world's problems long enough last night to enjoy a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was Mr. and Mrs. Truman's first public appearance together since the Nov. 1 attempt on the President's life.

Secret Service agents surrounded the President as he chatted with Conductor Charles Munch, and the 20-man force jumped to attention when a photographer's flash bulb suddenly exploded.

NEWARK, N.J
AFRO AMERICAN
11/18/50

Boston Symphony to Open Winter Concert Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Griffith Music Foundation's winter season of symphonic concerts at the Mosque Theatre, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. The conductor will be Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It will be the first of two concerts which the Boston group will give in this symphonic series. Their second concert, on Feb. 15 will be conducted by Charles Munch, who last season succeeded Koussevitzky as director of the famous orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 19 1950

BOSTONIANS OFFER MARTINU CONCERTO

Firkusny Is Piano Soloist for Local Premiere of Third— Munch Leads Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The first performance in this city of Bohuslav Martinu's Third Piano concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny as the soloist, was given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, in Carnegie Hall.

This concerto has a special history, which affects the character of its music. For Mr. Martinu was at work upon the last movement when the news reach him of the death of Jan Masaryk in Czechoslovakia. The lilt of the jazz rhythms and melodic ideas, which are not those of folk song, but emanate from a Czech composer, are interrupted by a climax and a pause, and the end of the movement, which has been one of music-making in the classic ideal of music, form, design, for their own sake, changes. The accent is for the moment tragical, after which the swift finale resumes its course, with an end which is defiant, almost martial—pro patria. Schumann said that rebellion can be concealed in the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser.

Flavor of Czech Idioms

Aside from this, at an initial hearing, the concerto revealed itself as a work of the soundest craftsmanship and essential sincerity of musical thinking. There is now and again the flavor of Czech national idioms, though no approach to the quotation of folksong. The piano part is very fully written, with special demands upon the virtuoso, yet it is an integral part of the symphonic structure.

Mr. Martinu was fortunate in his interpreters; in the collaboration of Mr. Munch and Mr. Firkusny, who was a host in himself at the solo instrument, now blending into the orchestral ensemble, now leading with all appropriate authority and fire. At the end of this performance composer, pianist and conductor were called back repeatedly to the stage, and the orchestra rose in their honor.

David Diamond, whose Third Symphony opened the program, had a similar reception. His symphony is a very thoughtful approach to the form. To our mind its central ideas, which are spread in various manipulations over many pages—are too few for a symphony in three movements of sub-divisions—resources of [illegible]. Apparently also he intended to keep the orchestra down to well-holstered simplicities. For what ever reason, however, the [illegible] so much the other works [illegible] over-all sameness of color, mostly the string color, [illegible] broken up by dramatic [illegible] tions of brass. The movement means most to us in the [illegible] movement, which has much [illegible]

Franck Symphony Played

Mr. Munch closed the [illegible] with a memorable, indeed overwhelming, performance of Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor. He communicated the mystical, incomparable [illegible] quivering sensibility, glow [illegible] and noble passion throughout.

There is no symphony like it, however much the snobs and professional esthetes try to find important flaws in this transcendental work of the faith. The Gothic solemnity and shadow of the beginning, the figurations of the strings that soar to the sky; the childlike simplicities of Franck, in communion with his God; the glory of the conclusion, when the hosts [illegible] afar, and themes heard in earlier pages return, passing in procession of the quick and the dead, the Last Day, before the throne were thrillingly communicated.

This performance had the imprint of irresistible inspiration. It was perceptible that Mr. Munch could not remain objective or outside the music as he presented it, white hot from his heart. He was shaken by it, and honor to him that. With less emotion and intensity, he could not so [illegible] communicated to us the wonder of the music.

[157]

THE MAIL BAG

Economy for Symphony

To the Editor of The Herald:

It is with great regret that we, the subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have received a second appeal to come, this time as "Friends of the Orchestra," to its financial rescue. I believe I am not crying alone, as one in the wilderness, but that there are very many who feel as I do. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a great institution, of which all Bostonians are proud and also grateful. But there comes a time in the lives of all men and institutions when, instead of going to their relatives, or to the public, begging for more financial help, they should call a halt to ever increasing expenditure, and follow the less pleasant path of retrenchment.

The Trustees tell us only of a large and ever increasing deficit. I do not think they have ever given us a list of economies, so perhaps I may be excused if I suggest a few that leap to one's mind as possibilities. Let me enumerate:

Why not engage a conductor for such a number of concerts as he will conduct without finding it necessary to take a holiday which necessitates engaging a guest conductor at a large price while our conductor still draws full salary? The guest conductor adds nothing financially to the income since Symphony Hall is already sold out.

Why travel so much, and so far, with the increase in railroad fares and hotel rates which have risen so high?

Why engage so many costly soloists, or give oratorios which, because of the choruses and soloists, are also an expense?

Why give so much new music, the scores of which are again a heavy item? Why not become more truly a symphony orchestra depending upon its own great qualities, and giving us a new experience of the individual qualities of its members? This would be, on the whole, a finer way of meeting the regrettable emergency than by calling again on the subscribers to pay more for seats, which are already high, and petitioning them to give more and more as "Friends of the Orchestra." The larger number of subscribers are not rich people—many would have to give up the concerts entirely, and the "Friends" would diminish in more ways than one.

The time has come for solid economy. Instead of palliatives let us all face the bad situation, accept it as temporary, to be met not by more begging from the subscribers, but by a realization of those same subscribers, of the call for retrenchment.

ELIZABETH GASKELL NORTON.
Boston.

Subscriber Satisfied

To the Editor of The Herald:

May I add a closing word in answer to the many letters I have received relating to the recent financial appeals to the subscribers by the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, has been good enough to come to see me, and has given me a very full, interesting and reassuring (in a sense) account of the Orchestra's financial status. Its seriousness cannot be minimized. On the other hand, it is quite clear that Mr. Cabot and the Trustees are striving earnestly and in every way to meet the large deficit. These infinitely serious war days make it an unsuitable moment to press for any repeal of the Federal tax. We subscribers must therefore do our best to help during this crisis and believe that the Trustees do not overlook our suggestions or our own financial difficulties.

ELIZABETH G. NORTON.
Boston.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 19 1950

Defends Expenses of Boston Symphony

To the Editor of The Herald:

A few days ago in this column Miss Elizabeth Norton expressed regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has found it necessary to make a double appeal this season and suggested that this might not be necessary if strict economy were practised. I believe this raises an important subject and deserves a considered reply.

First let me say that response to our appeals has been very gratifying and demonstrates the high place occupied by the Orchestra in the opinion of the community.

The question of expenditures has given us serious concern. Last year the management and committees of the Trustees made an item by item study of our expenses and a similar study is now in progress. But the opportunities for retrenchment are limited for we do not believe that the public would tolerate economies which might jeopardize the musical standards of the Orchestra.

Miss Norton suggests, if I understand her, either that the season be shortened sufficiently so that one conductor can take all the concerts without a break or that we have two or more conductors, each taking a part of the season, thus eliminating guest conductors. We doubt if anyone wants a shorter season. Our long season is one of the major attractions which Boston offers to musicians. We believe the second course would be disastrous. Major Higginson's policy which the Trustees have followed was to have one conductor and make him fully responsible for all musical matters. We believe this policy above all others has led the Orchestra to its present preeminent position. Can anyone who attends the concerts and is a witness to the inhuman requirements which fine performances impose upon the Conductor question the necessity for some release from the intensity of 30 weeks?

A proposed economy is that the Orchestra discontinue its tours. Its out-of-town concerts are not given at a loss. They represented in the Symphony season last year a net return of $155,000 after paying all expenses connected with them. These concerts have other significant values in promoting the name of the Orchestra and the name of its home city. And this is accomplished without the Orchestra's neglecting its first obligation which is to its own community.

During Mr. Monteux' time a series of evening concerts was added to the Friday and Saturday concerts. Again under Dr. Koussevitzky there was added another series of Thursday evening rehearsals for students. The Symphony, the Pops and the Esplanade provide annually in Greater Boston 160 concerts, a larger number than provided by any one orchestra anywhere else.

Soloists are neither extravagant in number nor in cost. On the whole our Orchestra has fewer than any other major orchestra and is almost alone in its long-time policy of engaging a soloist only from the point of view of the repertoire and not as a box office attraction. Our soloists have been regularly considerate in the matter of fees and generous of their time, a Symphony appearance requiring them to be in Boston as much as four days for rehearsals and performances. They have also often volunteered their services without fee for the Pension Fund. Choruses should also be complimented for their generosity.

As to the cost of new music, it is almost disturbing to admit that the total cost of all music in a season is less than 1% of our total expenses.

But, nevertheless, there are doubtless opportunities where economies can be made without affecting the standard of performance. We are glad to report that last summer the Trustees and the American Federation of Musicians made a two-year contract which calls for no increases. Our financial plight is primarily due to a shrinking of revenues from records and broadcasting, and to increasing costs.

For fully two thirds of the Orchestra's seventy years of existence, the public was not called upon to assist in the financing of the Orchestra beyond paying for their seats. The prices paid were not then and are not now sufficient to cover the actual costs involved. The time has now come to face realistically the fact that patronage for the arts must rest on a broader base among those who enjoy its manifestations. We hope that the public will understand the need and importance of efforts to broaden this base and will reflect its feelings in such a way that our governmental officials will at least afford some relief from the crushing burden of taxation now borne by the Orchestra. This year we must collect from the public and turn over in taxes in one form or another $200,000—truly a heavy burden for an institution which not only provides Boston with the finest music but also is a factor in the maintenance of Boston's cultural life. But, in any event, it will be bad economy and worse if any solution is attempted that in any way would lower the present high standards of performance.

During the depression Bentley W. Warren, then President of the Trustees, received a letter urging a reduction in the size of the Orchestra and a large slashing in all directions. I recall that he replied briefly that it had not been his observation that a second-rate orchestra was easier to finance than a first-rate orchestra.

HENRY B. CABOT, Pres.,
Trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra
Boston

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 17 1950

(AP Wirephoto)

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR TRUMAN — President and Mrs. Harry Truman chat with Director Charles Munch during interval in orchestra's concert in Constitution Hall, Washington, last night.

THE MAIL BAG

Praise for Symphony

To the Editor of The Herald:

May I make an indignant response to a letter written by Elizabeth Gaskell Norton and printed in last Wednesday's Herald? This letter maintains that her attitude is not the prevalent one among intelligent patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not necessary to attend for the moment to the circumstances which seem to have prompted Miss Norton's letter. In these trying days of rapidly increasing business expenses and inflationary tendencies, it is not very difficult to see that the income of the orchestra must in some manner be increased. The cost of the series tickets has remained unchanged over the year.

For this all praise is due to the trustees and the management of the orchestra. It had been hoped and confidently expected that the federal tax on tickets would be removed this year, and that some of the financial strain on the orchestra would be relieved by its reappropriation of that same tax amount for its own purposes. International complications have quashed that hopefully expected circumstance; and consequently, the management was forced to request from the subscribers an additional 20 per cent. of the basic cost of the tickets as a voluntary gift. At the same time we are asked to contribute, as has been customary in the past, to the Friends of the Orchestra fund, but in amounts more, if possible, than in previous years. The management has chosen to ask its long list of faithful supporters to make this financial effort at a trying period rather than decrease the scope, caliber and prestige of one of the world's finest orchestras.

That the orchestra has such a reputation must be due in no small measure to its energetic activities over a wide field. Concerts away from home add much to the income and prestige of the orchestra; but surely even Miss Norton cannot imagine that the fatigue of traveling, and crowding in so many concerts away from Boston, is merely a pleasurable interlude?

The occasional guest conductor, and he is occasional, is an important event even as he gives Mr. Munch a much needed chance to relax from a very heavy schedule which exacts a very heavy toll in energy. Mr. Munch deserves an occasional rest during the season, and I am just as glad to see him get it as I am to hear what another conductor can do with our orchestra or with a piece of music.

Large works, such as masses, oratorios, and requiems, are also occasional and are the highlight of the season. They are needed in the repertoire of a large symphony orchestra, and they add life to programs which would otherwise have a sameness over a period of time.

Again, I am proud that the Boston Symphony has adopted a policy of presenting a great deal of new music to its subscribers. There has been much argument about the worth of these new compositions, but never before a cry about the expense of the scores. The field of music would become sterile and moribund without a steady evolution. If we cannot at least offer public performances of new music, talented composers will drain their talents on, it may be, writing incidental music for some inconsequential Hollywood thriller, and music will indeed become an art of the past only.

Few things can be more discouraging to a group of gifted, hardworking musicians than the short-sightedness of Miss Norton's view, and for that reason alone I would like by this letter to associate myself with those Friends of the Symphony who are grateful for the pleasure the orchestra has brought them in the past, and who hope for it flourishing continuance.

CHESTER I. SOLOMON.
Boston.

Music

NY World Tel - 19 Nov 50

Boston Symphony Opens With New French Work

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

To celebrate the Boston Symphony's first visit to New York this season, Charles Munch conducted a beautiful new work by his French compatriot, Arthur Honegger, in Carnegie Hall last night.

The score was titled simply, "Prelude, Fugue and Postlude." Behind it was an involved story of how an earlier composition written for a mythical ballet about Amphion, Jupiter and other ancient Greek solemnities was reworked by Honegger for concert purposes.

Since the score was offered last night as symphonic music, I see no point in outlining the myth of how the Muses were transformed into columns for the temple of Apollo.

Stirring Theme.

The music was a stirring fabric of instrumental themes and color. What drama there was lurked in the contrast not only of themes but of orchestral masses, the shrewdly shifting tempi serving to heighten the suspense.

One of the best uses of the alto saxophone in modern music occurs in a passage ushering in the main body of the prelude. After that comes a broad and sonorous fugue, which relaxes into the "Postlude"—a thing of quiet but unforgettable beauty.

Exalted Standards.

Mr. Munch conducted the novelty con amore, and the Bostonians performed it that way—which is the style they have accustomed us to for years. The same exalted standard held for Handel's "Royal Fireworks" music and Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" ballet suite. Beethoven's "Eroica" rounded out the program.

What becomes increasingly evident in Mr. Munch's directing is his intensity. He has a way of making the whole orchestra vibrate like one string—a faculty that brings him close to those other masters of living tone—Arturo Toscanini and Dimitri Mitropoulos. One might say of the way he conducts French music that it is without trace of accent.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 19 1950

Bostonians Here

Munch Conducts, Firkusny Is Piano Soloist

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Charles Munch, conductor, first concert of the New York afternoon series. Soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, pianist. The program:

The Star-Spangled Banner
Symphony No. 3 ..... Diamond
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Martinu
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck

The enterprising Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch's direction, introduced two scores to Carnegie Hall in yesterday afternoon's concert. David Diamond's third symphony, which, following the National Anthem, opened the program, was first played in this borough by the Juilliard School's orchestra under Jean Morel on Nov. 3, a few hours after the Bostonians had first performed it on their home grounds. Bohuslav Martinu's third piano concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, was new to Manhattan; both this and the Diamond symphony had been introduced to Brooklyn by Mr. Munch and his musicians Friday night.

Mr. Diamond's third symphony is not his latest major work; his fourth symphony had its first public hearings three seasons ago. The form, as he describes it, is cyclic, with themes limited to no particular movement; two basic figures, in various metamorphoses, link the work together. To a reviewer hearing it for the first time, dominating impressions included those of vitality and refreshing exuberance, of an idiom which is primarily melodic.

The scoring, which includes a piano and a percussion group of considerable size, avoids opacity; it often has a persuasively glowing, vivid color which enhances the pervasive animation of the three lively movements among the work's five. The lighter scoring and meditative mood of the second movement, an andante, provides a valuable element of contrast.

At times it seemed that the composer had not solved all the formal problems involved in the development of his well defined musical ideas; motion was not always identical with progress, and somewhat gerater conciseness might have been profitable. But the symphony has individuality and character, and was well received; Mr. Diamond was called to the stage for bows.

Mr. Martinu's third piano concerto, first played by Mr. Firkusny with the Dallas Symphony last November, has less of the Czech savor than one is wont to find in his music; the integration of the piano part with the orchestral texture, cited in John N. Burk's program note, is often favored by contemporary composers, but the style has an idiom which looks back beyond the turn of the century and is frequently reminiscent of Brahms.

There is more of a Czech flavor and more of the composer's individuality here and there in the andante and the finale, but on the whole the work is well tailored rather than distinctive. While integrated with the orchestra, the piano part is not submerged by it; not aiming at the display of virtuosity, it give its interpreter opportunity to exhibit his technical and interpretative talents. Mr. Firkusny played it with spirit, deftness and entire technical mastery; in a few measures he might have yielded slightly further to the romanticism of the music, but his performance gave a general sense of thorough and communicative understanding.

The orchestra under Mr. Munch gave admirable and convincing performances of both new works, and its playing of the Franck symphony called attention to the qualities which have long given this symphony a prominent place in the standard repertory. A few debatable nuances of tempo could easily be overlooked in an interpretation marked by largeness of scale, vividness and wide range of expression, excellent instrumental and dynamic proportion and animating spirit. This was repertory music, but it did not receive a repertory performance.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
NOV 19 1950

Boston Students Like Preview Of Symphony

Special to The Commercial Appeal

BOSTON, Nov. 18.—The staid old Boston Symphony Orchestra is trying an experiment which is clicking solidly. Five final rehearsals before concerts are being thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools at a small fee.

The orchestra, including Conductor Charles Munch, likes the youngsters' absorbed attention, and the students enjoy not only the music, but Mr. Munch's deft final polishing touches. Many students otherwise would not have been able to hear the orchestra because of its fully-subscribed season.

Receipts are to be devoted to the orchestra's pension fund.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 19 1950

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Impressive As Substitute For Munch

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

To some in the audience at last Tuesday's concert here by the Boston Symphony and, in particular, to those who were hoping to get their first glimpse of Charles Munch, the announcement that concert-master Richard Burgin would conduct instead came as a disappointment. Those listeners who are familiar with the proceedings of the orchestra within the last decade or even before that period, received the news without qualms, for they knew that the conductor's duties would be in capable hands. The results of the concert itself left no doubters.

Mr. Burgin has been the concert-master of the Boston Orchestra for some 30 years, his association with the orchestra even antedating the reign of Serge Koussevitzky. He has, of course, conducted the Boston musicians many times over the years. The last time Mr. Burgin conducted the orchestra here was several years ago, at a time when Dr. Koussevitzky was unable to appear.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
NOV 20 1950

Charles Munch and the Boston symphony are opening their Thursday evening rehearsals to students...Oh, to be a student again and get in on that!...However, the radio programs which broadcast symphony rehearsals are among the most interesting on the air, we think, when the orchestra's superb mastery is excitingly interspersed by the conductor's eager humming, patient entreating, and scholarly observations...

[159]

Nov 19

Music and Musicians

Philharmonic Finances

By VIRGIL THOMSON

FOUR weeks ago this column, reporting the sums that various American municipal governments contribute toward the support of opera companies and symphony orchestras, proposed that the government of New York City might possibly be induced to underwrite reasonable deficits for the Metropolitan Opera Association and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. Last Monday, at a lunch-meeting of the latter's Auxiliary Board, Floyd Blair, president and treasurer of the society, opened again the question of operating funds. Last season's deficit was $81,000, he said, and this season's will reach $150,000. The society, he stated, is "prepared to meet the emergency this and next year, but obviously cannot go on taking part of our capital funds to bring music to the people of New York."

Thinking that the society existed only for the purpose of bringing music to the people of New York, this reporter inquired of the Philharmonic office and also of Mr. Blair just what he had meant and what was the situation anyway. Both Arthur Judson, the manager, and Mr. Blair replied that some of the society's capital can be spent and some cannot. Mr. Blair outlined the capital resources of the Philharmonic as follows:

Leaving out of consideration the Pension Funds, of which there are two, amounting together to nearly $670,000, neither of which is available in either capital or income for concert expenses, the Philharmonic enjoys an endowment, all told, of slightly less than $1,000,000. Of this, $690,000 (I use round figures) represents untouchable capital bearing an income, last season, of $24,000. There is also an Emergency Fund of $120,000. There is also a sum of about $160,000, which represents an increase in the market value of Endowment Fund investments over the $690,000 that this capital amounted to when acquired by gift; and this $160,000 can legally be used for current expenses too. The total amount available that can be spent, beyond receipts from concerts, broadcasts and recording royalties, is around $400,000. When this reserve is gone, there will remain only the income from Endowment Fund investments, a sum smaller by far than the deficit of either last season of this, even when augmented by the $25,000 to $30,000 raised annually through the Auxiliary Board.

Diminished Resources

A PUBLIC drive for raising further endownment or for enlarging the Emergency Fund is viewed by Philharmonic board members with varying degrees of optimism but for the most part unfavorably. So, also, is a direct appeal to the City of New York. [The Metropolitan Opera Association, likewise, does not look forward with much eagerness to prospects of municipal aid, would rather preserve its independence as long as possible. It welcomes, however, all forms of tax exemption.] Arthur Judson favors United States government help through an Arts Council based on the British model and seems optimistic about the probability of Congress's finding such a program acceptable.

Nevertheless, pending the establishment of any such aid, the Philharmonic, like many another American orchestra, will have to either exhaust its current-expense reserves or live by its wits, likely both. The gravest worry to its administrators right now is the present trend in radio broadcasting away from "classical" or "serious" music. There are exactly four symphony orchestras broadcasting this season weekly programs nationally available—the Boston Symphony rehearsal (A. B. C.), the Oklahoma City Symphony Orchestra's radically modernistic "Music of All Nations" hour (WOR), the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Sunday concert. None of these now has a sponsor; all now have undesirable hours, and tape recording is making the postponement of any program likely whenever the local distributing station can sell its accustomed hour to an advertiser.

The Philharmonic has long enjoyed the best hour on the air, Sunday at 3 p. m. in the East, which is 12 noon on the Pacific coast. It has now lost a large part of its public by being shifted to the following Sunday at 1 p. m., Eastern Time. Reduction of its radio public will mean, according to Mr. Blair, a considerable shrinkage in its record market; and this means further loss of income.

Our orchestra is not the only one in trouble. All across the country there are deficits, and nowhere are private gifts adequate to meet these. Boston itself, long thought to be built on a Rock of Ages, has exhausted its reserves; and its endowment capital is only $400,000. Voluntary small contributions are keeping its head above water for the moment. There are sizable endowments for the orchestras of Cleveland ($5,000,000), Chicago ($3,000,000 plus a valuable hall and studio building) and Philadelphia ($2,000,000). Other orchestras receive municipal aid, though this is not invariably permanent. Neither, however, has it been invariably associated with incompetent meddling on the part of municipal authorities. On the contrary, its history has for the most part been free and clean.

Untapped Sources

WHETHER the city government of New York would be disposed to rescue the Philharmonic from impending poverty I do not know. If it were, the Metropolitan and City Center opera companies and the New York City Ballet would have equal right to its help. In Louisville, an Arts Fund, raised by popular subscription and impartially administered, gives aid to various cultural institutions that could not successfully make separate public drives. Perhaps such a fund could be raised annually here. In any case, something may have to be done about our top musical establishments within the next year; and it is to be hoped that a reflected plan covering them all will be adopted. It is this writer's belief that New York music can expect more support right now from regional sources than from the Federal government. Anyway, one does not exclude the other.

To be realistic about the matter, what right has New York to ask for Federal help before its own resources are exhausted? We have scarcely touched at all the cultural Foundations or the rich trade unions. The former, I must say, have long been shy about musical involvements; but the latter are desirous of good will and culturally ambitious. Surely New York, by one means and another, can support orchestral and operatic performances of the quality to which it has long been accustomed. And if the city and all its citizens turn them down, why not hand the Philharmonic and the Met over to our Port Authority? That group seems to have a real knack for public service.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH
NOV 19 1950

A Successful Idea

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, has inaugurated a policy which is enjoying tremendous success in widening its audience.

Each week, the final rehearsal of the orchestra is opened to college and high school students unable to attend regular subscription concerts. And for a small admission, the students sit in on the rehearsal, which is carried on in the usual fashion.

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 2 6 1951

MUSIC: Mrs. Coolidge

DEVOTEES of chamber music converged upon the Library of Congress in Washington for a three-day festival presented at the end of October by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. The five-concert festival, the eleventh of its kind at the Library, was a three-way celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Foundation, the eighty-sixth birthday of its donor, Mrs. Coolidge, and the sesquicentennial of the Library itself. Four new works were commissioned for the occasion—by the American composers Aaron Copland, Robert Palmer and William Schuman, and the Italian veteran Gian Francesco Malipiero (always one of Mrs. Coolidge's favorites)—and they were played in public for the first time in programs that also included familiar pieces by composers ranging from Bach to Stravinsky.

More than thirty years ago Mrs. Coolidge, a Chicagoan with an ample fortune, decided to concentrate her philanthropy in the field of music. Surveying the American musical scene, she saw that the smaller and less pretentious forms of instrumental music were almost unknown to a public that was already fairly well won over to the more obvious pleasures of symphonic and operatic music. The string quartets of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—masterpieces equal in beauty to the symphonies—were seldom played, and living composers felt little urge to contribute to the literature of chamber music, since they feared that their work would never be performed. Mrs. Coolidge determined to do what she could to remedy this situation.

Assuming that it was hopeless to ask Americans to pay to hear chamber music when they were scarcely aware of its existence, Mrs. Coolidge began to present it free. In 1919 she built a sylvan Temple of Music on her property near Pittsfield, Massachusetts, and inaugurated there the Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music. To prove at once that she felt as much concern for contemporary music as for the classics, she offered a $1,000 prize for a new work (it was won by Ernest Bloch's Viola Sonata).

Mrs. Coolidge soon extended her activity to other parts of the country providing free concerts by the world's best chamber-music players in Cambridge, Chicago, Berkeley and elsewhere. To encourage the formation of string quartets and piano trios, she underwrote the living expenses of the players. She brought the impeccable Pro Arte Quartet from Belgium and the dynamic Kolisch Quartet from Austria, maintaining both groups until they were able to make their own way in this country.

In 1924 Mrs. Coolidge offered to build a chamber-music hall in the Library of Congress. The offer was quickly accepted by Congress—it was the first gift of the kind to the United States Government—and a 600-seat auditorium of simple classic design and unsurpassed acoustics was constructed adjacent to the inner courtyard and fountain of the Library building. On October 28, 29 and 30, 1925—the exact dates of this year's festival, ending with Mrs. Coolidge's birthday—the Coolidge Auditorium was dedicated with the first chamber-music festival. At the same time, Mrs. Coolidge supplied an endowment of $600,000, known as the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, for "the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise be considered too unique or too expensive to be ordinarily undertaken . . . as an occasional possibility of giving precedence to considerations of quality over those of quantity . . . to opportunity rather than to expediency."

A model donor, Mrs. Coolidge has allowed the music division of the Library of Congress to administer the funds without interference. The achievements have been superb. Such monuments of modern music as Bartók's Fifth Quartet and Schoenberg's Third and Fourth Quartets have resulted from the Foundation's commissions. Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagète" and Copland's "Appalachian Spring" were also commissioned works, presented for the first time, in dance form, at Coolidge festivals. Three generations of American composers have shared with leading European musicians the Foundation's encouragement to create chamber works. Some of the greatest ensembles and performers of our day, from the Budapest Quartet to the harpsichordist, Ralph Kirkpatrick, the violinist, Alexander Schneider, and the violin-and-piano duo of Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, have been launched on American careers at Library of Congress appearances and kept going with subsidies until they became well enough known to stand on their own feet.

The Coolidge Foundation is largely responsible for the remarkably healthy estate of chamber music throughout the country today. It has constantly demonstrated the highest standards of taste and execution, providing a model of disinterested musical sponsorship. It has done more than any other single agency or individual in the world to increase the productivity of contemporary composers in the realm of chamber music.

As things chanced, the current festival was less well stocked with arresting new works and clairvoyant performers than some of the earlier ones. Even so, the very existence of the festival was a tribute to the vision that enabled Mrs. Coolidge to turn an illiterate American chamber-music audience into an informed and appreciative one within a single generation. There was also an indirect tribute in the fact that far fewer people than formerly came great distances to the festival. Chamber music is not a rarity any more; everyone can hear it in his home town or on the radio or phonograph.

CECIL SMITH

PRINTED BY NATIONAL PUBLISHING CO., 301 H ST., N.E., WASHINGTON 2, D. C.

PLAN FOR SELF-HELP

A Conductor Gives His Idea of How Orchestras Might Solve Problems

By ALFRED WALLENSTEIN

Conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, who was scheduled to deliver an address yesterday morning at Columbia University's one-day forum on "The Composer's Place in Industry and Society Today." Excerpts from the written text follow.

THE economic crisis confronting the American symphony orchestra is becoming increasingly acute. It is an accepted fact that it has always been impossible to maintain a symphony orchestra at a profit. But it must also be acknowledged that no orchestra can continue to survive indefinitely in the face of inexorably rising deficits and constantly mounting taxes.

Obviously our orchestras must make more money or cost less if they are to endure. We are left with the inescapable alternative: To increase the orchestra's own source of revenue. By selling more tickets? The orchestras with the largest proportion of season subscribers are almost invariably (if coincidentally) those with the largest annual deficits. By playing more concerts? The law of diminishing returns guarantees this as the surest single method of augmenting losses. By income from broadcasts and recordings? Yes.

Three of the major symphony orchestras in America together realize almost a million dollars every year from this source of revenue. Even so, they have deficits only partially alleviated by such extra earnings. Perhaps these orchestras could survive without this premium, but it is highly unlikely that without it they could maintain their position of preeminence.

Recordings

Actually the income from radio is relatively insignificant and is diminishing every year. But as the opportunity of hearing symphonic music on the air decreases — and television is accelerating this natural decline — the demand for classical recordings is more than proportionately rising and, in spite of the perennial laments of the commercial recording companies, is already outdistancing the available American supply.

The mechanical excellence of imported recordings and the diversity of repertoire, two of the reasons advanced to explain the popularity of foreign-made records, are advantages not restricted to either side of the Atlantic. There is little question that the United States has today the most critical advantage of all, in the wealth of musical talent within its borders. Why then can we not meet this growing competition from overseas?

It is almost entirely a matter of cost. For the average recording session the American musician receives from five to seventy times the pay of his brothers overseas. Multiply this difference by ninety or a hundred men and it is not difficult to understand how a European company can profitably produce an album that would represent a doubtful risk to a commercial concern in the United States.

The problem, in the final analysis, resolves itself into these terms: Our symphony orchestras vitally need the revenue from recordings that is currently being diverted into the foreign market. Competing for this market means competing on a cost as well as a quality basis. To meet the low cost of foreign recordings it is necessary to lower the determining factor in recording expense—the musicians' salaries.

But this we do not want to do. It would be illogical and purposeless to perpetuate our symphony orchestras only at the expense of the men who comprise them. If any plan is to be practicable, they must profit too.

Royalties

Let us assume that American musicians would agree to record at the highest prevailing European rate instead of the United States scale currently in force. The cost of domestic recordings would then be automatically reduced to the point where they could compete successfully with the foreign product. More royalties would accrue to the hard-pressed symphony associations. There would be more work for the men.

The other condition of the proposal is that, in return for accepting a lower fee in recording sessions, the musicians receive royalties on the records they make.

Whether or not the commercial recording companies would accept such a proposition is a question, of course, which only they can answer. But the plan does not depend on their approval. On the contrary, it immediately suggests an even more challenging undertaking: The formation of a non-commercial, non-profit recording company composed of several symphony associations whose orchestras are agreed to record under this arrangement.

The orchestras would record for a fee commensurate with the highest European scale in return for a certain royalty to the musicians. The associations themselves would receive the royalty offered by commercial companies. But the participating associations would also divide, on a pro-rata basis, the profits accruing to the cooperative. We can only speculate as to the tax provisions governing such a nonprofit enterprise; but if they were favorable it would mean even more income for the associations and a still higher royalty for the men.

The eventual formation of a subsidiary music publishing company as part of this cooperative venture is not only a possibility but virtually a foregone conclusion. To composers it would offer the unique and almost irresistible advantage of having their works performed and recorded simultaneously with publications. To the member associations it would provide another welcome source of income.

And here we glimpse a new and interesting prospect. Because the percentage of royalty to the musicians could be increased with the increase of total profits to the organization, they too would profit from this added income. Indirectly, but none the less definitely, a method would be provided at last for players as well as composers to share in the profits accruing from publishing.

[160]

NEW REPUBLIC
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 20 1950

MUSIC: Mrs. Coolidge

DEVOTEES of chamber music converged upon the Library of Congress in Washington for a three-day festival presented at the end of October by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. The five-concert festival, the eleventh of its kind at the Library, was a three-way celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Foundation, the eighty-sixth birthday of its donor, Mrs. Coolidge, and the sesquicentennial of the Library itself. Four new works were commissioned for the occasion—by the American composers Aaron Copland, Robert Palmer and William Schuman, and the Italian veteran Gian Francesco Malipiero (always one of Mrs. Coolidge's favorites)—and they were played in public for the first time in programs that also included familiar pieces by composers ranging from Bach to Stravinsky.

More than thirty years ago Mrs. Coolidge, a Chicagoan with an ample fortune, decided to concentrate her philanthropy in the field of music. Surveying the American musical scene, she saw that the smaller and less pretentious forms of instrumental music were almost unknown to a public that was already fairly well won over to the more obvious pleasures of symphonic and operatic music. The string quartets of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—masterpieces equal in beauty to the symphonies—were seldom played, and living composers felt little urge to contribute to the literature of chamber music, since they feared that their work would never be performed. Mrs. Coolidge determined to do what she could to remedy this situation.

Assuming that it was hopeless to ask Americans to pay to hear chamber music when they were scarcely aware of its existence, Mrs. Coolidge began to present it free. In 1919 she built a sylvan Temple of Music on her property near Pittsfield, Massachusetts, and inaugurated there the Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music. To prove at once that she felt as much concern for contemporary music as for the classics, she offered a $1,000 prize for a new work (it was won by Ernest Bloch's Viola Sonata).

Mrs. Coolidge soon extended her activity to other parts of the country providing free concerts by the world's best chamber-music players in Cambridge, Chicago, Berkeley and elsewhere. To encourage the formation of string quartets and piano trios, she underwrote the living expenses of the players. She brought the impeccable Pro Arte Quartet from Belgium and the dynamic Kolisch Quartet from Austria, maintaining both groups until they were able to make their own way in this country.

In 1924 Mrs. Coolidge offered to build a chamber-music hall in the Library of Congress. The offer was quickly accepted by Congress—it was the first gift of the kind to the United States Government—and a 600-seat auditorium of simple classic design and unsurpassed acoustics was constructed adjacent to the inner courtyard and fountain of the Library building. On October 28, 29 and 30, 1925—the exact dates of this year's festival, ending with Mrs. Coolidge's birthday—the Coolidge Auditorium was dedicated with the first chamber-music festival. At the same time, Mrs. Coolidge supplied an endowment of $600,000, known as the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, for "the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise be considered too unique or too expensive to be ordinarily undertaken . . . as an occasional possibility of giving precedence to considerations of quality over those of quantity . . . to opportunity rather than to expediency."

A model donor, Mrs. Coolidge has allowed the music division of the Library of Congress to administer the funds without interference. The achievements have been superb. Such monuments of modern music as Bartók's Fifth Quartet and Schoenberg's Third and Fourth Quartets have resulted from the Foundation's commissions. Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagète" and Copland's "Appalachian Spring" were also commissioned works, presented for the first time, in dance form, at Coolidge festivals. Three generations of American composers have shared with leading European musicians the Foundation's encouragement to create chamber works. Some of the greatest ensembles and performers of our day, from the Budapest Quartet to the harpsichordist, Ralph Kirkpatrick, the violinist, Alexander Schneider, and the violin-and-piano duo of Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin, have been launched on American careers at Library of Congress appearances and kept going with subsidies until they became well enough known to stand on their own feet.

The Coolidge Foundation is largely responsible for the remarkably healthy estate of chamber music throughout the country today. It has constantly demonstrated the highest standards of taste and execution, providing a model of disinterested musical sponsorship. It has done more than any other single agency or individual in the world to increase the productivity of contemporary composers in the realm of chamber music.

As things chanced, the current festival was less well stocked with arresting new works and clairvoyant performers than some of the earlier ones. Even so, the very existence of the festival was a tribute to the vision that enabled Mrs. Coolidge to turn an illiterate American chamber-music audience into an informed and appreciative one within a single generation. There was also an indirect tribute in the fact that far fewer people than formerly came great distances to the festival. Chamber music is not a rarity any more; everyone can hear it in his home town or on the radio or phonograph.

CECIL SMITH

PRINTED BY NATIONAL PUBLISHING CO., 301 N ST., N.E., WASHINGTON 2, D. C.

PLAN FOR SELF-HELP

A Conductor Gives His Idea of How Orchestras Might Solve Problems

By ALFRED WALLENSTEIN

Conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, who was scheduled to deliver an address yesterday morning at Columbia University's one-day forum on "The Composer's Place in Industry and Society Today." Excerpts from the written text follow.

THE economic crisis confronting the American symphony orchestra is becoming increasingly acute. It is an accepted fact that it has always been impossible to maintain a symphony orchestra at a profit. But it must also be acknowledged that no orchestra can continue to survive indefinitely in the face of inexorably rising deficits and constantly mounting taxes.

Obviously our orchestras must make more money or cost less if they are to endure. We are left with the inescapable alternative: To increase the orchestra's own source of revenue. By selling more tickets? The orchestras with the largest proportion of season subscribers are almost invariably (if coincidentally) those with the largest annual deficits. By playing more concerts? The law of diminishing returns guarantees this as the surest single method of augmenting losses. By income from broadcasts and recordings? Yes.

Three of the major symphony orchestras in America together realize almost a million dollars every year from this source of revenue. Even so, they have deficits only partially alleviated by such extra earnings. Perhaps these orchestras could survive without this premium, but it is highly unlikely that without it they could maintain their position of preeminence.

Recordings

Actually the income from radio is relatively insignificant and is diminishing every year. But as the opportunity of hearing symphonic music on the air decreases — and television is accelerating this natural decline — the demand for classical recordings is more than proportionately rising and, in spite of the perennial laments of the commercial recording companies, is already outdistancing the available American supply.

The mechanical excellence of imported recordings and the diversity of repertoire, two of the reasons advanced to explain the popularity of foreign-made records, are advantages not restricted to either side of the Atlantic. There is little question that the United States has today the most critical advantage of all, in the wealth of musical talent within its borders. Why then can we not meet this growing competition from overseas?

It is almost entirely a matter of cost. For the average recording session the American musician receives from five to seventy times the pay of his brothers overseas. Multiply this difference by ninety or a hundred men and it is not difficult to understand how a European company can profitably produce an album that would represent a doubtful risk to a commercial concern in the United States.

The problem, in the final analysis, resolves itself into these terms: Our symphony orchestras vitally need the revenue from recordings that is currently being diverted into the foreign market. Competing for this market means competing on a cost as well as a quality basis. To meet the low cost of foreign recordings it is necessary to lower the determining factor in recording expense—the musicians' salaries.

But this we do not want to do. It would be illogical and purposeless to perpetuate our symphony orchestras only at the expense of the men who comprise them. If any plan is to be practicable, they must profit too.

Royalties

Let us assume that American musicians would agree to record at the highest prevailing European rate instead of the United States scale currently in force. The cost of domestic recordings would then be automatically reduced to the point where they could compete successfully with the foreign product. More royalties would accrue to the hard-pressed symphony associations. There would be more work for the men.

The other condition of the proposal is that, in return for accepting a lower fee in recording sessions, the musicians receive royalties on the records they make.

Whether or not the commercial recording companies would accept such a proposition is a question, of course, which only they can answer. But the plan does not depend on their approval. On the contrary, it immediately suggests an even more challenging undertaking: The formation of a non-commercial, non-profit recording company composed of several symphony associations whose orchestras are agreed to record under this arrangement.

The orchestras would record for a fee commensurate with the highest European scale in return for a certain royalty to the musicians. The associations themselves would receive the royalty offered by commercial companies. But the participating associations would also divide, on a pro-rata basis, the profits accruing to the cooperative. We can only speculate as to the tax provisions governing such a nonprofit enterprise; but if they were favorable it would mean even more income for the associations and a still higher royalty for the men.

The eventual formation of a subsidiary music publishing company as part of this cooperative venture is not only a possibility but virtually a foregone conclusion. To composers it would offer the unique and almost irresistible advantage of having their works performed and recorded simultaneously with publications. To the member associations it would provide another welcome source of income.

And here we glimpse a new and interesting prospect. Because the percentage of royalty to the musicians could be increased with the increase of total profits to the organization, they too would profit from this added income. Indirectly, but none the less definitely, a method would be provided at last for players as well as composers to share in the profits accruing from publishing.

NEW YORKER STAATSZEITUNG & HERALD NOV. 21, 1950

Boston Symphonie spielt Werke von Martinu und Diamond

Im Samstagkonzert der Boston Symphonie in der Carnegie Hall dirigierte Charles Munch die New Yorker Erstaufführung des dritten Klavierkonzertes von Bohuslav Martinu. Rudolf Firkusny, dem das Werk gewidmet ist, spielte den Solopart. Die Komposition hat drei Sätze, das Allegro rhythmisch bemerkenswert, der langsame Satz mit seinen romantischen, lyrischen Melodien und das rondoartige Moderato an nationale tschechische Weisen erinnernd. Der Solopart tritt in in den Kadenzen der einzelnen Sätze virtuos hervor, bildet aber sonst einen Bestandteil des symphonischen Orchesters. Das Werk ist von einem ausgezeichneten Musiker geschrieben, die Instrumentation originell und bemerkenswert im Kolorit.

Rudolf Firkusny spielte mit klingendem Anschlag poetisch die Cantilene und brillant die beiden Ecksätze. Der anwesende Komponist wurde ebenso wie Dirigent, Musiker, Solist und Musiker lebhaft akklamiert.

Voran ging die Wiedergabe der dritten Symphonie David Diamonds; ein Werk in fünf Teilen mit zwei langsamen Sätzen, von denen das Andante wirksamer als das etwas breit ausgesponnene Adagio assai ist. Der erste und letzte Satz sind rhythmisch bemerkenswert; das Hauptthema erscheint in beiden Sätzen, von einer Spieldosenweise im letzten unterbrochen.

Charles Munch brachte im zweiten Teil des Konzertes eine grandiose Aufführung der Cesar-Franck-Symphonie D-Moll. Seine hervorragende Interpretation läßt Theme zum Vorschein kommen, die sonst bedeutungslos verschwinden; die Steigerungen im ersten Satz, nuancenreich hervorgehoben, das prächtige Allegretto und das gewaltige Finale werden vom Dirigenten unvergleichlich gestaltet. Das Orchester war ausgezeichnet disponiert; begeisterte Ovationen dankten Charles Munch und seinen Musikern.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 21 1950

Boston Symphony Men Assist E. Power Biggs in Organ Concert

E. Power Biggs presented the second in a series of three organ concerts at Symphony Hall last evening. The program was an all-Bach commemorative one, unique in that it was a replica of that played by Felix Mendelssohn in 1840 "when he wished to raise funds for a memorial to the great innovator."

Bach always fares well with Mr. Biggs, as indeed he did last evening. The organist displayed a slight nervousness at the beginning, causing some of the passages to rush along rather hectically. By the time he reached the choral prelude "Deck Thyself, O Soul With Gladness," he was in the stride. The choral emerged beautifully conceived and eloquently played.

The Toccata in F major did not fare so well. Here Mr. Biggs fell victim to the temptation of executing some dazzling footwork. As a result, the structure was sketched rather erratically.

Next, five movements from the Cantatas were played with an orchestra section comprising trumpets, oboes, bassoon, trombone, and tympani. These were members of The Boston Symphony Orchestra. There were several embarrassing moments when entrances (especially at the beginning of the Sinfonia and Alleluia from Cantata No. 142) were slipshod. Generally speaking, the ensemble was good. The trumpets were erratic and a little boisterous at times. However, the group blended quite effectively.

Of the movements form the Cantatas, "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring" was outstanding. Here Mr. Biggs was at his best. Rare indeed is the organist who can bridge the gap successfully between the great architectural facades, to the sweet, introspective tenderness of the chorale tunes. Mr. Biggs is just such an organist. At all times during this movement he kept the melodic line free and flexible, the phrasing a model of clarity and coherence.

Also on the program were the Trio Sonata No. 1, in E flat, and the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

The final concert in the series will be presented Monday, Dec. 4.

—A. F. B.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 21 1950

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Koussevitzky Light In a Dark Room

We fumbled around in the darkness of the hallway, found the coat tree as the barely glowing lights flickered up and down, and hung up our coats and hats. Beyond, in the middle of the suite at the Ritz, stood the dim, trim figure of Serge Koussevitzky. The lights gave a final, eerie flicker and went out and stayed out. "So we talk in the dark," said the invisible Koussevitzky, amused and entirely unconcerned by the strange blackout that had descended over the city, "it is from no matter, no?"

We groped our way into chairs encircling the 76-year-old conductor, back in town for his first series of appearances with the Boston Symphony orchestra since his retirement two years ago, and sat like a bunch of spiritualists at a seance awaiting the manifestation of the ghost. "Ha," said Koussevitzky, no ghost, "tell me, what is interesting in Boston since I am away, it does not seem possible that I am now only a visitor." We assured him that the lights going out were interesting and novel, but how about him, what had he been up to in which far-flung places?

Out of Tune

"I have conduct everywhere," he exclaimed enthusiastically, his voice youthful and vigorously modulated, "Brazeel, Israel, Havana, Rome, Paris, London, Brussels, everywhere! It is tremendous experience!" But he was astonished to discover, he said, that the musical life of Europe is not very rich. Nor did he find the quality of European or South American orchestras very high. "They are out of tune," he said wryly, "they are technically often very good, and some of the musicians are great artists, but they are careless about playing in tune."

So in accepting guest appearances everywhere he said he always stipulated at least five rehearsals. In one case, even though the date of the concert was already set when he arrived, he refused to appear with the orchestra until he had had seven additional rehearsals. "I said either that or I go home," he stated with amusement, "so we rehearsed." But he has had occasion to tune American orchestra, too, he added. "I will not tell you which one," he said, "but for the first rehearsal I spend 45 minutes tuning every musician in the orchestra. To the clarinet player I said 'why do you play G flat for G?' 'I do not know," said the clarinet player, 'I have always played that way.' You see, it is carelessness. So I tune and tune. You cannot make the orchestra sound if it is not in tune."

According to the conductor, who divides his time these days (when not flying all over the place for guest appearances) between his summer estate overlooking his beloved Tanglewood and his winter home near Phoenix, Arizona, the Europeans are even more conservative than Americans when it comes to new music. "They do not play any new music at all," he said, "it is impossible for the young composer to have his music played."

One of the reasons for this, he explained, is that European orchestras do not have regular conductors, just a succession of one guest conductor after another. "So the guest conductor only plays the things he is most successful with," he continued. "He has no responsibility to the musical life of the city he visits. Even I, who have all my life made it my business to play new music, never do any new music in Europe. It is a great pity. But I am very happy to see that Mr. Munch plays new music in Boston just as I did."

Enjoying Role

As for his accepting the post of conductor of the Detroit Symphony, when and if it is revived, Mr. Koussevitzky was very definite that the recent story to that effect was not true. "I will help," he said, "I will do everything I can to help, but would I retire from Boston to become conductor of the Detroit orchestra? It is not possible." It was clear that he is thoroughly enjoying his present role as an international figure, conducting here and there with immense success, and having a good two or three weeks' rest between engagements. "No," he said, "I will help, but to be regular conductor, no."

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 21 1950

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK IN BOSTON

To Conduct Symphony in Five Concerts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is back in Boston to lead his former band, the Boston Symphony, as guest conductor. He will conduct tonight's concert and the next two Friday-Saturday pairs, confining himself this week to the music of Brahms and that of Sibelius, whose 85th birthday occurs next month, and who has not been represented at the Symphony concerts since Dr. Koussevitzky left in the spring of 1949.

Most of the concerts of last summer's Berkshire festival were under Koussevitzky's direction and since then he has been vacationing in Arizona. Last season he "guested" in Cuba, Brazil, Israel, Italy, France and Belgium. This year, after having taken the Boston Symphony on a tour to New York and other cities, he will be one of the three conductors in charge of the tour of the Israel Philharmonic, and Boston will hear him this winter in one of the two concerts scheduled and either Mr. Bernstein or Mr. De Carvalho in the other.

Sunday afternoon Koussevitzky received the Boston music critics in his suite in the Ritz Carlton in one of the strangest interviews ever granted. It began as the blackout was commencing and most of it took place in total darkness. Asked about conditions aboard, the conductor said that musical life there was "not rich." People flock to concerts, though the price of them is disproportionately high, but the programs are far more conservative than those to which we are accustomed. Little new music is heard, even by the composers of those very countries. Most of the conducting is done by guests and these itinerant leaders confine themselves to what Koussevitzky called "Paradestuecke," or as we would say, show pieces. Such a course, he said, was more or less required of them, and he played chiefly the works of Beethoven, Brahms and Sibelius, putting in a little Prokofieff now and then.

Orchestral musicians in America, said Koussevitzky, "live like kings," some of them making almost twice as much money in a week as their European counterparts do in a month. Rehearsals are expensive and therefore scarce, though in Rome the players urged an extra one on him, saying that they would pay for it. In general the orchestras do not compare with ours.

Koussevitzky reiterated his plea for government support of music and the other arts. He had broached the matter to Roosevelt and also to Truman, who at least expressed their interest. In point of fact, there is an organization now working on the matter. "Our symphony orchestras," said Koussevitzky, "are our greatest treasures." He was sure the Boston Symphony would get from the public the considerable sum of money needed to carry it through the present season. He spoke in the kindest terms of his successor, Charles Munch, congratulating him for his interest in new music, a policy that had been followed by every conductor of the Boston Symphony. "If there is no new music," said Koussevitzky, "there cannot ever be old music."

Soon after his appearance with the Boston Symphony he will conduct the Israel Symphony in about 18 of its 50 or more concerts in the United States this season, with Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho, both proteges of his, taking the others. After that he returns to Europe (where, he reported, audiences are vastly more responsive than they are here) for more concerts, coming back to Tanglewood for the festival there this summer.

At this point, all of the interviewers note-less in the dark, the lights blazed on. And there sat Serge Koussevitzky in a grey herring bone suit, a blue shirt and a red tie, the whole giving him the astonishing appearance of a man half his years, and this, his sharp eyes, his bright expression and his vivacious attitude helped convey, too. We could do nothing but blink in the quick dazzle of the lights going on, but for most of us, it seemed to me, as we departed, the blink was caused by the incandescence of the man himself.

[161]

WESTFIELD, N.J
LEADER
11/21/50

Griffith Concert To Feature Brahms Work

Three of Johannes Brahms most revealing compositions have been chosen by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Mosque Theatre, Newark, Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in the first of the Griffith Music Foundation's series of symphony concerts.

The veteran conductor will open with the "Tragic Overture." Two major themes dominate this work. One is reflective of a great and brooding sorrow. The other provides an antidote of optimism.

The orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will also play two of the great symphonies written by Brahms. The symphonies will be No. 3 in F major and Symphony No. 1 in C minor and will be played in that order. These are two of the memorable compositions in which Brahms rose to the height of his powers in mastery of the architecture of the classic form.

Sometimes referred to as Brahms' "Eroica," the third symphony has been called one of the composer's most typically personal and important symphonic works. submility and grandeur are qualities of the first symphony, which has been called that composer's "Pathetique," but if it has a tragic grandeur it is something of the nobility of Greek drama rather than the frenzy achieved by Tschaikovsky.

BOSTON POST
NOV. 22, 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last night for the first time since the close of the 1948-49 season Serge Koussevitzky stood upon the platform of Symphony Hall and led the Boston Symphony in a concert on its home grounds. He had, of course, directed it in last summer's Berkshire Festival. Last evening's concert was the beginning of a two weeks' engagement as guest.

A year and a half is not a very long time and it was as though Koussevitzky had never been away. Everything was familiar: his appearance, his manner of conducting, the unique sound that the orchestra has under his direction, and also the program, drawn from the works of Brahms and Sibelius.

If these last are not Koussevitzky's two favorite composers, they are certainly two of his favorite composers, and they will both be represented, though by different works, on Friday and Saturday. Their pieces of last evening were, respectively, the Tragic Overture and Third Symphony, and the Second in D major, with its trick conclusion that never fails to bring down the house. It had this effect last evening, though the ovation did not last for any 25 minutes, as did the demonstration, according to the conductor's own testimony, that followed his performance of the piece in Havana last season.

The Tragic Overture is not one of Brahms' best things, but Koussevitzky made it say all that it has to say, and his performance of the Third Symphony was exceedingly eloquent, being both potent and polished in the true Koussevitzkian manner. And he does things to and for Sibelius that no one else could. The Second Symphony, aside from the lamenting slow movement, is rather paltry stuff but Koussevitzky makes a go of it. In spite of yourself, you are caught up by that crescendo at the end, and annoyed at yourself afterwards for being taken in by anything so obvious and unsubtle. When Koussevitzky first appeared last evening the audience rose in greeting and might have applauded him quite indefinitely had he not raised a restraining hand.

Koussevitzky Talks on Music—Mozart in Camb

Orchestras in Europe And America Compared

By Harold Rogers

[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky's opin- [illegible] the orchestras. Many European conductors are guests, appearing usually for only a week in any one place, sometimes two weeks at the most. He said that only a regular conductor can contribute to a growing culture.

"If we do not have the new works, we will not have the old ones," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "There are many good composers in postwar Europe who should be heard."

He is of the opinion that the quality of American orchestras is generally higher than that of foreign ones. He put the Brazilian Orchestra through 12 rehearsals before he was willing to have it perform in public. He tuned another orchestra for 20 minutes before all the instruments were on pitch. American players, he said, are treated like kings compared to musicians in Europe. The salaries abroad amount to about $125 per month while the cost of living is excessively high.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that he found the French National Orchestra best in quality and the Belgian Orchestra best for discipline. The Israel Orchestra has a rare group of first and second violins, he pointed out, but some of the other choirs are not so good.

When the Israel Orchestra comes to America for its tour this winter, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct 18 out of its 50 or 60 concerts, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct the others. One of these concerts will be held in Boston. Another in Phoenix, Ariz., where he makes his winter home, will mark his first conducting appearance there.

Dr. Koussevitzky stated that he is willing to help Detroit rebuild its orchestra, which collapsed last year, but that he will not accept a regular conductorship.

"I retired as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony because it was getting to be too much work for me," he explained. "Why should I accept another regular position?"

It was pointed out that he had been keeping himself quite active since his retirement.

"Ah, yes," he answered, smiling, "but that is deceptive. I have three and maybe four weeks' rest between engagements."

He said that he didn't see how the Detroit Orchestra could rebuild on a firm foundation unless it had a $5,000,000 endowment and owned its own hall. The demise of the Detroit Orchestra brought up the subject of government sponsorship of the arts, for which Dr. Koussevitzky has long been a champion. He has had two interviews with President Truman, the last of which was in January.

"The President was very interested," Dr. Koussevitzky reported, and then added that the war in Korea doubtless diverted the President's attention from the project.

"Our American orchestras are our greatest assets in art," he said, "and the government should support them." He felt that one reason American music is so little known or understood in Europe is because American orchestras are not sent abroad. He pointed out that we have visiting orchestras from Britain, France, or Israel, but that we send none across in exchange.

MUSIC

Tuesday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second program of the Tuesday series in Symphony Hall last night. The program:
Tragic Overture, Op. 81:
Symphony No. 3 in F, Op. 90....Brahms
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43....Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The sub-title to last night's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was indisputably The Return of the Conquering Hero.

For it was the first appearance as guest conductor (how strange that sounds!) of Serge Koussevitzky, who two years ago retired into the almost equally active role of guest conducting orchestras all over the world, and he was greeted with prolonged applause on the part of the rising audience as he sped youthfully to the conductor's stand. At length, with a gracious gesture bidding the audience to sit down, the 76-year old conductor turned to the orchestra to demonstrate once again the supreme accomplishment that is his: that of bringing music to life with quite indescribable beauty of sound.

Instantly, in the strings, there came a radiance, even an incandescence that Koussevitzky alone seems able to achieve; it is a miracle that combines sorcery and persuasiveness, hypnotism and infinite command. It shone as its purest in the Brahms' Third, a work, incidentally, that found Koussevitzky at the very top of his form as a re-creative artist of integrity and the orchestra at the very top of it as an ensemble of matchless quality. Here, knowing that he could not achieve the final sensation of a flamboyant conclusion (as in the Sibelius), he sought every really musical nuance of the work; there wasn't a moment of theatricality in the entire symphony. I don't know as I've ever heard the third movement so exquisitely done nor the finale so distinguished in its musical essence.

With Sibelius' Second Symphony, long one of Koussevitzky's "big" pieces, the conductor, as if he needed to, tried in the closing movement to astonish his audience with ever greater efforts. He astonished his audience all right, but it diminished what musical value this work might have—and it can be argued that it doesn't have too much. Be that as it may, it certainly did not obscure the fact that Koussevitzky, who may well be forgiven for wanting to show the home town folks that retirement for him is merely graduation to infinitely greater scope, is the absolute master of the orchestra he brought into world eminence, and one of the musical immortals of his—or any other—time. And so, for Serge Koussevitzky, welcome home!

ky Acclaimed at Symphony

Conductor on Return Plays Works by Brahms, Sibelius

By Harold Rogers

Serge Koussevitzky mounted the podium in Symphony Hall last night for the first time since he retired from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August, 1949. He returned in a sunburst of success that matched the sweeping, triumphant theme from the last movement of Sibelius's Second Symphony—the final selection on his program.

Hale, vigorous, and of youthful agility, Dr. Koussevitzky faced his old orchestra and wrought the same old magic. He filled the hall with a golden luminosity of sound and great emotional warmth. His strings had the familiar fiery lushness, his woodwinds their monochromic unity, his brasses their orotund utterances. And yet while these things were as they used to be there was an additional element in last night's concert that made it very special. It is not easy to state in words, but briefly it is this—Koussevitzky is home again. . . .

Brahms and Sibelius are Koussevitzky favorites; but this year being Sibelius's eighty-fifth anniversary, there is another good reason to emphasize the titanic compositions by the Finnish master.

After an incisive and dramatic reading of Brahms' "Tragic" Overture, Dr. Koussevitzky launched into Brahms' Third Symphony in F major and brought out a limpid beauty, particularly in the first three movements, that caressed the ear, soothed the senses, and exalted the spirit.

In the Sibelius Second Dr. Koussevitzky produced an intense response to the magnificent storm clouds and the seething moods of foreboding. He carefully built the two gigantic climaxes of the final movement, which precede the stately melody, with an inevitable emotional and dynamic crescendo. He made the mountainous coda gloriously radiant.

While abroad last winter Dr. Koussevitzky had a visit with an old friend, a noted European conductor.

"I want you to advise me," the conductor said. "They want me to play some Sibelius because it is Sibelius's eighty-fifth year. But I don't know any Sibelius. What should I play?"

"I will tell you," Koussevitzky answered. "If you want great music, play the Seventh. If you want a great success, play the Second!"

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1950

Koussevitzky Makes Plea for Federal Aid for Arts

By CYRUS DURGIN

"I tell you again and again and again, we must have government support of the arts in this country," declared Serge Koussevitzky. For emphasis, he rapped his knuckles sharply on the coffee table in his suite at the Hotel Ritz-Carlton. "The culture of any country is judged by how much it does for art, especially the musical art.

"We should have a Cabinet department of art, to include music, painting, sculpture, literature—all the arts. I prepared an outline of such a program and spoke first to President Roosevelt, then twice to President Truman. Each man was very much interested. But the war intervened and so far nothing has been done. But government support will come. It must come."

This pronouncement came after the conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been telling of his musical adventures in Cuba, South America, Europe and Israel since he left his Boston post a year ago last Spring. Now Koussevitzky is back to conduct the Boston Symphony for the next two weeks, his first appearance with this orchestra, apart from the Berkshire Festival, since he left.

Koussevitzky found many good orchestras in Europe, but he feels that their system of few permanent conductors and many guest leaders does not work for the best interests of their orchestras.

Finds Interest in Israel

In Israel he found perhaps the most public interest of all.

"One day after I had finished a morning rehearsal with the Israel Philharmonic, and had gone home to lunch in a suburb of Tel Aviv, I went out for a walk. Soon I came upon two laborers digging a trench. I said 'Hello' to them, and they stopped and looked at me. One man climbed up and said: 'Mr. Koussevitzky, I want to tell you how much I enjoyed your concert the night before last.' 'You were there?' I asked in some amazement. 'Yes,' nodded both men, and then one said, 'Music is my life, and for music I would spend the last money I had.'

"Now where else would you find such devotion to music as that? Also, the concert hall in Tel Aviv seats only 1100 people.

"To satisfy all the public, you have to repeat one program at least eight times. Could you repeat one program even three times in a gigantic city like New York?"

Following his appearances with the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky will join his proteges Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho in conducting the concerts to be given in the United States by the Israel Philharmonic. Of the two programs to be given in Boston, Koussevitzky will lead one. He will direct 17 more in other cities, the last of which will be Phoenix, Ariz., where he and Mrs. Koussevitzky now have a home. When that concert is finished, he will enjoy a rest.

By next Spring Koussevitzky, who doesn't stop working for very long, will be off again to Brussels and Amsterdam, and from there he will go to Paris to conduct a concert aimed to help composers all over the world. That concert will be under auspices of UNESCO.

PARKERSBURG, W. Va.—Judge Forbes R. Hiehle was about to fine David L. Brown for an automobile collision when he learned it was Brown who had called police. Judge Hiehle suspended the fine and said, "It's a bonus for your honesty."

ELKHART, IND.
TRUTH
NOV 25 1950

AUDIENCE AT REHEARSAL

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's orchestra, because of a completely-subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoon were similarly offered to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular "subscription" concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the orchestra's pension fund.

[162]

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 25 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sixth program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: "Pohjola's Daughter," Op. 49; Symphony No. 5 in 1-flat, Op. 82, Sibelius. Symphony No. 4 in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I have come to the conclusion that what makes Koussevitzky The Koussevitzky is the fact that he is in love with his audience.

This can be argued and that can be argued; this may be too fast and that may be too slow; this may be too flamboyant and that too theatrical; the orchestral playing may be better or it may be worse. But it cannot be argued that Koussevitzky does not convey in every bar of the music he conducts his exaltation in the act of communicating what he knows and what he feels to his listeners. And this ardor, this devotion, this all-consuming passion to achieve contact with his people, instantly conveys itself across that strange nameless gulf between performer and listener.

"Listen," he seems to be radiating, "listen to this beautiful sound," and again "hear this, friends, this is an incomparable moment." You cannot sit unmoved in the face of such a romantic stimulus no matter what reservations your more critical faculties may be making at the same moment. It is this ability to seduce, to allure, to captivate and to make contact that sets Koussevitzky apart.

If he were interested in musical matters and musical matters alone, as Mr. Munch is, he could not do what he does. But he loves his audience, he loves the act of communicating, he loves the response and the greetings of old friends in the green room and all the apparatus and excitement of the occasion. This is as warming to the audience as a friendly smile, for the audience loves to be taken into the performers' confidence and to be loved, too.

Yesterday it was all Sibelius and Brahms, and both at their most feverish at that. "Pohjola's Daughter," unheard here in 15 years or more, does not wear terrible well as its repeated climaxes for brass, its ostentatious instrumentation throughout, and its constant striving for intense description, seems a little Popsy in character, like a more extended Finlandia. But it is effective enough and agreeable enough, and certainly a less pretentious piece that the Fifth Symphony, which has not worn well at all.

I found, however, the slow movement—in which Sibelius' only motive seems purely musical where the other three suggest playing to the gallery—exceedingly enjoyable. It is an extended elaboration of a catchy five-note motto that appears and reappears, turning up here and there in unexpected places and in unexpected ways, yet it never palls and it never cloys. Moreover, it evokes atmosphere, that singularly clear yet blue and brooding sound one associates with the north, though why it does so I am at a loss to explain.

However, it is to be doubted if anyone would ever associate this music, even if they didn't know who did it, with the Mediterranean. Both "Pohjola's Daughter" and the Fifth Symphony found Koussevitzky in his most urgent mood, now dark wtih emotion, now fiercely driving, now beside himself with jubilation at the sounds he produced in the orchestra, which gave him its very considerable all.

Much the same could be said for the Brahms First Symphony, a work that never fails to score with the audience. Koussevitzky lavished his most radiant attention on the soaring slow movement to project the string sound that will always be associated hereabouts with his name, but he had enough in reserve (and how he does what he does physically will remain forever a mystery to me!) to finish the work at the peak of his form. The audience, as it did on Tuesday, gave him a rising welcome and remained to make a demonstration, which for the discreet Friday audience is seldom done.

Next week Koussevitzky offers the first American performance of Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Innocents" with narrator, soloists and the Chorus Pro Musica, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 25 1950

Koussevitzky Still Proves Master in Boston Appearance

Boston—Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon in his first guest appearance in the regular Friday series since his retirement two years ago. The greeting he received from his old audience was tumultuous, as was each burst of applause all afternoon.

He chose a program which best suits the Koussevitzkian talents and which had no difficulty in suiting the audience. The Symphony No. 1 in C Minor by Brahms and "Pohjola's Daughter," a symphonic fantasia by Jan Sibelius sandwiched Sibelius' Fifth Symphony in E Flat.

* * *

THE TWO-YEAR interim has served to only further make the heart grow fonder as far as Koussevitzky is concerned, and if the orchestra has not made much time in the last season, its director-emeritus certainly has.

Since terminating his conductorship in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky has thrown himself into a schedule which would undermine a lesser constitution. Immediately after the 1949 Berkshire Festival, he performed a set of concerts in Hollywood Bowl and these appearances were followed by concerts in South America. He conducted the Brazil Symphony Orchestra in Rio de Janeiro and performances in Havana were followed with concerts in Rome, Brussels, London and Israel. This season he will conduct the Boston Orchestra in appearance at home and on tour. Subsequently he will guide the Ierael Philharmonic on its first American tour.

* * *

"POHJOLA'S DAUGHTER" was first performed in this country at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union in Norfolk, Conn., with the composer Sibelius conducting.

It is a setting based on a mythological epic of Finland by the name of Kalevala which has to do with a damsel who, by use of her wit, maanger to escape marriage with an old crone and marries the much younger brother of her suitor. It ends unhappily, nevertheless, for she displeases him and is untimely devoured by wolves.

Sibelius does very nicely with the musical text of this sordid tale, however, and the color tones in a well integrated orchestra make an interesting vehicle for a man like Koussevitzky.

* * *

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONY and the Brahms First Symphony were both played with the brilliance which is and always has been Koussevitzky's. The critics often thought that he played too much Brahms and altogether too much Sibelius when he conducted regularly in Boston, but the people who pay to get in seem satisfied enough. Koussevitzky does these things beautifully and it is difficult to see why anyone should complain about them as long as they stay fresh and exciting.

Dr. Koussevitzky will again conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon. The program then will consist of the first American performance of "The Mystery of the Innocent Saints" for chorus and orchestra by Barraud and the Second Symphony by Jan Sibelius.—F. S.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 25 1950

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony; Conducts Sibelius and Brahms

By CYRUS DURGIN

If you sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, listening to Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and the First Symphony of Brahms, you could have thought time was standing still. For Serge Koussevitzky was up on the conductor's stand in front of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it might have been 1940. To be sure the orchestra was seated on a nearly flat stage, and the conductor is almost white now, as he was gray then.

But it all sounded much the same. Those strong, ocean-deep string sonorities; that pronounced weight he likes from basses and woodwinds; the strong kettle-drums and the urgent intensity of the brass. Not quite the same, for 18 months have passed since Koussevitzky last stood there (until last Tuesday evening), and no two conductors have either the same ear or the same approach to any music. Which, of course, is fortunate, for how monotonous that would be if all were alike!

At his first entrance Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted by the orchestra rising to their feet, quickly followed by the audience. Bows, smiles, applause, and then that familiar gesture from the trim little man with the ruddy face, that spreading gesture which asked all to be seated again. Two hours later, the applause was five times louder and longer, after the triumphant C major proclamations of Brahms' First Symphony. Back to the stage, and again and again and again returned Koussevitzy. Twice he bade the orchestra rise and share applause with him, waved to the second balcony, bowed again, smiled again, and disappeared.

It was good that Mr. Koussevitzky, now music director emeritus, and no "guest" (for as Henry C. Cabot said when Koussevitzky retired at the end of April, 1949: "No father ever can be a guest in his own house"), it was good that Mr. Koussevitzky began with Sibelius. The Finnish composer has suffered a decline in popularity in late years which is both unjust and unfortunate. Furthermore, Mr. Koussevitzky is actually a specialist with the sombre colors, the oftentimes peculiar rhythms, the half-tones and reticent expressions of this unique, remote composer. This quickly was proved anew with the long-absent fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter."

But with the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, the peak of the afternoon was reached. Here Koussevitzky cannot be excelled, and perhaps Sibelius never afterward excelled himself, either. This difficult work, with its small mass of basic material, its crafty alteration of that material, the oddity of rhythmic detail, the cross-accents, the insistent obstinati and the asymmetrical melodies, this is a remarkable symphony, indeed. Those who sell it short do not know its interior workings, and perhaps never really have absorbed its fascinating use of the orchestra.

As for Brahms, the First Symphony sounded well in the first three movements, but Koussevitzky's so personal reading of the finale, with all his arbitrary changes of tempo and his way of blowing up the sound, seemed an exaggeration after a much more classical reading of the same score in the not so distant past. All the same, Koussevitzky is unique and at his best he, too, is unexcellable.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 25 1950

THE Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall on Wednesday of last week, with Charles Münch in command. It put on a long, solid program of well-played music, opening with an elegant reading of Handel's "Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks," and winding up with Beethoven's Third Symphony. In between, there were two fairly modern works. One was Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, a suite based on a score he composed in 1928 for a musical drama by Paul Valéry that had to do with Amphion, son of Zeus and Antiope. The beginning and the end—the quieter, more lyric sections—impressed me the most. The middle section, during the performance of which, in the Valéry play, Amphion invented music and architecture, is descriptive of the action it was meant to accompany and emphasize, but is a bit tiresome by itself, being crude and repetitive. A nice touch, and one that fitted well into the texture of the whole piece, was the use of an alto saxophone to represent the lyre of the legend the composition is based on.

Roussel's Second Suite (Opus 43), from his ballet score "Bacchus et Ariane," was the other novelty of the evening, and it was beautifully played. A dexterous work made up of several short sections, it seemed to me to lack content but to have a high, attractive polish. Its chief interest lies in its orchestral coloration, for the instrumentation is alive and provocative. —DOUGLAS WATT

217

OR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1950 Art—Music—Theater 11

Koussevitzky Plays Sibelius and Brahms

Music Director Emeritus of Symphony Hailed on Return

By Harold Rogers

An old friend gave us the music of old friends yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in another Sibelius and Brahms program, as he did last Tuesday evening. He has chosen for the week end concerts two works by Sibelius — the Symphonic Fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the Fifth Symphony—and one by Brahms—the Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

This was the first Friday afternoon concert played by Dr. Koussevitzky since he retired in 1949 from the active leadership of the Boston Symphony. His audience gave him a rising welcome, and tendered long and demonstrative ovations at the close of each symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky now holds the title of Music Director Emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Based on the eighth canto of the "Kalevala," the Sibelius tone poem, last played by the Boston Symphony when Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it 15 years ago presents in shimmering sound the beauty of the maid of Pohja. Seated high on a glistening rainbow, spinning with a golden shuttle and a silver comb, she sets a difficult feat for the hero who adores her. Unable to accomplish it and thus win her hand, he proudly turns away.

Only epic poetry can justly serve the lofty conceptions of Finland's great master, now celebrating his eighty-fifth year. Indeed, "Pohjola's Daughter" is one of some dozen works by Sibelius that find their origin in the "Kalevala." Dr. Koussevitzky effectively captured the otherworldly mood, the somber sadness, the stately heroism.

The only unfamiliar music that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct here this winter is Henry Barraud's oratorio, "Le Mystère des Saints Innocents." He will give the work its first Boston performances next week on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon; for this he will augment the orchestra with the Chorus pro Musica, trained by Alfred Nash Patterson, their conductor.

Otherwise his programs consist of music that exercises the intellect far less than the emotions, simply because we know the music so well. But as we never tire of our camaraderie with good old friends, so we never tire of hearing superlative Koussevitzky readings of the Sibelius Fifth or the Brahms First.

In both symphonies yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky re-created the magnificent tonal architecture, the noble sentiment, the resplendent sweep of the final movements. His return to the Symphony Hall podium has been a remarkable demonstration of dynamic musicianship.

[163]

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 25 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston [illegible] orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sixth program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program: "Pohjola's Daughter," Op. 49; Symphony No. 5 in 1-flat, Op. 82, Sibelius. Symphony No. 4 in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

I have come to the conclusion that what makes Koussevitzky The Koussevitzky is the fact that he is in love with his audience.

This can be argued and that can be argued; this may be too fast and that may be too slow; this may be too flamboyant and that too theatrical; the orchestral playing may be better or it may be worse. But it cannot be argued that Koussevitzky does not convey in every bar of the music he conducts his exaltation in the act of communicating what he knows and what he feels to his listeners. And this ardor, this devotion, this all-consuming passion to achieve contact with his people, instantly conveys itself across that strange nameless gulf between performer and listener.

"Listen," he seems to be radiating, "listen to this beautiful sound," and again "hear this, friends, this is an incomparable moment." You cannot sit unmoved in the face of such a romantic stimulus no matter what reservations your more critical faculties may be making at the same moment. It is this ability to seduce, to allure, to captivate and to make contact that sets Koussevitzky apart.

If he were interested in musical matters and musical matters alone, as Mr. Munch is, he could not do what he does. But he loves his audience, he loves the act of communicating, he loves the response and the greetings of old friends in the green room and all the apparatus and excitement of the occasion. This is as warming to the audience as a friendly smile, for the audience loves to be taken into the performers' confidence and to be loved, too.

Yesterday it was all Sibelius and Brahms, and both at their most feverish at that. "Pohjola's Daughter," unheard here in 15 years or more, does not wear terrible well as its repeated climaxes for brass, its ostentatious instrumentation throughout, and its constant striving for intense description, seems a little Popsy in character, like a more extended Finlandia. But it is effective enough and agreeable enough, and certainly a less pretentious piece that the Fifth Symphony, which has not worn well at all.

I found, however, the slow movement—in which Sibelius' only motive seems purely musical where the other three suggest playing to the gallery—exceedingly enjoyable. It is an extended elaboration of a catchy five-note motto that appears and reappears, turning up here and there in unexpected places and in unexpected ways, yet it never palls and it never cloys. Moreover, it evokes atmosphere, that singularly clear yet blue and brooding sound one associates with the north, though why it does so I am at a loss to explain.

However, it is to be doubted if anyone would ever associate this music, evén if they didn't know who did it, with the Mediterranean. Both "Pohjola's Daughter" and the Fifth Symphony found Koussevitzky in his most urgent mood, now dark wtih emotion, now fiercely driving, now beside himself with jubilation at the sounds he produced in the orchestra, which gave him its very considerable all.

Much the same could be said for the Brahms First Symphony, a work that never fails to score with the audience. Koussevitzky lavished his most radiant attention on the soaring slow movement to project the string sound that will always be associate hereabouts with his name, but he has enough in reserve (and how he does what he does physically will remain forever a mystery to me!) to finish the work at the peak of his form. The audience, as it did on Tuesday, gave him a rising welcome and remained to make a demonstration, which for the discreet Friday audience is seldom done.

Next week Koussevitzky offers the first American performance of Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Innocents" with narrators, soloists and the Chorus Pro Musica, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 25 1950

Koussevitzky Still Proves Master in Boston Appearance

Boston—Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday [illegible] in his first guest appearance in the regular Friday series since his retirement two years ago. The greeting he received from his old audience was tumultuous, as was each burst of applause all afternoon.

He chose a program which best suits the Koussevitzkian talents and which had no difficulty in suiting the audience. The Symphony No. 1 in C Minor by Brahms and "Pohjola's Daughter," a symphonic fantasia by Jan Sibelius sandwiched Sibelius' Fifth Symphony in E Flat.

* * *

THE TWO-YEAR interim has served to only further make the heart grow fonder as far as Koussevitzky is concerned, and if the orchestra has not made much time in the last season, its director-emeritus certainly has.

Since terminating his conductorship in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky has thrown himself into a schedule which would undermine a lesser constitution. Immediately after the 1949 Berkshire Festival, he performed a set of concerts in Hollywood Bowl and these appearances were followed by concerts in South America. He conducted the Brazil Symphony Orchestra in Rio de Janeiro and performances in Havana were followed with concerts in Rome, Brussels, London and Israel. This season he will conduct the Boston Orchestra in appearance at home and on tour. Subsequently he will guide the Israel Philharmonic on its first American tour.

* * *

"POHJOLA'S DAUGHTER" was first performed in this country at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union in Norfolk, Conn., with the composer Sibelius conducting.

It is a setting based on a mythological epic of Finland by the name of Kalevala which has to do with a damsel who, by use of her wit, maanger to escape marriage with an old crone and marries the much younger brother of her suitor. It ends unhappily, nevertheless, for she displeases him and is untimely devoured by wolves.

Sibelius does very nicely with the musical text of this sordid tale, however, and the color tones in a well integrated orchestra make an interesting vehicle for a man like Koussevitzky.

* * *

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONY and the Brahms First Symphony were both played with the brilliance which is and always has been Koussevitzky's. The critics often thought that he played too much Brahms and altogether too much Sibelius when he conducted regularly in Boston, but the people who pay to get in seem satisfied enough. Koussevitzky does these things beautifully and it is difficult to see why anyone should complain about them as long as they stay fresh and exciting.

Dr. Koussevitzky will again conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon. The program then will consist of the first American performance of "The Mystery of the Innocent Saints" for chorus and orchestra by Barraud and the Second Symphony by Jan Sibelius.—F. S.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 25 1950

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns to Symphony; Conducts Sibelius and Brahms

By CYRUS DURGIN

If you sat in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, listening to Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and the First Symphony of Brahms, you could have thought time was standing still. For Serge Koussevitzky was up on the conductor's stand in front of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it might have been 1940. To be sure the orchestra was seated on a nearly flat stage, and the conductor is almost white now, as he was gray then.

But it all sounded much the same: Those strong, ocean-deep string sonorities; that pronounced weight he likes from basses and woodwinds; the strong kettle-drums and the urgent intensity of the brass. Not quite the same, for 18 months have passed since Koussevitzky last stood there (until last Tuesday evening), and no two conductors have either the same ear or the same approach to any music. Which, of course, is fortunate, for how monotonous that would be if all were alike!

At his first entrance Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted by the orchestra rising to their feet, quickly followed by the audience. Bows, smiles, applause, and then that familiar gesture from the trim little man with the ruddy face, that spreading gesture which asked all to be seated again. Two hours later, the applause was five times louder and longer, after the triumphant C major proclamations of Brahms' First Symphony. Back to the stage, and again and again and again returned Koussevitzy. Twice he bade the orchestra rise and share applause with him, waved to the second balcony, bowed again, smiled again, and disappeared.

It was good that Mr. Koussevitzky, now music director emeritus, and no "guest" (for as Henry C. Cabot said when Koussevitzky retired at the end of April, 1949: "No father ever can be a guest in his own house"), it was good that Mr. Koussevitzky began with Sibelius. The Finnish composer has suffered a decline in popularity in late years, which is both unjust and unfortunate. Furthermore, Mr. Koussevitzky is actually a specialist with the sombre colors, the oftentimes peculiar rhythms, the half-tones and reticent expressions of this unique, remote composer. This quickly was proved anew with the long-absent fantasis, "Pohjola's Daughter."

But with the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, the peak of the afternoon was reached. Here Koussevitzky cannot be excelled, and perhaps Sibelius never afterward excelled himself, either. This difficult work, with its small mass of basic material, its crafty alteration of that material, the oddity of rhythmic detail, the cross-accents, the insistent obstinati and the asymmetrical melodies, this is a remarkable symphony, indeed. Those who sell it short do not know its interior workings, and perhaps never really have absorbed its fascinating use of the orchestra.

As for Brahms, the First Symphony sounded well in the first three movements, but Koussevitzky's so personal reading of the finale, with all his arbitrary changes of tempo and his way of blowing up the sound, seemed an exaggeration after a much more classical reading of the same score in the not so distant past. All the same, Koussevitzky is unique and at his best he, too, is unexcellable.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 25 1950

THE Boston Symphony came to Carnegie Hall on Wednesday of last week, with Charles Münch in command. It put on a long, solid program of well-played music, opening with an elegant reading of Handel's "Suite from the Music for the Royal Fireworks," and winding up with Beethoven's Third Symphony. In between, there were two fairly modern works. One was Honegger's Prelude, Fugue, and Postlude, a suite based on a score he composed in 1928 for a musical drama by Paul Valéry that had to do with Amphion, son of Zeus and Antiope. The beginning and the end—the quieter, more lyric sections—impressed me the most. The middle section, during the performance of which, in the Valéry play, Amphion invented music and architecture, is descriptive of the action it was meant to accompany and emphasize, but is a bit tiresome by itself, being crude and repetitive. A nice touch, and one that fitted well into the texture of the whole piece, was the use of an alto saxophone to represent the lyre of the legend the composition is based on.

Roussel's Second Suite (Opus 43), from his ballet score "Bacchus et Ariane," was the other novelty of the evening, and it was beautifully played. A dexterous work made up of several short sections, it seemed to me to lack content but to have a high, attractive polish. Its chief interest lies in its orchestral coloration, for the instrumentation is alive and provocative.—DOUGLAS WATT

34

Koussevitzky Plays Sibelius and Brahms

Music Director Emeritus of Symphony Hailed on Return

By Harold Rogers

An old friend gave us the music of old friends yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in another Sibelius and Brahms program, as he did last Tuesday evening. He has chosen for the week end concerts two works by Sibelius — the Symphonic Fantasia, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the Fifth Symphony—and one by Brahms—the Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

This was the first Friday afternoon concert played by Dr. Koussevitzky since he retired in 1949 from the active leadership of the Boston Symphony. His audience gave him a rising welcome, and tendered long and demonstrative ovations at the close of each symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky now holds the title of Music Director Emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Based on the eighth canto of the "Kalevala," the Sibelius tone poem, last played by the Boston Symphony when Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it 15 years ago presents in shimmering sound the beauty of the maid of Pohja. Seated high on a glistening rainbow, spinning with a golden shuttle and a silver comb, she sets a difficult feat for the hero who adores her. Unable to accomplish it, and thus win her hand, he proudly turns away.

Only epic poetry can justly serve the lofty conceptions of Finland's great master, now celebrating his eighty-fifth year. Indeed, "Pohjola's Daughter" is one of some dozen works by Sibelius that find their origin in the "Kalevala." Dr. Koussevitzky effectively captured the otherworldly mood, the somber sadness, the stately heroism.

The only unfamiliar music that Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct here this winter is Henry Barraud's oratorio, "Le Mystère des Saints Innocents." He will give the work its first Boston performances next week on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon; for this he will augment the orchestra with the Chorus pro Musica, trained by Alfred Nash Patterson, their conductor.

Otherwise his programs consist of music that exercises the intellect far less than the emotions, simply because we know the music so well. But as we never tire of our camaraderie with good old friends, so we never tire of hearing superlative Koussevitzky readings of the Sibelius Fifth or the Brahms First.

In both symphonies yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky re-created the magnificent tonal architecture, the noble sentiment, the resplendent sweep of the final movements. His return to the Symphony Hall podium has been a remarkable demonstration of dynamic musicianship.

[163]

La semaine à RADIO-CANADA

L'HEBDOMADAIRE DU RÉSEAU FRANÇAIS

DU 26 NOV. AU 2 DÉC. 1950

Vol. I, No Montréal $2 par année

Le retour de Charles Münch

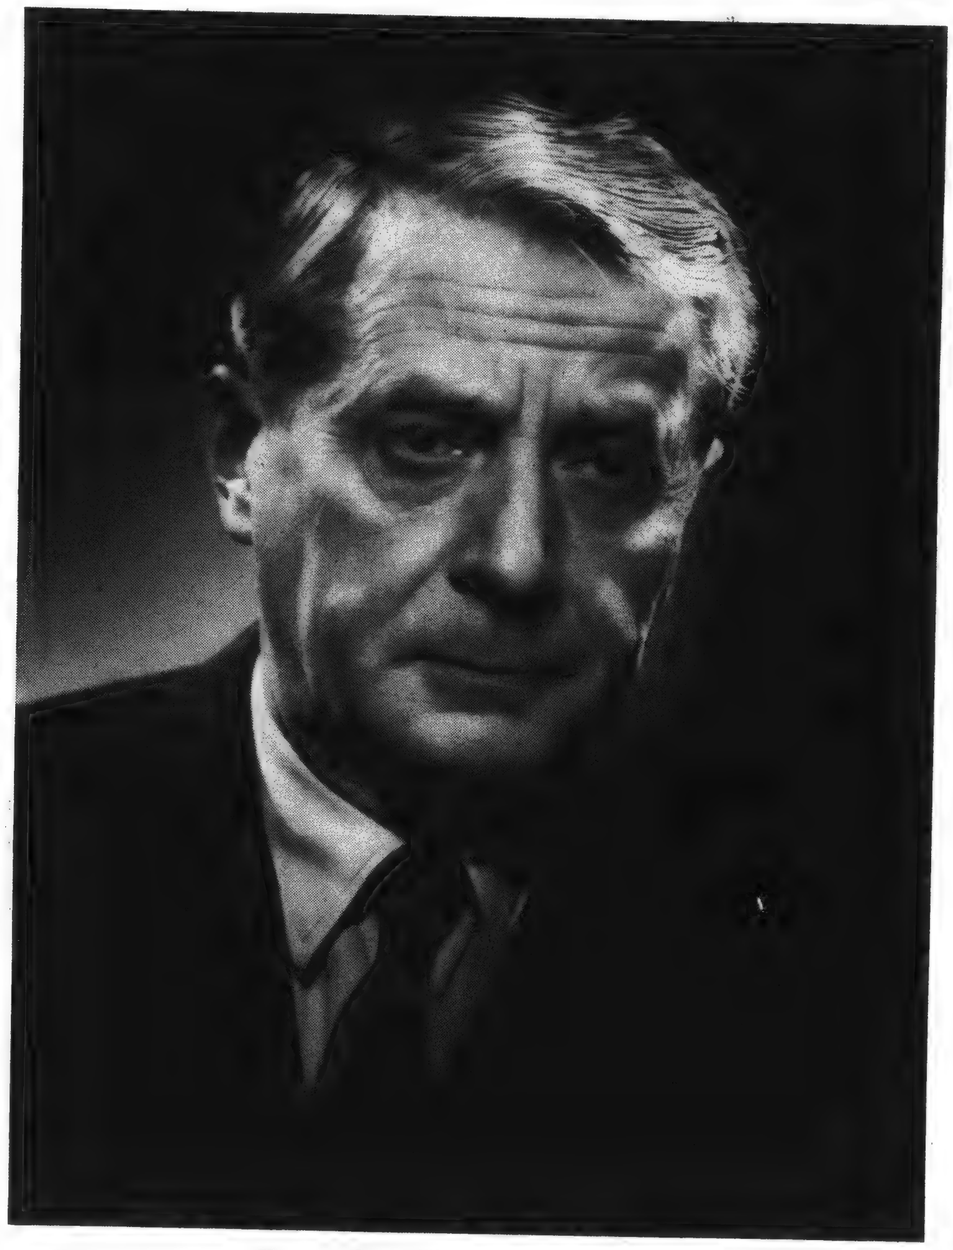
(Page 2)

Le Forum de l'opéra et son directeur

(Page 3)

Les Compagnons de la musique à Radio-Carabin

(Page 8)



Un grand musicien : Charles Münch.

UN chef d'orchestre qui jouit d'un très grand prestige, Charles Münch, dirigera l'orchestre des Concerts symphoniques de Montréal, mardi soir, à 8 h. 30. Ce maître français, qui a succédé à Koussevitzky à la direction de l'orchestre de Boston, nous fera entendre la Symphonie fantastique de Berlioz.

●

Depuis la reprise des émisions du Metropolitan Opera, le samedi après-midi, les auditeurs peuvent participer au forum qui occupe les entreactes et que dirige, depuis dix ans, M. Roger Develuy. Il leur suffit d'envoyer des séries de questions qui seront soumises aux invités. Cette semaine, le Metropolitan présentera La Traviata de Verdi.

●

L'un des meilleurs écrivains français de la jeune génération, Pierre Emmanuel, nous a visités récemment à titre de directeur du service canadien de la Radiodiffusion française. Il nous parlera de ses travaux et de deux poètes dans trois entretiens, dont le premier sera entendu mercredi.

●

Le programme dramatique de la semaine comprend des pièces de deux écrivains contemporains réputés : le Théâtre de Radio-Collège nous offrira, dimanche, Un Inspecteur vous demande de J. B. Priestley, avec Jean-Pierre Masson; le Théâtre Ford présentera, de son côté, Une faible femme de Jacques Deval, avec Yvette Brind'Amour, René Verne et Jean-Louis Roux.

●

André Audet est l'un de nos écrivains qui a le plus écrit pour la radio. On le connaît surtout par ses contes pour enfants et ses spectacles. Un article de ce numéro nous apporte des précisions sur sa carrière et sur son oeuvre.

●

Deux émisions de variétés retiendront l'attention des auditeurs : Radio-Carabin, qui nous fera connaître, mercredi, Les compagnons de la musique, et Coup de clairon dont la vedette sera, jeudi, Fernand Martel.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
NOV 26 1950

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, E Minor, Opus 98; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor (Victor, LM 1086, one 12-inch LP record). A conventional interpretation of Brahms' Fourth, distinguished by the fine tonal qualities of the Boston Symphony rather than by any new revelation of the music.

Schubert: Quintet in A Major ("The Trout"), for piano and strings; members of the Budapest Quartet, with Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianist, and Georges Moleux, bass (Columbia ML 4317, one 12-inch LP record). A competent but scarcely inspired performance of Schubert's most famous chamber music composition. It is hard to say just what the lack is, but it does not sparkle to the extent that is should.

A. C.

Charles Munch

comes of a notable Strasbourg family. His father, Ernest Munch, was the teacher of the famous organist-philosopher, Albert Schweitzer whom he introduced to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Mr. Munch began his career as a violinist and, before turning to conducting, held the distinguished part of concert-master of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra.

He left Leipzig in 1932 and took up residence in Paris, where he made his debut as a conductor in 1933. In 1935 he was appointed professor at the Ecole Normale de Musique and two years later succeeded Philippe Gaubert as permanent conductor of the famous Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, a post he held until coming to this continent.

[164]

certs Symphoniques de Montréal que l'on entendra mardi soir.
Symphonie fantastique de Berlioz, sous la direction de Charles Münch.

ie fantastique

ntastique, opus 14a, t une oeuvre qui ne
ner et de nous sur-
audition. Si l'on terminée en 1829, peine après la mort
un doute nous est
de son auteur.
dans la Fantastique
Wagner ni Richard ont à surpasser, au
sance et couleur so-poème symphonique
dans cette symphonie
leit-motiv est aussi effet troublant. Il la Bien-aimée que
diverses formes dans la symphonie.
avement. Rêveries et l'état déprimé d'un
Le second. Un bal, une artiste au milieu d'une fête mondaine où il retrouve s bien-aimée. C'est ensuite la Scène a champs et la Marche au supplice dan laquelle le musicien rêve qu'il a tué s bien-aimée et qu'on le conduit au lie de l'exécution. Le mouvement final Songe d'une nuit de sabbat, décrit l passage du musicien au milieu de so cières et de monstres effrayants. De rires grotesques sont entendus et l thème de la bien-aimée revient mai cette fois, il a perdu sa beauté et s noblesse, et il résonne comme un air d danse vulgaire et grotesque. La dans continue et bientôt le glas funèbr sonne, suivi du Dies Irae . . . Les deu thèmes sont ensuite entendus simult nément puis arrive le final, indescrip tible et effrayant.

Une grande oeuvre et un grand ch d'orchestre seront donc les caractéris ques du concert du 28, qui sera tran mis directement de l'auditorium le Pl teau, à 8 h. 30 du soir.

DE "NOS FUTURES ÉTOILES"

Futures Etoiles est une innovation aux concerts-concours diffu à 8 heures, sur le réseau Français de Radio-Canada. On reconn teurs qui accompagnent les vedettes et qui interprètent de extra omédies musicales. Ce sont (de gauche à droite): Claire Lamarc ernande Chiocchio, Constance Lambert; (2e rangée, même ordr ndré Rousseau, Andrée Lescot, Michèle Bonhomme; (3e rangé
Gagnon, Robert Savoie, Guy Piché et Fernand Martel.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL. TIMES
NOV 26 1950

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, E Minor, Opus 98: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor (Victor, LM 1086, one 12-inch LP record). A conventional interpretation of Brahms' Fourth, distinguished by the fine tonal qualities of the Boston Symphony rather than by any new revelation of the music.

Schubert: Quintet in A Major ("The Trout"), for piano and strings; members of the Budapest Quartet, with Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianist, and Georges Moleux, bass (Columbia ML 4317, one 12-inch LP record). A competent but scarcely inspired performance of Schubert's most famous chamber music composition. It is hard to say just what the lack is, but it does not sparkle to the extent that is should. A.G.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
NOV 25 1950

Charles Munch to Conduct Two Concerts by Orchestra

Charles Munch, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct the next two pairs of concerts to be given by the Orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques. Mr. Munch will be here on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, November 28 and 29 and December 5 and 6, concluding the first half of the society's season.

On his appointment last year as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in succession to Serge Koussivitzky, Mr. Munch refused all guest engagements in accordance with the standing rule of the great musical institution he now heads. The local society was proud to announce that the conductor made an exception in the case of Montreal.

Charles Munch

Mr. Munch made his first appearance in Montreal as guest conductor with Les Concerts Symphoniques during the season of 1946-1947. This was just after he made his debut in North America with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, an event regarded as one of the most significant in post war music on this continent.

The eminent Boston conductor comes of a notable Strasbourg family. His father, Ernest Munch, was the teacher of the famous organist-philosopher, Albert Schweitzer whom he introduced to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Mr. Munch began his career as a violinist and, before turning to conducting, held the distinguished part of concert-master of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra.

He left Leipzig in 1932 and took up residence in Paris, where he made his debut as a conductor in 1933. In 1935 he was appointed professor at the Ecole Normale de Musique and two years later succeeded Philippe Gaubert as permanent conductor of the famous Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire, a post he held until coming to this continent.

[164]

Charles Münch dirigera la "Symphonie fantastique"

Le maître français nous fera entendre l'oeuvre de Berlioz au concert symphonique de mardi soir.

L'un des plus grands chefs d'orchestre reviendra diriger l'orchestre des Concerts symphoniques de Montréal, mardi le 28 novembre, à 8 h. 30 du soir. Il s'agit de Charles Münch, le réputé musicien français, maintenant attaché en permanence à l'orchestre symphonique de Boston.

C'est pendant la dernière guerre que le nom de Charles Münch commença à prendre un caractère vraiment international. Auparavant, il avait surtout concentré son activité en France, où il avait débuté comme chef d'orchestre en 1932.

Né à Strasbourg en 1891, Charles Münch est alsacien d'origine. Son oncle était organiste et professeur à Strasbourg. Après de solides études musicales avec ses parents, il entra au Conservatoire de Paris où il étudia le violon avec Lucien Capet. En 1919, il était nommé professeur au Conservatoire de Paris et violon-solo de l'orchestre de sa ville natale.

Les débuts

Attiré par la direction d'orchestre, il se rendit au célèbre Gewandhaus de Leipzig, dont le directeur était Wilhelm Furtwaengler. Il apprit son métier et ce n'est qu'en 1932 qu'il fit son début en France. Le succès fut immédiat et on le retrouva bientôt à la tête des plus grandes associations symphoniques de la capitale française comme les orchestres Lamoureux et Straram et l'Orchestre symphonique de Paris. Il fut invité à diriger à Cannes, à Biarritz, à Prague, à Vienne, ainsi qu'à la BBC de Londres.

En 1935, il était nommé directeur de la Société philharmonique de Paris. Il y demeura jusqu'en 1938, alors que la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire le réclama.

Durant la guerre, Charles Münch fit tout en son pouvoir pour maintenir son orchestre. La situation internationale l'empêchant de voyager, il en profita pour diriger de nombreux concerts en France et fit connaître une quantité d'oeuvres nouvelles.

A travers le monde

A la libération, Charles Münch fut le premier chef d'orchestre français à se se rendre en Angleterre. Une série de concerts qu'il dirigea remporta un succès sans précédent et c'est à partir de ce moment que les continents commencèrent à s'arracher le célèbre maestro.

En plus d'autres concerts à Londres, il se rendit successivement à Bâle, à Berne, à Zurich et à Winterhur, en Suisse. A Genève, il dirigea le célèbre Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, ainsi qu'à Lausanne et à Neufchâtel. Il se rendit également à Bruxelles, Anvers et Liège. Au cours de la saison 1945-46, il dirigea six concerts avec l'Orchestre du Concergebouw d'Amsterdam.

Il refusa des invitations d'Espagne et d'Italie pour diriger à Prague à l'occasion du cinquantenaire de l'orchestre philharmonique tchèque.

En 1946, il se rendit en Egypte ainsi qu'un Palestine où ses concerts furent de réels triomphes. Après des concerts à Vienne il revint en France où il dirigea trente concerts avec son propre orchestre. Il termina l'année 1946 par des engagements au Brésil.

Au début de 1947, il fit son début aux Etats-Unis à la tête de l'orchestre philharmonique de New-York, qu'il dirigea entre autres dans le célèbre oratorio d'Arthur Honegger, Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher.

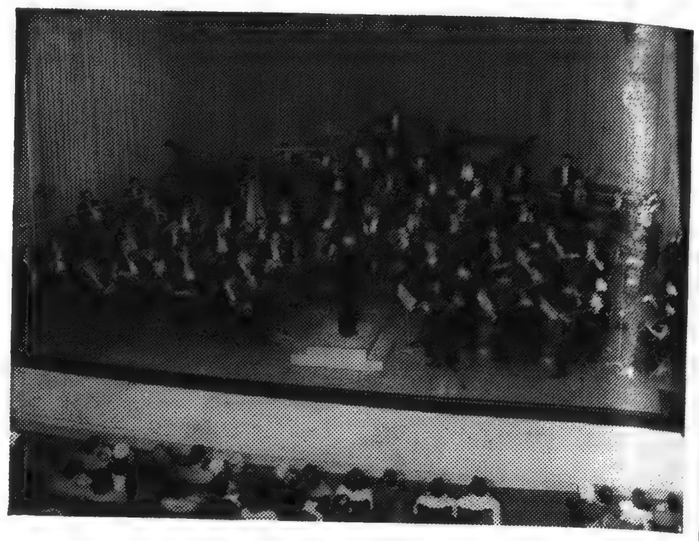
A Montréal

Montréal fit connaissance avec le chef français les 11 et 12 février de la même année, alors qu'il fut invité à diriger l'orchestre des Concerts symphoniques.

Il remporta un succès inoubliable, surtout par son interprétation de la Symphonie Fantastique, de Berlioz, une oeuvre qu'il dirigera à nouveau au concert du 28 novembre.

En 1948, Charles Münch dirigea à Montréal un concert mémorable avec l'Orchestre National de France.

Ayant succédé à Serge Koussevitsky à la tête d'un des meilleurs orchestres d'Amérique, celui de Boston, M. Münch s'est vu obligé de refuser la plupart des invitations pour diriger à l'étranger. La sympathie et la compréhension des auditoires montréalais semblent avoir conquis le célèbre chef d'orchestre qui est revenu, à plusieurs reprises, diriger notre orchestre.



L'orchestre des Concerts Symphoniques de Montréal que l'on entendra mardi soir à 8 h. 30, dans la Symphonie fantastique de Berlioz, sous la direction de Charles Münch.

La Symphonie fantastique

La Symphonie fantastique, opus 14a, d'Hector Berlioz, est une oeuvre qui ne cesse de nous étonner et de nous surprendre, à chaque audition. Si l'on songe qu'elle fut terminée en 1829, soit deux années à peine après la mort de Beethoven, aucun doute nous est laissé sur le génie de son auteur.

Berlioz a employé dans la Fantastique un orchestre que ni Wagner ni Richard Strauss ne réussiront à surpasser, au point de vue puissance et couleur sonore. L'origine du poème symphonique peut se retrouver dans cette symphonie à programme. Le leit-motiv est aussi employé avec un effet troublant. Il s'agit du thème de la Bien-aimée que l'on retrouve sous diverses formes dans les cinq parties de la symphonie.

Le premier mouvement, Rêveries et passions, illustre l'état déprimé d'un jeune musicien. Le second, Un bal, nous montre le jeune artiste au milieu d'une fête mondaine où il retrouve sa bien-aimée. C'est ensuite la Scène aux champs et la Marche au supplice dans laquelle le musicien rêve qu'il a tué sa bien-aimée et qu'on le conduit au lieu de l'exécution. Le mouvement final, Songe d'une nuit de sabbat, décrit le passage du musicien au milieu de sorcières et de monstres effrayants. Des rires grotesques sont entendus et le thème de la bien-aimée revient mais cette fois, il a perdu sa beauté et sa noblesse, et il résonne comme un air de danse vulgaire et grotesque. La danse continue et bientôt le glas funèbre sonne, suivi du Dies Irae ... Les deux thèmes sont ensuite entendus simultanément puis arrive le final, indescriptible et effrayant.

Une grande oeuvre et un grand chef d'orchestre seront donc les caractéristiques du concert du 28, qui sera transmis directement de l'auditorium le Plateau, à 8 h. 30 du soir.

UN CHOEUR QUI RÉUNIT DOUZE DE "NOS FUTURES ÉTOILES"

Depuis le début de la saison, les concerts-concours de Nos Futures Etoiles, diffusés le dimanche soir, à 8 heures, de la salle de l'Ermitage, sur le chemin de la Côte-Des-Neiges, à Montréal, nous permettent d'entendre un choeur de douze voix qui alterne toutes les deux semaines avec un artiste invité.

Ce choeur, composé de concurrents actuels ou anciens de Nos Futures Etoiles, accompagne les deux vedettes, June Marie Kowalchuk, soprano, et William Blaine Williams, baryton, et interprète des extraits d'opérettes et de comédies musicales.

A l'exception de Fernand Martel, que les amateurs d'opéra connaissent bien et dont la réputation s'étend même à l'étranger, où il a chanté à plusieurs reprises, la plupart des chanteurs de ce choeur se sont fait connaître dans les concours de Nos Futures Etoiles.

La plupart d'entre eux ont également pris part aux Concerts d'Eté de Nos Futures Etoiles, que dirigeaient Mme Berthe Lavoie-Fortin en 1949, et au programme qui a succédé à celui-là en 1950 sous le titre d'Agostini dirige.

Le choeur de Nos Futures Etoiles est une innovation aux concerts-concours diffusés le dimanche soir, à 8 heures, sur le réseau Français de Radio-Canada. On reconnaît ici les douze chanteurs qui accompagnent les vedettes et qui interprètent des extraits d'opérettes et de comédies musicales. Ce sont (de gauche à droite): Claire Lamarche, Colette Mérola, Fernande Chiocchio, Constance Lambert; (2e rangée, même ordre) Guy Lachance, André Rousseau, Andrée Lescot, Michèle Bonhomme; (3e rangée) Gaston Gagnon, Robert Savoie, Guy Piché et Fernand Martel.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
NOV 26 1950

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, E Minor, Opus 98; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor (Victor, LM 1086, one 12-inch LP record). A conventional interpretation of Brahms' Fourth, distinguished by the fine tonal qualities of the Boston Symphony rather than by any new revelation of the music.

Schubert: Quintet in A Major ("The Trout"), for piano and strings; members of the Budapest Quartet, with Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianist, and Georges Moleux, bass (Columbia ML 4317, one 12-inch LP record). A competent but scarcely inspired performance of Schubert's most famous chamber music composition. It is hard to say just what the lack is, but it does not sparkle to the extent that it should.

A.G.

[16

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Most Uncrowded of Professions

John Scabia, Boston's Top Musicographer, Took Up Exacting Work Out of Desperation —Does Much for Symphony Orchestra and Leading Composers

By GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

ALTHOUGH he spends many hours a day, working sometimes far into the night, making music, about the only chance John Scabia ever gets to hear any is when he turns on the radio which occupies a place of honor on his desk.

And, while you may not have heard of John Scabia, you have heard the music he makes probably many times over, in concert halls, at the Symphony, at the Pops and over the radio and by means of television.

For John Scabia, toiling away in his upstairs studio in his home at 43 Playstead dr., in Newton, is what is known in the world of music as a copyist.

His job is to copy the original manuscript of a musical composition for the purpose of printing for publication or to separate out the various parts for players of different instruments to play from in performance.

Another important part of the work of Scabia, the copyist, is to prepare the fragments of musical compositions used as illustrations in the text of books about music or about its composers.

UNCROWDED PROFESSION

As old as music itself, the job of the copyist has continued to defy man's persistent attempt to replace handwork with mechanical means. There have been several music writing machines invented, including at least one piano-music writer, but according to Mr. Scabia, none has succeeded in turning out music successfully. The fact that Scabia is employed constantly by the Boston Symphony, the Pops, other great orchestras of the country, the leading music book publishers, various universities, and nearly all of the leading present day composers, seems to bear him out in his claim.

Though Scabia never heard of the term, the real title of the music copyist is that of musicographer.

It is a profession that remains uncrowded. There are, according to local authorities on the subject, in addition to Scabia, possibly two other Grade A practitioners of this skilled art in this part of the country. Considering the number of jobs of national and international scope which are turned out in the souvenir-hung Scabia studio, the supply seems equally limited elsewhere.

Even given the graphic skill to turn out the perfect copies of a musical composition required for engraving for publication, and few penmen of the present day have even that much talent, you are still a long way from becoming a successful copyist.

DESPERATION JOB

A copyist has to be a musician. He has to know more about music than the men and women who compose it, or the orchestra conductors who direct its playing. For a musical manuscript, fresh from the inspirational drive of the composer, is a pretty sketchy product. Composers, in case you don't know, were never celebrated for their ability to set down a clear copy of their effusions.

Not only does the copyist have to be able to draw a clean, clear copy of the music in hand, but he must see that the proper notes get written into his final copy no matter what the composer may have done by way of hurried sketching in his own free-hand copy.

In modern music this is no small task, for the copyist, trained in the school of the classic music of the old masters, must frequently decide whether the composer has made a mistake in notation or is merely attempting a new effect.

Curiously enough, John Scabia is not an ancient, ripened by long practice of his art. On the contrary, he is man of middle age, sturdy and well set up, a genial smile upon his smooth-shaven face, and rather on the athletic side in appearance and in the ease of his movements.

He became a music copyist by chance. That chance being the devastating consequences of the depression years. Before that he was a gifted musician and has played with the leading orchestras and opera companies all over the world. His instrument was the violin and he still plays it in what few brief moments of relaxation his busy life affords.

Coming to this country from his native Italy, Scabia became a theatre musician and prior to the depression was a familiar figure in the violin section of the various Shubert theatres in Boston.

The depression, plus the changing conditions in the world of the theatre which, with the exception of musical shows, finally swept the pit clear of musicians, left him jobless and desperate. He had to find a new job. He knew music. He knew practically nothing else. So he turned to the job of copyist.

EXACTING WORK

How long it took Scabia to master this most demanding of crafts he will not say today. He shrugs it off, explaining that his mother was a fine painter, his father a musician and he had himself always been a musician, so it was natural to do what he did. And besides, he smilingly added, he was always a good penman!

However hard that start was, it has since paid off in dividends of financial as well as artistic returns not too often achieved by many life-long strugglers for success.

It takes, explains Scabia, about an hour to make a quick copy of a sheet of music. This is the kind of a copy that is required for use in an orchestra. Of course, setting up parts for a symphony band means arranging, as well as copying. That is all part of the day's work, you infer from Scabia's casual reference to it.

A full score for a big orchestra such as the Boston Symphony includes about 70 parts for the various sections, starting off with 35 for the strings alone.

No insignificant part of Scabia's remarkable reputation as a music copyist rests in the fact that he has never yet been known to make a mistake. Experts at Symphony Hall make this claim for him and John admitted it was so.

"Every time I go to Symphony Hall, I sit on the edge of my chair waiting to hear a horrible noise," he confessed, "but everything is always all right. I have never made a mistake . . . yet."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
NOV 26 1950

Story Behind Boston's Symphony Hall

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON. By H. Earle Johnson. Little, Brown: Boston. 431 pp. $6.

BY KATHERINE DUNLAP

IN A large metropolitan area where the conductor of the symphony orchestra has been said to be of greater importance than the mayor there must be a story—of the orchestra, the individuals who have helped build it, the men and women who have supported it, even the structure in which it has been housed.

H. Earle Johnson, member of the music staff at Clark University and a "Bostonian by conviction," has combined all of these "angles" in Symphony Hall, Boston. Touching up his research with quick humor and a delightful understanding of "Old Boston," he has turned out a highly readable account of Boston's Symphony Hall whose story covers a history of music in America over the past 50 years and surveys the orchestral seasons from the turn of the century right up to the present time.

In 1900 the orchestra was housed in its new structure whose story forms the framework of Johnson's excellent volume.

Most of the great names in music during the past 50 years have appeared on the billboards of Boston's Symphony Hall. Their influence on the music of America, and the influence of the men who conducted the orchestra and left the mark of their particular genius on America's musical education and development, is told in sedate prose by the author who brings forth bursts of laughter from his reading public from time to time with ancedotes concerning performers and the Boston audience.

Of particular interest to music lovers will be the quotes of H. P. T., legendary music critic for the Boston Evening Transcript, and the poetic descriptions turned in by Olin Downes, then a novice critic for the Boston Post.

As is to be expected, much of the book is devoted to the work of Koussevitsky who directed the orchestra for 25 years.

In what must have been a labor of love for the author who has singular understanding of his subject, the volume indicates extensive research and includes in its closing pages a complete list of works performed, conductors and guest conductors and their years of service as well as soloists and visiting symphony orchestras from 1900 to 1949. Since these are added in the form of appendix, the story remains uncluttered.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 26 1950

Peter And Wolf Recording Scores Hit With New Fan

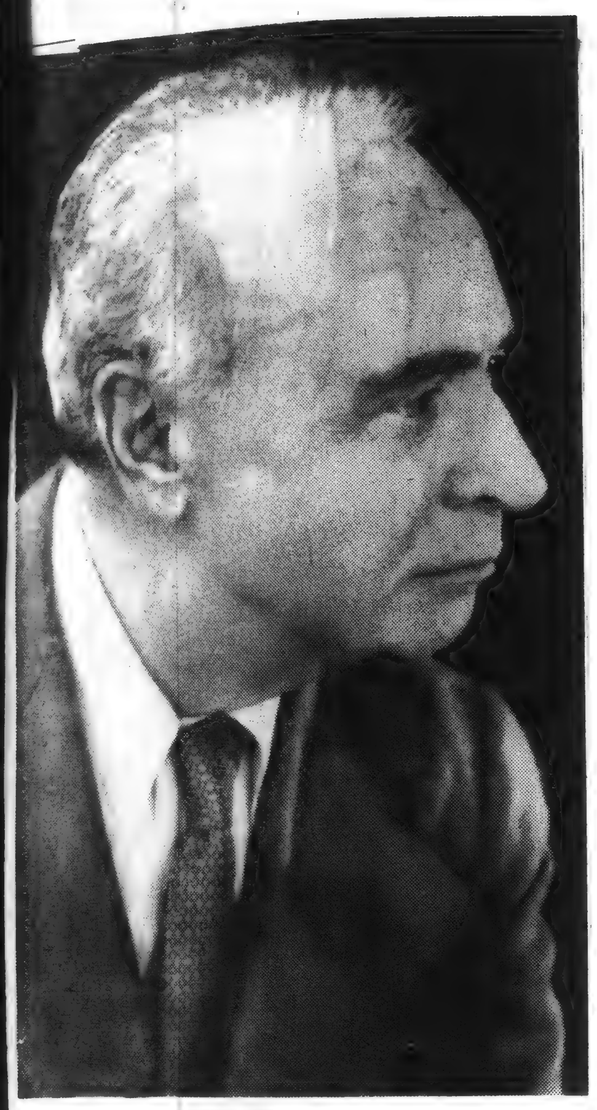
BY BETTY A. DIETZ
Daily News Music Editor

THE new recording of Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf is a howling success, I can assure you. Tested on the new pup that rules my household—she looks remarkably like Victor's trademark terrier—the recording proved most engaging. The introduction of the various instruments seemed more than usually interesting but it was the flute song of the birds that aroused her to vocal utterance. An unorthodox way to review a record, but undeniably entertaining.

With or without a pup to guide you, the 33⅓ rpm recording, released by RCA Victor, makes for good listening. Eleanor Roosevelt is the expert narrator with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The work was performed last summer at the Berkshire Festival.

[167]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: His retirement is a myth.

Dr. Koussevitzky Keeps Busy During Retirement

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

APPARENTLY Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has retired from conducting in order to give himself time to conduct. A man came down from Symphony Hall in Boston the other day with a suitcaseful of documents showing that Dr. Koussevitzky, who retired, more or less, from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, has been conducting all over the map ever since. He is due here Tuesday to conduct the Boston orchestra in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

No sooner had Dr. Koussevitzky retired (said the man from Boston) than orchestras all over North and South America and Europe began inviting him to conduct. Even the new nation of Israel invited him.

Hailed in Hollywood Bowl

Soon after he had finished the annual festival at Tanglewood in 1949, Dr. Koussevitzky lit out for a round of conducting in the Hollywood Bowl, where the natives hailed him with joy.

During his 25 years with the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky had had invitations and a hankering to conduct in South America, but hadn't been able to get away. Returning from Hollywood, Dr. Koussevitzky rested briefly, then, in October, flew to Rio de Janeiro and conducted the Brazil Symphony Orchestra.

Then, in the words of the man from Boston:

"After flying back to the States and dividing some time between his home in Lenox, Mass., and Scottsdale, near Phoenix, Ariz., he took off again in January, 1950, to fill engagements—lasting into June—in Havana, Israel (debuts in each case), Rome, Brussels, Paris and London.

Youthful Vigor Cited

"Each appearance was greeted with a fervor usually associated with the discovery of a bright new star in the musical heavens. The remark of a critic in Rome is typical: 'Although 76, he put into his performance the vigor and enthusiasm of a man of 30, adding to that youthful vigor all the experience of a career of many years.'

"From July 8 to Aug. 13, he conducted at the Berkshire Festival. He flew from New York to Paris on Sept. 21, and within the week had flown to Israel. After filling return engagements there until this month, he flew on Nov. 6 to Paris, and thence to New York, arriving on the 8th."

Dr. Koussevitzky will be in Providence again early next year with the Israel Philharmonic.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 26 1950

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The local symphonic news of the moment is the return to Symphony Hall of Koussevitzky for a fortnight's term as guest conductor. There is as yet no reason for additional comment; we have heard familiar music, Brahms and Sibelius, in long familiar interpretations. Just now my mind is on his successor as an interpreter of Schumann, hardly one of the orchestral best-sellers. Last season Mr. Munch had us all agog over his version of the Fourth Symphony. Two weeks ago he was equally persuasive with the more tractable matter of the First, making it sound as it seemed never to have sounded before.

* * *

Indeed, Mr. Munch has put Schumann in a better light as an orchestrator; and the ineptness of his orchestration has long been a byword. Such matters can be rectified by an actual revision of the score, but I am informed that Mr. Munch, in the case of the First, anyway, left things pretty much as they were. Rimsky-Korsakov has said that scores fall into three types: those that sound well, those than can be made to sound well, and those that cannot. Schumann is seldom that bad, though his symphonies present their problems. A famous trouble spot is the opening of the Third, where the violins, in their middle register, are almost swamped by the heavy accompaniment.

* * *

Conductors will tell you that Schumann has to be carefully rehearsed. When George Szell was here as guest, and gave us an impressive reading of the Second Symphony, I remarked to him ahead of time that surely the middle movements would go of themselves. He assented, but added that you have to help him out in the corner ones. As to what form this helping out took I did not inquire.

* * *

In the first trio of the Scherzo Schumann had already been helped out by Mendelssohn, who suggested that instead of having the strings play the whole of part one, it would be better to have woodwinds and strings in alternations, and Schumann took the hint. The worst blunder of all—which would not be a blunder today—he discovered for himself at the first rehearsal. The opening phrase of the First Symphony was entrusted to horns and trumpets in octaves. But they were the old valveless instruments and Schumann had given them the wrong kind of notes to play. The effect was so bad as to be laughable, and Schumann often told the story on himself, imitating the braying sound of the stopped horns. He immediately put the phrase up a third and everything was okay. There exists somewhere a revision of the Fourth Symphony made by Mahler, in which he has done away with some of the unnecessary doubling of winds and strings, a besetting fault with Schumann that makes for a thickness of sound. And Fredrick Stock in a triumph of tastelessness rescored the Third from top to bottom, adding twelve new instruments and even making changes in the music.

* * *

There is a grain of truth in the contention that Schumann wrote orchestrally for the piano and pianistically for the orchestra. Nor was he the only one to turn the orchestra into an enlarged pianoforte. Dr. Percy Goetschius wrote foolishly, of course, when he said that Schumann's symphonies would sound as well, or even better, if played as a piano duet.

* * *

It stands to reason that a composer so sensitive and imaginative could not have been deaf to the individuality of the various instruments, even if he did as a rule think of his music as abstract sound and "arrange" it for orchestra afterwards. Actually, his scores are full of felicities. Consider the opening of the slow movement of the Fourth, the whole of that of the Second, especially the chain of trills in the violins. There is the enchanting flute cadenza in the finale of the First, so beautifully played the other day by Mr. Laurent. Alwyn Schoeder, former first cellist of the B. S. O., once confided to me that he began his career as a violinist but took up the cello when he first heard the broadly songful theme for those instruments in the slow movement of the Piano Concerto.

* * *

Schumann was libeled as an orchestrator partly because he did not shine in comparison with Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, and their imitators.

* * *

Today, however, we can prize his more subdued colors for themselves, while compared with the unlovely sounds made by some contemporary composers, the scores of Schumann are richness incarnate. In spite of his occasional failings, he has finally come into his own.

* * *

Dr. Kousevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony at the concerts of this week and that of next Sunday, playing at all of them Henry Barraud's "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents." The orchestra will be assisted by the Chorus Pro Musica, Paul Lorenzi, narrator; Peter Silker, baritone, and John Clegg, tenor. On Friday and Saturday the other number will be the Sibelius Second and on Sunday the Brahms First.

* * *

Lily Pons will sing at Symphony Hall this afternoon. Julian Olevsky, violinist, will make his local debut at Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, accompanied by Wolfgang Rose, pianist. The Civic Symphony, under Paul Cherkassky, will give its first concert of the season at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening. Robert Fraser, pianist, will be heard in the Third Concerto of Beethoven. Adele Addison, soprano, sings at Jordan Hall next Sunday afternoon, and Roland Hayes, tenor, appears at Symphony Hall in the evening.

* * *

There will be a special concert at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Wednesday evening to benefit Dr. Albert Schweizer's missionary hospital in French Equatorial Africa. The Zimbler Sinfonietta, Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble and various soloists will participate.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 28 1950

Hail Again!

Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of Serge Koussevitzky. Nor do the years diminish his vitality in the service of music. Since Dr. Koussevitzky's last appearance in Providence and his laying down the baton after 25 years of history-making music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has gone into what might be called a period of active retirement.

In the past concert year, Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted a series of concerts in Hollywood Bowl. He flew to Rio de Janeiro and there led the Brazil Symphony Orchestra. From January to June of this year he was fulfilling engagements in Havana, Israel, Rome, Brussels, Paris and London. Then he returned to the United States for the Berkshire Festival. On Nov. 6 he flew to Paris and back to New York. Now as conductor-emeritus, he will lead the Boston Symphony in concerts in Providence, Newark, New York, Brooklyn and Washington. Following this, he will be the conductor of the Israel Philharmonic on its American tour.

Surely a course of activity that would leave a younger man breathless and exhausted! But not Dr. Koussevitzky. In harmony with the old Yankee saying, he refuses to rust out in retirement. It is an astonishing and wonderful performance.

And so when he appears in Providence tonight his many friends and admirers will greet him with that warmth and affection he has won over a quarter of a century by his stern devotion to the best music. Hail again but not farewell!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 29 1950

Music

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony's Second Concert Here

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the second of its current series of Providence concerts last night at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium with Serge Koussevitzky, music director emeritus, conducting. This program had been given earlier in Boston as part of the 70th anniversary celebration of the orchestra.

The program:

Brahms ..... Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Brahms .... Symphony No. 3, in F major, ... Op. 90
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante.
III. Poco allegretto.
IV. Allegro.

INTERMISSION

Sibelius ..... Symphony No. 2, in D major, ... Op. 43
I. Allegretto.
II. Tempo adante, ma rubato.
III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave.
IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.

When Dr. Koussevitzky walked out on the stage, the orchestra bounded to its feet and the audience, most of it, did likewise. As an ovation it was hardly spontaneous, the conductor accepted it most graciously.

Why the director emeritus chose this particular program to be remembered by at an anniversary is something of a mystery. The "Tragic" Overture is marked by anything but a festive atmosphere, plus which it wasn't very tragic. Mostly it got in the way of the more important work which followed.

The Brahms 3rd Symphony had some spots of real brilliance in the performance, especially in the final movement, but Dr. Koussevitzy seemed at times to dramatize sections generally thought of as lyric, as for instance where the beautiful counterpoint emerges in the second movement, and we also wondered whether he felt somewhat restrained by the seating arrangement of the orchestra, which was apparently the one used by Dr. Munch.

All of the questions about details vanished with the performance of the Sibelius, which was a magnificent example of teamwork by both orchestra and conductor. The woodwinds, which had shown to advantage in the Brahms symphony, proved equal to the superlatives which have been often bestowed on them, and the brasses turned the final movement into a terrific triumph, all in perfect style.

Perhaps Dr. Koussevitsky intended the program to be subtly autobiographical, beginning on a tragic note but overcoming all obstacles at the last trumpet. That is reading a lot into it, but at least it is an attempt to explain a puzzling program by a director who has never been known to put things together by chance. Perhaps it simply seemed like a good occasion for being thoroughly romantic. Whatever the idea was, the Sibelius was a truly magnificent climax to the evening. If an ovation was ever deserved, it was at this point.

This was the 307th concert of the Boston Symphony in Providence. Dr. Koussevitsky will appear here again later in the season with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, which will be on tour in this country.

[168]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 30 1950

On the Record

That Tanglewood 'Wolf,' Landowska's Bach, Piano Quintets, Horowitz

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

LAST SUMMER there was quite a hullabaloo when Mrs. Roosevelt recorded Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra at Tanglewood, and I may as well admit I find the result [Victor LM-45] slightly flabbergasting. So if you don't mind I will quote from the program notes reprinted by Victor from the Boston Herald's columnist and critic, Rudolph Elie, who sat in on the recording session.

"The instant I saw her," writes Mr. Elie, "her name, her fame, and her person produced that peculiar sense of deference . . . the fact is, she frightened me . . . there was, from the first, a very engaging quality of naivete in her recitation of this familiar musical tale . . . for here is no professional actor wringing the yarn dry of its every melodramatic moment with elocution, but a gentle lady telling a simple little story to her grandchildren before the fireplace, and in the simplicity of her narration she brought out as never before the detail of the music itself . . . only once, in the nerve wracking and exhausting process of capturing a perfect performance on records, was the error hers . . . she was [at the end of the recording session] the only one, figuratively speaking, still on her feet."

Mrs. Roosevelt

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

NOV. 28, 1950

Hail Again!

Age cannot wither nor custom stale the infinite variety of Serge Koussevitzky. Nor do the years diminish his vitality in the service of music. Since Dr. Koussevitzky's last appearance in Providence and his laying down the baton after 25 years of history-making music with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has gone into what might be called a period of active retirement.

In the past concert year, Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted a series of concerts in Hollywood Bowl. He flew to Rio de Janeiro and there led the Brazil Symphony Orchestra. From January to June of this year he was fulfilling engagements in Havana, Israel, Rome, Brussels, Paris and London. Then he returned to the United States for the Berkshire Festival. On Nov. 6 he flew to Paris and back to New York. Now as conductor-emeritus, he will lead the Boston Symphony in concerts in Providence, Newark, New York, Brooklyn and Washington. Following this, he will be the conductor of the Israel Philharmonic on its American tour.

Surely a course of activity that would leave a younger man breathless and exhausted! But not Dr. Koussevitzky. In harmony with the old Yankee saying, he refuses to rust out in retirement. It is an astonishing and wonderful performance.

And so, when he appears in Providence tonight his many friends and admirers will greet him with that warmth and affection he has won over a quarter of a century by his stern devotion to the best music. Hail again but not farewell!

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

NOV 29 1950

Munch Conducts Berlioz, Franck

Directs 'Fantastic' and D minor for Les Concerts Symphoniques

By THOMAS ARCHER

Charles Munch, now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came here yesterday to direct the Orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques in a spectacular performance of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique and one of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor which will be discussed below. The two works made up the entire program.

Regardless of what may be thougt of the Berlioz Fantastic, and there are those who at this late date, discover more alloy in it than pure metal, it still offers an imaginative and dramatically minded conductor opportunity to put on a marvellous show. And this is what Mr. Munch did.

Much of what was novel in Berlioz's time has become absorbed into the common vocabulary, taking the form in some instances of cliches. We can no longer shudder at the hero's paroxysms as he dreams of his beloved. The ball scene is now little more than a charmingly instrumented waltz, the Country Scene is pretty much of a bore, the March to the Scaffold is not nearly as blood-curdling as it must have been and the Witches' Sabbath, except for the magnificently depraved form the beloved woman takes, is largely sound and fury, no profound significance. Compare it, for example, with Verdi's Dies Irae.

Nonetheless the old symphony furnished Mr. Munch with material to galvanize both his players and his listeners. It was in its way a great performance, and an exciting adventure for the audience. The conductor took the symphony at a reasonable speed, and avoided for the most part the dragging which too often is associated with its execution. He was specially successful in maintaining the tension of the Dream. The Ball Scene was offered with a fine sense of its rhythmic implications. Munch and his players really did get some of the terror out of the March. The finale was built into a grand pandemonium.

The conductor, it is felt, laid himself open to some very legitimate criticism of an unfavorable nature by his conception and execution of the Franck Symphony. It was a subjective performance, one in which the whole was lost sight of in the parts, tempi distorted and the essential march of the symphonic events continually held up by fussy, self-conscious detail.

This is not to deny that Mr. Munch got some very fine playing out of the orchestra. Instrumentally there were many gorgeous effects. But these would hardly excuse beginning an allegro non troppo as a presto and then bringing it down almost to a lento. Most people who know him prefer their Franck straight, or at least they want him according to the indications he put into his score, for faithful observance by those who would truly undertake to interpret him to others.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1950
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON,

Oratorio for Symphony-

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

NOV 29 1950

Music . . .

Munch Leads Berlioz Work

Concerts Symphoniques Under Boston Conductor

By Eric McLean

In returning to Montreal this season, Charles Munch has established a precedent for conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it has always been understood that they accept no guest engagements.

Subscribers to Les Concerts Symphoniques appreciated this privilege most keenly during the performance of the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique last night. Though we have heard Mr. Munch directing this work twice before (once with l'Orchestre National of France) the mind retains only a small memory of the excitement, and it is a fresh experience each time.

Listening to this abandoned music last night, many of the audience must have asked themselves how it must have been received when it was first presented to the public in 1830—it is almost avant garde music today. In looking about for a literary comparison, it struck me that the Symphonie Fantastique might be called Berlioz's Macbeth. It has much of the melodramatic quality of the play, and like Macbeth, the symphony's basic characteristic is not love but violence. Even the supposedly bucolic Adagio movement broods and grumbles and barely escapes a tempest.

In the finale all hell breaks loose.

It would be impossible to imagine anyone conducting the Berlioz with more sympathy than Charles Munch. Every phrase was carefully shaped, but always in relation to the master-plan of each movement and the whole symphony.

Munch conducts not only with his hands and arms, but with his whole body. Each line of the music becomes a small part of his life. The experience of watching him is one which no one should miss.

But having watched him, one should look away. I find his movements disturbing in music less emotional than the Symphonie Fantastique.

If the Berlioz was all blood and thunder last night, the Cesar Franck symphony was all thud and blunder. The orchestra seemed to be disenchanted, and played at Munch's great speed with their own indifference. I no longer feel strongly enough about the Franck to criticize it subjectively. What I hold against last night's performance is a long session of faulty playing at an extraordinarily fast tempo. Mr. Munch seemed to be beating a dead horse.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

Battista at Ste. Annes

A young pianist of considerable repute in the United States but as yet quite unknown in Canada, gave the recital on Monday evening for the Community Concert Association of Ste. Anne de Bellevue.

Looking back on the performance from a distance of twenty-four hours, my reaction to Joseph Battista's playing is still overwhelmingly favorable.

The lapse of time was necessary to bring the concert into focus, weighing the pianist's brilliant technique and emotional drive against some confusion of musical form, and an occasional harshness of sound.

Mr. Battista's playing is of the type generally referred to as "electrifying". It would not be too far off the mark to say he treats the piano in much the same way Munch handles the orchestra. The emotional projection is constant, and in a work such as the Schumann G minor Sonata, it is used with tremendous effect. I have heard neater, more cleanly outlined playing in Schumann before, but I have rarely felt the power of this music more keenly than in Battista's performance.

The other works on his program particularly suited to his pianistic approach were the Chopin Scherzo in C Sharp minor, and the Impromptu in F sharp major.

But Mendelssohn's gentle Rondo Capriccioso caved in under playing gauged for the Hammerklavier Sonata. It was not that the playing was too loud; it was simply that every item on a widely varied program was given the same great import—often there was little or none. Only occasionally was the music allowed to speak for itself, because Mr. Battista was in on every measure.

Koussevitzky To Introduce Barraud Work

By Klaus G. Roy

The impact of two world wars within 30 years may be mirrored no more strongly in any contemporary work than in the one which Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to the United States at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

When the conductor was in France last year, he became intensely interested in an oratorio by Henry Barraud called "Le Mystère des Saints Innocents." It was begun after World War II (completed Oct. 27, 1946) and first performed in Paris in 1947. It is dedicated to the memory of the composer's brother Jean, who was executed by the Germans in 1944 for his part in the Resistance movement. The text was chosen from a cycle of poems called "Prières" by the French mystic Charles Péguy, who was killed in battle 30 years earlier.

Barraud himself was born in 1900. Appointed a lieutenant of infantry in 1939, he was taken prisoner by the Germans but escaped soon after. His efforts as a member of the Front Nationale of the Resistance were bent toward the reestablishment of Radiodiffusion Française, the French counterpart of the BBC. He is now its director, and has won acclaim as a composer of orchestral, chamber, and piano music.

One cannot fail to see how Péguy's deeply moving text must have struck the sensitive musician after his own harrowing experiences. Its basic theme appears to be the innocence of children, who come through the holocaust unscathed, and are saved from the fury of Herod. Faith, to the poet, is as a faithful wife, and Charity an ardent mother; but Hope is a tiny girl "who every morning wishes us good day." In the five parts of the oratorio, God is represented as speaking the words of the poet, whether through the "récitant" or narrator, the baritone and tenor soloists, or through the chorus.

It is a big work, with a large and colorful orchestra that utilizes bells, cymbals, two harps, piano, and celesta in addition to the regular complement. The choral part is of great power and enormous difficulty. It is considered to be the most exacting thing that its performers, the Chorus pro Musica, have ever done, exceeding by far such demanding works as the Stravinsky Mass, Dupré's "De Profundis", and the Mozart C minor Mass.

Its young conductor, Alfred Nash Patterson—a former pupil of Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw and at present organist and choirmaster of the Church of the Advent in Boston, as well as director of the Apollo Club—has found this a most inspiring work to prepare. The group of 100 non-professional singers, founded in 1945, has not been daunted by what he calls "the extremely complex contrapuntal lines, the shifting rhythms, and the constant breaking up of measures for the sake of better declamation." Yet Mr. Patterson feels that the individual lines are well conceived for the voice.

"The modernity of its notation may sometimes be a little awkward to read, but it is always warm and emotionally stirring music—to me a sort of Debussy and Honegger combination, with tremendous drama and variety," he said. "Its most striking vocal interval is perhaps the augmented fourth. That is something choral singers usually fear, but it can be learned!

"Only the children's chorus in Part Four, sung by the female voices, is characterized by plain consecutive triads," Mr. Patterson explained. "Floating above the rest of the choir, the high angelic voices bring the oratorio to an ecstatic close. Is not such a work of art in today's world a gesture of defiance to man's most destructive pursuits, by its very existence offering us a clear affirmation of life?"

[169]

BLANK PAGE

Backstage with Munch at the Symphony

Simmons Sophomores Betty Peckman, Jean Church, and Jane Ann Fisher enjoy their exclusive interview with Boston Symphony Conductor, Charles Munch, backstage in Munch's reception room before the concert. This year, for the first time, the Boston Symphony has made it possible for interested students to obtain tickets to the final rehearsal for the Saturday evening concerts. Students enjoy watching the orchestra under the direction of Munch work over difficult passages until the precise effect is obtained.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 1 - 1950

Premieres: The Chorus pro Musica of Boston has been invited to sing the American premiere of Henri Barraud's Le Mystère des Saints Innocents under the direction of Koussevitzky in his guest appearance with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 1 and 2. . . . Two new works—Normand Lockwood's Diversion for Clarinet and Leo Kraft's String Quartet—were played for the first time at the Queens College semi-annual faculty concert on Nov. 10. . . . Douglas Moore's opera for children, Puss in Boots, had its world premiere at the Young People's Concert under the direction of Igor Buketoff on Nov. 18. . . . Chasins' Period Suite will receive its European premiere in April when it is to be played by the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, under the direction of Barbirolli. . . . First performance scheduled for the Kinor Sinfonietta's Times Hall concert on Dec. 16 are Michael Assael's Production and Allegro, William Reppich's Theme and Variations, Joseph Bernstein's The Hora and conductor Siegfried Landau's Dybbuk Suite.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 2 - 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

You cannot say that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted only Brahms and Sibelius in his fortnight's sojourn here as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony. The music director emeritus, as the current programs are styling him, is finding time (nearly a full hour) at this week's concerts for an oratorio by Henry Barraud, "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents," which yesterday afternoon received its first performance in America. The remaining number on the program is the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in which Koussevitzky was heard in the first of his six concerts, that of a week ago last Tuesday.

Barraud, whose music had not previously been heard here, is in his 51st year and is director of music for the French radio. The source of his text is the third "mystery" of that curious figure in French literature, Charles Peguy, the peasant-born Socialist and atheist who became a convert and was killed in the first World war. Mr. Burk's program notes pointed out that he was "tortured by points in the Christian dogma he could not accept and by the fact that he had married outside the church and had raised a family unbaptized." Entering the French army as lieutenant, he "rushed recklessly into action and was killed exhorting his troops."

There is plenty here for a composer to work on: Everything from extreme naivete to the most detailed and graphic description of the sufferings of Christ on the cross and of the orgy of bloodshed that gives the piece its name. By evidence of this work, Barraud is extremely resourceful, handling his orchestral and choral forces with great skill and giving appropriate expression to the varying moods of the poem. Nevertheless, the listener is left with the uneasy feeling that, fine as it all is, there is nothing that is essentially new and distinctive. If not in just this form, we have heard it all before.

Besides the responsive orchestra, Koussevitzky had at his disposal yesterday an excellent body of singers, the Chorus pro Musica, of which Alfred Nash Patterson is the conductor. Few choruses that have sung with the orchestra in recent years have acquitted themselves so creditably and its task was not an easy one. The Rev. Peter R. Blynn was admirable as the narrator, speaking his lines in English, though the singing was in French. The soloists, also excellent, were John Clegg, tenor, and Peter Sliker, baritone. There was protracted applause for all concerned, including Mr. Patterson, with Dr. Koussevitzky taking the final bows alone. He will bid us good-by tomorrow, repeating the Sibelius-Brahms program of a week ago.

[171]

For the Musici

(Continued

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Johnson. 431 pages. Little, Brown and pany. $6.00.

Never was a book as drably titled more color, more splashing, eye-jiggli... than this, in which the author, exerc... entirely natural skill as raconteur, brings after artist back to the stage of that august to strut his little time and do his little act. think he can't keep it up—this retouching life the faded canvas of the past. But he does, in chapter after chapter, as there passes the parade of shirt-waisted dowagers, of famous collaborators; of piano "teams"; of male singers who sang through their noses and female singers who were kittenish; of pianists with the anniversary mania and violinists who refused to stay "retired"; of faux-pas and triumphs; of Chopan-zees and artists of the skewer.

If you don't like to relive the past no matter how succulently it is served up, then you may not like this book. But if you do, reading of foibles and follies of another age will not only bolster you up a bit in your ability to face the weaknesses of this, but will no doubt also give you that sense of universal kinship so appropriate to the Season.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES

Boston Pops Orchestra: Classical Juke Box" and "Syncopated Clock" are directed by Arthur Fiedler on this Red Seal release. (49-3044).

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, the symphony plays Haydn's "Toy Symphony."

Gladys Swarthout: The popular mezzo-soprano sings Massenet's Elegie" and Hahn's "Les Cygnes," a particularly fine couplet on both 45 and 78 rpms. (49-3042).

Backstage with Munch at the Symphony

Simmons Sophomores Betty Peckman, Jean Church, and Jane Ann Fisher enjoy their exclusive interview with Boston Symphony Conductor, Charles Munch, backstage in Munch's reception room before the concert. This year, for the first time, the Boston Symphony has made it possible for interested students to obtain tickets to the final rehearsal for the Saturday evening concerts. Students enjoy watching the orchestra under the direction of Munch work over difficult passages until the precise effect is obtained.

International Musician

For the Musici

(Continued from p

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Earle Johnson. 431 pages. Little, Brown and Company. $6.00.

Never was a book as drably titled filled with more color, more splashing, eye-jiggling color, than this, in which the author, exercising an entirely natural skill as raconteur, brings artist after artist back to the stage of that august hall, to strut his little time and do his little act. You think he can't keep it up—this retouching to life the faded canvas of the past. But he does, in chapter after chapter, as there passes the parade of shirt-waisted dowagers, of famous collaborators; of piano "teams"; of male singers who sang through their noses and female singers who were kittenish; of pianists with the anniversary mania and violinists who refused to stay "retired"; of faux-pas and triumphs; of Chopanzees and artists of the skewer.

If you don't like to relive the past no matter how succulently it is served up, then you may not like this book. But if you do, reading of foibles and follies of another age will not only bolster you up a bit in your ability to face the weaknesses of this, but will no doubt also give you that sense of universal kinship so appropriate to the Season.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 1 - 1950

Premieres: The Chorus pro Musica of Boston has been invited to sing the American premiere of Henri Barraud's Le Mystère des Saints Innocents under the direction of Koussevitzky in his guest appearance with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 1 and 2. . . . Two new works—Normand Lockwood's Diversion for Clarinet and Leo Kraft's String Quartet—were played for the first time at the Queens College semi-annual faculty concert on Nov. 10. . . . Douglas Moore's opera for children, Puss in Boots, had its world premiere at the Young People's Concert under the direction of Igor Buketoff on Nov. 18. . . . Chasins' Period Suite will receive its European premiere in April when it is to be played by the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, under the direction of Barbirolli. . . . First performance scheduled for the Kinor Sinfonietta's Times Hall concert on Dec. 16 are Michael Assael's Production and Allegro, William Reppich's Theme and Variations, Joseph Bernstein's The Hora and conductor Siegfried Landau's Dybbuk Suite.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 2 - 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

You cannot say that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted only Brahms and Sibelius in his fortnight's sojourn here as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony. The music director emeritus, as the current programs are styling him, is finding time (nearly a full hour) at this week's concerts for an oratorio by Henry Barraud, "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents," which yesterday afternoon received its first performance in America. The remaining number on the program is the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in which Koussevitzky was heard in the first of his six concerts, that of a week ago last Tuesday.

Barraud, whose music had not previously been heard here, is in his 51st year and is director of music for the French radio. The source of his text is the third "mystery" of that curious figure in French literature, Charles Peguy, the peasant-born Socialist and atheist who became a convert and was killed in the first World war. Mr. Burk's program notes pointed out that he was "tortured by points in the Christian dogma he could not accept and by the fact that he had married outside the church and had raised a family unbaptized." Entering the French army as lieutenant, he "rushed recklessly into action and was killed exhorting his troops."

There is plenty here for a composer to work on; Everything from extreme naivete to the most detailed and graphic description of the sufferings of Christ on the cross and of the orgy of bloodshed that gives the piece its name. By evidence of this work, Barraud is extremely resourceful, handling his orchestral and choral forces with great skill and giving appropriate expression to the varying moods of the poem. Nevertheless, the listener is left with the uneasy feeling that, fine as it all is, there is nothing that is essentially new and distinctive. If not in just this form, we have heard it all before.

Besides the responsive orchestra, Koussevitzky had at his disposal yesterday an excellent body of singers, the Chorus pro Musica, of which Alfred Nash Patterson is the conductor. Few choruses that have sung with the orchestra in recent years have acquitted themselves so creditably and its task was not an easy one. The Rev. Peter R. Blynn was admirable as the narrator, speaking his lines in English, though the singing was in French. The soloists, also excellent, were John Clegg, tenor, and Peter Sliker, baritone. There was protracted applause for all concerned, including Mr. Patterson, with Dr. Koussevitzky taking the final bows alone. He will bid us good-by tomorrow, repeating the Sibelius-Brahms program of a week ago.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES

Boston Pops Orchestra: Classical Juke Box" and "Syncopated Clock" are directed by Arthur Fiedler on this Red Seal release. (49-3044).

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, the symphony plays Haydn's "Toy Symphony."

Gladys Swarthout: The popular mezzo-soprano sings Massenet's Elegie" and Hahn's "Les Cygnes," a particularly fine couplet on both 45 and 78 rpms. (49-3042).

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—S

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Conducts American Premiere of Barraud Choral Work

By CYRUS DURGIN

S. [illegible] Koussevitzky gave the [illegible] an premiere of "Le Mystere [illegible] Saints Innocents" a choral [illegible] the French composer [illegible] Barraud, at the concert by [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra in [illegible] Hall yesterday after[illegible]. The choral portion was sung [illegible] the Chorus Pro Musica, pre[illegible]ed by Alfred Nash Patterson, [illegible] the narrator was Rev. Peter [illegible] Blynn of the Church of the Ad[illegible]. The brief vocal solos were [illegible] by Peter Sliker, baritone, [illegible] John Clegg. The remain[illegible] of the program was occupied by [illegible] Second Symphony of Sibelius.

The Mystery of the Holy Inno[illegible] is a long, fairly involved and [illegible] original score, in which [illegible] be discerned the manners of [illegible] composers, from Ravel and [illegible] to Faure and Gabriel [illegible]. It is a setting of portions [illegible] a long poem written in 1912 by Charles Peguy, a French poet who [illegible] as also an ethical zealot and who [illegible] his writing was preoccupied by [illegible]estastical mysticism. Barraud [illegible]dicated the score to his brother [illegible], a Resistance leader who was [illegible] shot by the Nazis Aug. 1, 1944.

The tone of Peguy's verse is that [illegible] of obscurant lyricism, with snatches [illegible] of the stories of the Crucifixion and [illegible] of the slaughter of the babes by Herod. It might furnish esthetes [illegible] with a hot and substantial argu[illegible]ent on the blending of poetry [illegible] and music. No doubt Barraud fur[illegible]her intended a symbolic union of [illegible] the Herodian massacre with the [illegible]ad fate of his brother.

In the main, what counts is the [illegible]usic, and that, it must be ob[illegible]served, is sometimes of a lyric beauty, but oftentimes thin and dull. The idiom rings in a suggestion of plain chant at the beginning, touches of Ravellian orchestration, perhaps something from the harmonic style of Prokofieff, and distinct allusions to the choral ways of Faure (nota[illegible]bly his Requiem) and Pierne. Barraud's open fourths and fifths for the woodwind give you a snatch of "Tosca" and "La Boheme" in their more reflective moments. In short, the music of "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents" is as diffuse as the poetry and left me, for one, quite unmoved.

So far as one could tell of an unfamiliar work, it went well in performance, the chorus singing responsively and with good sonority. They sang in French, by the way, while the Narrator, speaking admirably, used English.

The warmest moments of the afternoon came with the D major Symphony of Sibelius, long a war horse of Mr. Koussevitzky. His conducting of it turned back the pages of the years, as his reading of the Sibelius Fifth had a week before. The orchestra, hard driven to provide the rich color and the super-emotional intensity that Mr. Koussevitzky demanded, sounded prismatic and incandescent, assuming that to be rhetorically if not scientifically possible.

Mr Koussevitzky will end his stay at the helm of the Boston Symphony with a repetition of this program tonight, and with a final Brahms-Sibelius program on Sunday.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the seventh program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The assisting artists were the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor; Peter Sliker, tenor; John Clegg, baritone, and the Rev. Peter R. Blynn, narrator. The program:

"Le Mystere des Saints Innocents" ..... Barraud
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 ..... Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

With characteristic courage, Serge Koussevitzky chose yesterday afternoon to do a brand new work although, as guest conductor, he had every right to fall back on his tried and true pieces for old times' sake. That the work in question didn't make too much effect and that Koussevitzky was doubtless well aware it wouldn't is beside the point: he has always been a champion of new music, and it is to his great credit that he remained in character yesterday.

The work was Henri Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Innocents," an oratoro based on Charles Peguy's excessively mystical poem drawn from the massacre of the innocents by Herod. Barraud, a contemporary French composer who is also director of the Radiodiffusion Francaise, was inspired in his oratorio by the death of his brother, a hero of the French resistance, at the hands of a German firing squad.

There is thus an atmosphere throughout the work of intense devotion; it is in fact one of the most musico-religious expressions to appear in some time. It is set for four part chorus, children's chorus (sung here by the sopranos), tenor and baritone soloists, and a narrator with a large orchestra. Vocally it is often very beautiful to hear as the style combines the austerity of four-part liturgical polyphony with the naive melodic influence of archaic French folksong. It is not without the impact of contemporary dissonant counterpoint and rhythmic complexity, however, and achieves moments of powerful vocal tension.

Where it loses its effect is in the strangely derivative sound of the orchestra. The composer does achieve some interesting sonorities, but for the most part there are reminiscences of nearly every French school. On their own the choral sections of "Le Mystere" would prove, I am sure, touching and effective. With the orchestra the overall impression is weakened; the sounds are not always appropriate to the vocal lines. Thus considered as music and nothing else, this oratorio is not successfully exportable from France; considered for its mystico-religious content and its inspiration in deep personal loss, it more than makes its own-way.

It must be said that the Chorus Pro Musica, trained for the occasion by its director, Alfred Nash Patterson, once again demonstrated itself a really first class choral ensemble, in this formidably difficult vocal enterprise. The quality in all voices was excellent, the sopranos doing especially well in this regard, but most commendable was the accuracy of intonation in dissonant counterpoints and divisis calling for eight voices. Its rhythmic accuracy was notable, too, and so for that matter was its enunciation.

The Rev. Peter R. Blynn of the Church of the Advent spoke the narration in just the proper style, too, blending warmth of voice with liturgical rise and fall of period. The solos by Peter Sliker and John Clegg, though not professional, were suitably done, and the sopranos managed to catch much of the character of children's voices in the closing section.

Koussevitzky brought the program to a close with his familiar but always exciting reading of Sibelius' Second Symphony, and with it bid goodbye, for the present, to the Friday and Saturday audiences of the Boston Symphony. It has been a fine and exciting fortnight, and I think I speak for all in bidding him an affectionate and appreciative "au revoir." The orchestra is on tour next week, returning on Dec. 15 with Charles Munch conducting. Aldo Cicclini, pianist, will be the soloist.

E. POWER BIGGS

E. Power Biggs, distinguished concert organist, will give the last of his series of three organ recitals in Symphony Hall Monday night. He will end his traversal of great organ literature with works by Vivaldi, Bach, Brahms, Dupre, Hindemith, and others.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 3 1950

BACH'S BRANDENBURG CONCERTOS Nos. 1 and 5 are in a London Gramophone release (LLP 222). The Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra conducted by Karl Muenchinger supplies the soloists and ensemble. As a recording the effort is extraordinarily faithful and life-like. Interpretatively it is workmanlike but needs Bach be anything else? The master, himself, does the rest and too often these concertos come to us as lillies with gilt.

POULENC'S eloquent G Major Mass and Benjamin Britten's "A Ceremony of Carols" are teamed on a new Victor long play disk (LM 1088), making a bright Christmas package for the serious-minded. The Robert Shaw Chorale and the services for the Britten work of Laura Newell, harpist, are the artists. The Poulenc is a work of engaging sophistication and deep sincerity. The Britten is more popular in approach.

VLADIMIR HOROWITZ is in prime shape technically and mentally for a new Victor release consisting of Schumann's "Kinderscenen," Opus 15, and seven Chopin Mazurkas. The romantic repose and touch of the Schumann are exemplary and, for Horowitz, most unexpected. His Chopin gets more piano than the composer intended but in this music the pianist is as interesting as the notes. (Victor LM 1109.)

THAT ADORABLE B Flat Major of Franz Schubert (No. 2) composed when he was eighteen years old, has verve, maybe too much, and vernal freshness at the hands of Charles Muench, conducting the Boston Symphony. The music is somewhat driven but the whip hand is alert and authoritative. Get this one and keep it (Victor LM 41).

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 3 - 1950

Children's Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Shady Hill School of Cambridge is sponsoring a series of four children's concerts in Sanders Theatre, the first of which was given yesterday afternoon. The participating forces were the Zimbler Sinfonietta, now-renowned group of Boston Symphony players; Jean Sandbank, [illegible] violinist from Brazil; Rudolph Elie, commentator, and Laning Humphrey, narrator. Richard Burgin conducted.

Children's concerts either go or they don't. Several attempts have been made in this direction at Symphony Hall, and for one reason or another, one and all have come to grief. That of yesterday was well planned and successfully carried out. The children that comprised most of the audience were, on the whole, small children, yet the proceedings did not seem to be over their heads. Audible comments signifying uneasiness were few and far between.

Mr. Burgin and his orchestra started things off with a short and highly entertaining Symphony by the 18th century Englishman, William Boyce.

Miss Sandbank was then heard in the second and third movements of Mozart's Seventh Violin Concerto, the one of doubtful authenticity lately played here by Mr. Menuhin, and matters came to a close with Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." It was here that Mr. Humphrey did his bit.

More rehearsing would have helped, since conductor and narrator sometimes got their signals mixed, but Mr. Humphrey told the story well and held the interest of his youthful auditors. Miss Sandbank played expertly and Mr. Elie's comments were pertinent without being pedantic. The next concert will take place Jan. 27.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 3 - 1950

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, by H. Earle Johnson, Illustrated. 431 pages. Little, Brown. $6.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra left its original home, the old Music Hall, during the 1899-1900 season, and moved into large, new, fireproof Symphony Hall, corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues, in October, 1900.

From that time to the present Mr. Johnson traces the history of musical and nonmusical events which have taken place in the famous edifice. Written with scholarly taste and precision and illustrated sparsely, the story of Symphony Hall is told in full and not without much critical aid, notably from the "Big Two" of Boston, Philip Hale of the Boston Herald and Henry Taylor Parker—H.T.P.—of the Transcript. While there is no objection to Mr. Johnson's enthusiasm over the critical appraisals of lovable, windy H.T.P., it might have been better for some readers had he pointed out, maybe subtly, that H.T.P.'s reviews were masterpieces of intuitive overstatement. A minor point, but to my knowledge H.T.P. had little or no technical grounding in music.

The material, ably presented, is enlivened now and then with cute anecdotes. And the author discusses the Orchestra, its growth under various conductors and its featured artists; he comments on concert life and glimpses the many nonmusical activities which have been held in Symphony Hall, some of them almost ludicrous—but even Symphony Hall has to have sustenance. Koussevitzky is rightly the pivot about which the book turns, and a list of works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and supplementary appendices concerning soloists who have appeared in Symphony Hall are appropriately the stopping point. In general this is a valuable contribution to the history of musical culture in America.

STANLEY H. HASTE

[17]

Boston Sunday Globe

Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston 7, Mass.
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1950

MINIATURE ALMANAC ..... DEC 3
Eastern Standard Time

Sun Rises	6:56	High Tide	5:13 a m
Sun Sets	4:12	"	5:33 p m
Length of Day	9:16

Height of Tide ..... 8.8 ft a m, 9 ft p m
Light Automobile Lamps at ..... 4:42 p m

Moon's Changes
New Moon, Dec. 9, 4:28 a. m.
First Quarter, Dec. 16, 12:56 a. m.
Full Moon, Dec. 24, 5:23 a. m.
Last Quarter, Jan. 1, 12:11 a. m.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

	Daily Per Mo.	Daily Per Yr.	Sunday Per Mo.	Sunday Per Yr.
Boston Postal Zone	1.25	15.00	.80	9.60
New England States	1.00	12.00	.75	9.00
Elsewhere in United States	1.25	15.00	.95	11.40
Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Central and South America	1.35	16.20	1.00	12.00
Other Foreign Countries	2.50	30.00	1.50	18.00

(Please do not send cash. Use money orders or checks.)

Back numbers (per copy): 1 week or older 5c daily; 20c Sundays; over 3 months old out of print.

Entered as second class mail matter at Boston, Mass., under the act of March 3, 1879—242 Washington St.

The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper, as well as all AP news dispatches.

Globe Man's Daily Story

There is a current story, reports Imp, about a prize fighter who wasn't having any luck with his opponent. His manager, down back of his corner, yelled, "Stop those punches!"

The fighter maneuvered himself into the corner. "You don't see any of 'em gettin' by me, do you?" he asked.

SIBELIUS AT EIGHTY-FIVE

Twenty-five miles north of Helsinki is a little railroad station, Jarvenpaa (Lake's end). Within view of the Lake on a knoll wooded with silver birches and conifers, stands a sizeable villa, named, "Villa Ainola," after the composer's wife. It is massively built of logs, with a balcony facing the sunsets over the lake.

In this villa lives Jean Sibelius, a composer in honor of whose 85th birthday, Dec. 8, 1950, orchestras all over Western Europe and the Americas, are playing his music. His uniqueness among the composers whose floruit falls in this 20th century is that his predominant works are seven symphonies (and a possible eighth) continuing the classical tradition which begins with Sebastian Bach and goes on with Joseph Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and through the 19th century for at least 200 years, and it begins to look as though Sibelius might be the last in that lineal descent.

The power to originate is the central force in any civilization. In the past two centuries music has been the art-form in which the Western European nations have most excelled, and that art may now be passing to the Americas. The test of a civilized society is to identify its men of talent, with some unique power of origination, and provide, at least adequately, for their genius to do its work. It has taken Western Europe, where these great musicians mostly originated, about two hundred years to give some of these supremely talented men a bare livelihood, and some not even that. Mozart and Schubert died of poverty, and both young; Beethoven died untimely at 57, as Romain Rolland has said, "for the want of a woman to take care of him," Schuman died untimely of a mental disorder, Mendelssohn, though wealthy, died young from overwork. Ernest Newman, whose four-volume Life of Wagner is the authoritative biography, says candidly that as a borrower of money, too, Wagner was a man of genius.

As the 19th century neared its close, two of the great composers either were well taken care of or could take care of himself: Richard Strauss was a good business man, though he was ruined financially by the two wars, and Brahms first earned his living as a director of singing societies, then by playing or conducting his own compositions for piano and orchestra.

* * *

Sibelius' life-story might be called, like his tone-poem written in 1892, "A Saga." His one factual biography thus far is written by Karl Ekman, a hospitable and scholarly journalist in Helsinki. He himself is not satisfied with it. A natural sensitiveness of the family at allowing its personal affairs to be discussed all over the world—prevented him from making it as good as he could and would have done. But even so, it contains intimate discussions with the composer which are well worth reading.

Aspiring to be a concert-violinist, Sibelius became in the 20th century one of the world's foremost, if not the foremost composer. His symphonies began being played in Boston soon after the turn of the century, under Karl Muck, who understood them.

* * *

In August, 1933, while Sibelius was still in his prime, during several conversations with him at Villa Ainola, he inadvertently gave a clew to this newness and strangeness. "Nothing I have written before helps me in writing a new symphony. Not only must I write the new music, but I must also make the new tools with which the new work must be made." There was more to it, but since we were both of necessity speaking German, that is as much of the sentence as I could retain for sure. It is one of the few things he ever said about the inwardness of his creative process. For the more part he tells visitors, "Das? Ich weiss nichts davon." (That? I know nothing about it!) Relating which, he sighed, "I have had to wait from ten to twenty years for each new work of mine to be understood, but I have grown resigned to it."

And under what conditions from 1900 to 1926, when his latest work "Tapiola" was published? The 1890's were a constant struggle; in the decade or so between 1900 to 1914, solid successes, being invited to foreign capitals to conduct his own works: then the change from his Third Symphony to his Fourth (1908) which many think his greatest, composed before, or during, after his recovery from a growth in his throat which it was thought was going to kill him. It was removed by an operation in Berlin: but that Fourth Symphony is sheer originality, still in classical vein. Many consider it the supreme classical symphony published in this century.

* * *

Then began the violent action in the "Saga" of Sibelius. The war of 1914-18 cut him off from revenues from his German publishers and he was reduced to writing pot-boilers to support himself and his family. After that came the revolution in Finland and elsewhere. His villa at Jarvenpaa was raided by Bolshevik soldiers. Ostensibly they were searching for arms. There was a revolver in his house, and his man servant knew it. Had he told, the composer would have been shot, but the servant did not tell. What Sibelius did was play on his grandpianoforte to keep his little girls from being frightened.

His country house being now too dangerous, he was lodged with his brother, Dr. Christian Sibelius, who was head of a sanitorium in Helsinki. On that rationed diet, the composer lost 40 pounds in a few weeks, but musician to the core, the approach of the German artillery, while they in the sanitorium did not know whether they would be murdered by the evacuating Bolshiviks, or hit by the bombs of the advancing Germans, their steady cannonade, nevertheless, made him think of a colossal fortissimo.

During these years, 1914 to 1920, two more symphonies were boiling in him, the massive Fifth and the more pastoral Sixth. He kept himself sane by composing. After that same the Seventh (1923).

My resolution to go to Finland and speak with him dated back many years, when his great Nordic works were being played here. They seemed to explain us to ourselves: one strain in them was landscape and seascape, such as one sees in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland; the other was a strong feeling for the ancient Greek and Roman classics in which he was known to be a voracious reader.

We came to that. "One doesn't consciously write music of landscape or the ancient classics," said he, "but if they poured into you from my music, they must have been unconsciously in me when I composed it."

Of the other, the ancient Graeco-Roman classics, he said, "I read the classics because in them I find depth of feeling without sentimentality."

* * *

Is there to be an Eighth Symphony? Has he it in his writing-table drawer? In Helsinki, even in 1933, a visitor was warned not to speak of it. The latest American resident there, the wife of our Consul General, said last July it was thought to be being held for posthumous publication. This guess sounded shrewd, for during our conversations, it appeared that he knew "Goethe's Conversations With Eckerman," practically a working manual for an advanced creative artist, and quoted from it repeatedly. Knowing it so well, he would know that Goethe postponed publishing the "Second Part of Faust" until six months after his death, so as not to be vexed by critics who failed to understand. Sibelius, too, had had that experience with at least four of his symphonies. What more natural than to do the same as Goethe.

A little phrase written above the Scherzo to the Seventh Symphony, gives an insight into the center of the composer's being. He wrote there "Hellenic Rondo." The Scherzo is an ecstatic dance, which sets one's very blood to dancing. In the published score, those words are omitted. But they had been written, and perhaps what they mean is that in him for the first time the classic symphony had reached and spoken through the Northern peoples. The European Continent ignored his symphonies for years: but they were first understood by Scandinavia, England and North America. A good definition of his music might be "Hellenic Rondo of the North."

UNCLE DUDLEY.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC. 3 - 1950

Music and Musicians

Two Charming Books

By VIRGIL THOMSON

WITH Christmas coming on and the thought in my mind of rendering a shopping service, I took a look recently at the new books collected on my table since early fall. A few are scholarly and serious; I shall examine those later. Today I am full of delight from two volumes of partly historical, partly belle-lettrist charm. One deals with auditory pleasures in Boston, the other with musical comedies mostly originating in New York.

* * *

Bostonian Civilities And Good Sense

"SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON," by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1950, 431 pp., $6.), is a history of the cultural fare offered in that house since its opening in 1900. Naturally, it is mostly about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [redacted] glimpses of other entertainment. It is not a history of all musical Boston, since it omits the celebrated opera company and the doings of Harvard and of the New England Conservatory. It is more nearly a view of music in Boston, as this might have been seen (and heard) by a homebody pigeon cotted at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues. Mr. Johnson is a chatty pigeon who tells a pretty anecdote. He also goes a bit about the privilege of living in Boston.

The main facts of the Boston story are available elsewhere, but Mr. Johnson's ornamental detail is full of surprise and charm. The sale of orchestral season tickets at auction, a procedure carried out for many years, caused Mrs. Jack Gardner to pay $47.66 2-3 for her balcony seat in 1900. The primacy of Symphony Hall in forcing the removal of ladies' hats reminds us that before 1908 the price of a ticket entitled no musical customer in any city to a sight of the stage. The fact that administration of the hall and orchestra was vested in a board of trustees only after 1918 recalls to us that both had previously been a private operation of Major Higginson.

Descriptions of the hall's architectural conveniences point out that neither New York's nor Philadelphia's orchestra is so happily housed. The history of the acoustical care that went into its planning offers a lesson to us all. Professor Wallace Sabine, of Harvard's Physics Department, undertook for this purpose extensive researches. The results of these were incorporated in the architect's design, and they actually worked. An earlier plan, though far more stylish visually, had wisely been rejected by Major Higginson and his advisers on the ground that halls of the Greek theater type were acoustically an unknown quantity. When one thinks of all the expensive auditoriums that have been built in Europe and America since 1900 and scarcely a one of them acoustically successful, one is grateful to all those who took serious thought about the matter before building Symphony Hall.

The present book, like most commissioned works, seems arbitrarily limited in its coverage; but it is good reading. Boston itself, always stimulating to the literary mind, is its real hero. This hero is portrayed resemblingly and some of his adventures with music in the twentieth century recounted through a wealth of anecdote both informative and entertaining. Whether the book is overpriced at six dollars depends, I suppose, on whether one was brought up east of Bridgeport.

* * *

Girls, Jokes, Sentiments And Tunes

"MUSICAL COMEDY IN AMERICA" by Cecil Smith (Theater Arts Books: Robert M. MacGreger, N. Y., 1950, 374 pp., 64 photographs, $5) is a full money's worth for anybody. Few subjects are so tightly packed with sentimental associations as that of popular musical entertainment. Extending from "The Black Crook" through "South Pacific," this book has intense nostalgic appeal for persons of all ages, and the sixty-four photographs are a history of stage tailoring and dressmakers' dream life from 1864.

The book offers also as much personal exasperation as it does pleasure, through the complete omission of many shows as famous and familiar as those described in its pages. Touching paragraphs are devoted to "The Merry Widow" and to the career of Lillian Russell, but no mention is made of "Madame Sherry," the show that launched "Every Little Movement" or of "The Prince of Tonight," famous product of the Chicago school. Why the author did not aim at completeness of coverage, at least as regards famous and successful works, is not clear to this reviewer. He seems to be telling a historical story that might justify a selective coverage, but that story is not quite clear either.

His theme is something like this: that music shows are not art and are not ever going to be art and that whatever resemblance they may offer to the observance of intellectual standards is purely accidental. He shows, however, that music shows have come to be in America, as long before they had become in Europe, a sophisticated, sexy, satirical and powerful, if piece-meal, expression of contemporary life. How long ago this maturity came about is not certain, but it was visible by 1900. Its clear path, in fact, dates from "The Black Crook" of more than a quarter-century before. Music shows, moreover, resemble art-forms in the way that significant novelty springs full-blown each time and then is followed by weak copies. Mr. Smith respects the vigor of our light musical theater, admires it, uses it as pretext for drawing up critical distinctions and estimates. But he insists that it is not going to grow up further and become grand opera. The profit-motive connected ineluctably with sheer entertainment would prevent that, and so would the second-rate character of the musical and literary materials employed, even at show business's best.

If all this is true, and I believe it to be, attempts to apply to this repertory the intellectual operation known as criticism are vowed to failure. Show business can be treated as economics, as folklore, as anthropology, as social history, even as a contributing element in the history of music or literature. But it is not primarily either music or literature, and so all attempts to criticize it by the standards of art suggest to this reader lotus-eating. The pictures, the names, the real facts about a show are fascinating. Mr. Smith's opinions, however intelligently formed and courteously stated, are an attempt to substitute his memory-sentiments for mine; and I resent them. The musical comedies of today and of yesteryear are every man and woman's private emotional life. Viewed that way, they loom huge. Viewed as idealistic, authentic, self-conscious art, they have little reality.

[173]

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 3 1950

Music And Music Makers

Looming Deficits

By Thomas B. Sherman

THE Symphony Society's unending battle for survival is a little more desperate this season than last because attendance at concerts has fallen off. This decline in patronage is not peculiar to St. Louis. It has occurred all over the country and has affected the related fields of entertainment as well as music. Rising costs of essential commodities—food, clothing and household goods—together with increased taxation, have caused budgetary readjustments all along the line and it is not surprising that a certain percentage of concert-goers have decided that they must get along without "live" music.

Television has also been cited as a possible deterrent to concert going but this influence is apparently negligible. Television programs, as yet, offer no substitutes for symphonic music. In any case the St. Louis Symphony Society is facing a larger deficit than was expected last spring and even then it was large enough to pose a serious problem of policy. Briefly stated the directors had to decide whether to proceed with the 1950-51 season when the necessary revenue wasn't in sight. The affirmative decision was finally made because the Society had a "nest egg" of about $85,000 which could be used, in part, to defray running expenses if no other funds became available.

★ ★ ★

THIS MONEY was a bequest from the late Mrs. Letitia Williams and it was obviously intended as a nucleus for an endowment; but since no conditions were attached to its use for any purpose it was agreed that it could be breached, as a last resort, if the only alternative was the suspension of the orchestra. Conditions have changed since spring, but for the worse. So the Williams bequest can be kept intact only if the current maintenance drive is unusually successful. The Symphony must raise not only the $150,000 needed to meet a normal season's deficit but an additional $30,000 to $40,000 to make up for the failure to realize last season's goal.

If this isn't done the nest egg will be cut in half and the orchestra will face dissolution at the end of the 1951-52 since all funds in hand will have been exhausted.

★ ★ ★

THESE ARE the hard facts. How they will be affected by the new war economy now in prospect is a matter of conjecture. Concerts take nothing away from the defense economy and so there is no civic or patriotic reason why they shouldn't continue. Raising the funds may be more or less difficult but as of now no satisfactory way of supporting the orchestra by private subsidy has been worked out.

Many other orchestras are in the same situation. The only three which are permanently safe —if the word "permanent" is at all allowable in our present state of flux—are those of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland. Philadelphia has a $2,000,000 endowment, Chicago $3,000,000 plus a concert hall and studio building and Cleveland $5,000,000 plus a hall.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra has various funds from which it has derived a sizable income but according to recent statements from the management, inroads are being made into the organization's capital and the end of that process is in sight.

★ ★ ★

FLOYD BLAIR, president and treasurer of the Philharmonic Society's Auxiliary Board, said recently that last season's deficit was $81,000 and this season's will be $150,000. With conditions as they are the Society was prepared to "meet the emergency" this year and next. After that there would be no more capital funds which could legally be touched.

The Society must therefore go to the public in a big way and ask for contributions to increase the endowment fund or to defray current expenses or both. Some members believe that the money could be raised; others are doubtful. There was a time when the Society might have hoped to get a sponsor for its Sunday afternoon broadcasts but the trend in radio, aside from the uncertainties in the whole industry brought about by television, is away from "serious" or "classical" music. Only four orchestras now broadcast regularly on national hookups; The New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony rehearsal, the Oklahoma City Symphony and the NBC Symphony. None of these has a sponsor and as Virgil Thomson recently pointed out in the New York Herald Tribune:

"All now have undesirable hours, and tape recording is making the postponement of any program likely whenever the local distributing station can sell its accustomed hour to an advertiser."

★ ★ ★

(IT SHOULD BE ADDED here that St. Louis gets only the NBC concerts directly. The Philharmonic concerts received here are from tape recording. The Oklahoma City concerts are not broadcast locally. The Firestone and Telephone hours in general are "light" if not trifling.)

In these circumstances it is natural that many persons should be considering the possibility of Federal, state or municipal subvention. A few orchestras receive modest amounts already and more may be on the way. But before a general program of governmental support is sought it would seem appropriate that all possible methods of raising funds privately should be exhausted. Perhaps some of the big foundations —the Ford Foundation, Rockefeller, etc.—could be interested.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 3 - 1950

Audience Reaction to Boston Symphony

For the first time in its 50 years at Symphony Hall, Boston Symphony Orchestra admitted the public to rehearsals. From 7:30 until up near 10, audiences, consisting mostly of college students, eagerly listened and watched as conductor Charles Munch put the finishing touches on a program for the Friday and Saturday symphony concerts. There would be long stretches of superb playing, then interruptions and repetitions to improve the effects. As shown by these photos by the Globe's Edward F. Carr, it was a treat to the younger generation of music lovers—good to hear and fascinating to watch. There will be five more such events, once a month except in February, always on a Thursday evening.

In the Guest Artists' Room, during intermission, soloist Yehudi Menuhin practices for his Mozart Concerto, and allows two students to pick up pointers, while mirror reflects the scene.

At intermission, conductor Munch braces himself with a cup of tea in the Green Room, and emphasizes a point for the second half of the rehearsal.

Spellbound, and no doubt about it.

"I didn't think he could improve on that—but he did, didn't he?"

Dreaming of Spring in November—to the strains of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony.

Some modern effects of Schoenberg's "Chamber Symphony" seem to have these girls a little bewildered.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 3- 1950

Great Orchestra at Home

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.
By H. Earle Johnson. 431 pp.
Boston: Little Brown and Company.
$6.

Reviewed by
HENRY DAVID AIKEN

THE significant history of any music hall is not simply a record of programs and names, many of which mean nothing to contemporary music lovers, but also an interpretation and assessment of the reports of those who heard the music at first hand. Such a history is not easy to write; nor has Professor Johnson accomplished his task with more than average success.

The first two chapters are devoted to a review of the circumstances which led to the building of the Hall and to a description of its physical and acoustical properties, which are justly renowned. The remaining chapters provide an exceedingly selective and choppy account of the Boston Symphony during the fifty years of its residence in the hall, the recitals and concerts given by other artists, and, finally, the non-musical activities of the hall.

The pivotal chapters, of course, are those dealing with the Symphony. During the reign of Major Higginson—and it clearly was a reign—it was in effect a German orchestra transplanted to Massachusetts Bay. Its conductors, nearly all of them of the first rank, were German; so were most of its players; and the music which they performed was overwhelmingly Austrian and German. So far as the quality of the music was concerned, this had its good and its bad side. Beethoven was not neglected; but, then, neither were Goldmark and Raff. The quality of performance, in any case, was unquestionably first-rate.

The Germanic phase came to an end with the internment of Dr. Muck during the first world war and the subsequent resignation of Higginson in 1918. The episodes which led up to the former event are retold here only in part, but enough is said to sicken at least one reader at the hysterical chauvinism displayed by patriotic philistines at that time.

Muck was succeeded in 1919 by Pierre Monteux. Thenceforth both the personnel of the orchestra and the programs played became increasingly international in character. Monteux, himself an early champion of modern French music, inaugurated a period, which continues to the present, of persistent hospitality to new music. Perhaps no other major orchestra in this country has so exemplary a record in this respect.

It is hard to say just why it should be that almost no one—Bernard Haggin is a notable exception—has yet been able to write about the achievements of Mr. Koussevitsky in a way that is free from sentimentality and exaggeration and yet remains properly appreciative of his unquestionable distinction as an orchestra leader and as an advocate of original musical talent. Mr. Johnson has succeeded in this regard no better than his predecessors. Throughout the book his writing is platitudinous and occasionally mawkish; in the chapter on Koussevitsky it becomes unbearably so. No attempt is made to analyze in detail the style and quality of Mr. Koussevitsky's performances of music of different schools and periods. Nor is there any careful substantiation of such assertions as the one that no other orchestra in the country has explored the "rewarding forgotten by-ways" of Haydn, Mozart, and Bach as did the Boston Symphony under this conductor. Actually, the appendix which lists the works performed by these composers reveals an effort much less venturesome and persistent. Thus, for example, the overworked Eine Kleine Nachtmusik was played at least seven times during Koussevitsky's tenure, but the fine Linz Symphony only once, and the magnificent Concertos, K. 491 and K. 503 not at all. Moreover, his advocacy of contemporary music has been erratic. When it was charged that the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch was "banal, vulgar, thin and unoriginal," Koussevitsky replied, "I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness." He did so—in fact eight times in ten years. But during the same period very little of Bartok's music was played, and only his Concerto for Orchestra more than once.

Mr. Johnson's praise is monotonously fulsome, but it must be said that when all due allowances are made the record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last half-century is an unusually high one. No other orchestra has so continuous a record of outstanding performances.

Mr. Aiken is a member of the Department of Philosophy, Harvard University.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION
DEC 3 1950

JACOB LATEINER

Jacob Lateiner, brilliant piano soloist with the San Diego Philharmonic Orchestra Tuesday night, made his first appearance with the orchestra at the age of 8 when he played Mendelssohn's "Concerto in G Minor" in a concert presented in Havana under the direction of Ernesto Lecuona, a composer best known here by his "Malaguena."

After the Lateiner family moved to Philadelphia, the pianist, then 11, continued his studies at Curtis Institute with Mme. Isabelle Vengerova, a wonderful teacher, by all accounts. This remarkable woman, now 74, teaches with tireless spirit both in New York and in Philadelphia. Mme. Vengerova studied with Essipoff, who in turn studied with Leschetizky, a pupil of Czerny who was a pupil of Beethoven.

BECOMES KNOWN

While still a student at Curtis, Lateiner played with the Philadelphia Orchestra and other major orchestras. He became even more widely known after his later appearances with the Boston Symphony, his debut solo recital in New York, and tours in this country, Mexico, and Australia.

Lateiner records for Columbia. His new release, Beethoven's "Sonata, Op. 111," will be available in our record shops any day, now.

After his recital Dec. 12 at the Wilshire Ebell Theater, Los Angeles, Lateiner will return to his home in New York. Lateiner has been taking time off from concert work for a period of composition study with Schoenberg.

* * *

FARICY TO PLAY

Austin Faricy will play his harpsichord and his new clavichord in a program of J. S. Bach's music Tuesday evening, Dec. 12, at the Union Congregational Church in La Jolla. The public is invited to this concert commemorating the 200th anniversary of Bach's death.

* * *

All alumni members of Phi Mu Alpha, national music fraternity, are invited to an open house this afternoon from 2 to 5 at the home of Robert Larkin, 4455 Louisiana St.

The following musicians appeared in a joint concert recently presented by Phi Mu Alpha, and Sigma Alpha Iota, national honorary music sorority: Blaine Johnson, Gretchen Dietz, and Alice Culley, pianists; John Sullivan, Baritone; Rosemary Rademacher, soprano; Robert Larkin, violinist, and Betty Rigby, soprano.

* * *

PUBLIC RECITAL

Dr. Herbert Hyde, a concert organist who has recently come here from Chicago, will give a public recital next Sunday afternoon at 4:30 in the First Presbyterian Church. Hyde has recently joined the music faculty of Balboa University.

In his coming concert, Hyde will play a group of his own compositions and a suite dedicated to him by Alec Templeton. The program will open with Handel's "Sixth Organ Concerto" and music by Bach, Dupre and Bonnet.

* * *

HARPSICHORD MUSIC

In her recent harpsichord recital in the Shatto residence, Yvonne Hammond Shatto played a fine program of harpsichord music by Bach, Handel and Scarlatti. Audience response was euthusiastic. The beautiful tone of Mrs. Shatto's harpsichord was especially enjoyed. This instrument was made by Julius Wahl, of Los Altos. Wahl formerly made pianos in Germany. He is now making harpsichords in his one-man workshop near Palo Alto.

After Mrs. Shatto's recitals, Robbie Escovado, a talented young composer-pianist, added a coda to the program by playing a group of his own compositions and a "Sonatine" by Koechlin. A melodic gift and considerable ingenuity were evident in Escovado's piano compositions, "Alborado," "Canone Chiuso," and "Adieu a l'Albatros." Style and performance were both good in the music by the French composer, Koechlin.

* * *

CHRISTMAS FANTASY

A Holiday Revue and Christmas Fantasy, produced by Carl Dewse, will be presented Tuesday evening, Dec. 19, in the San Diego Woman's Clubhouse. The Lancerettes, an ensemble of 16 high school and college girls, will be directed by Peter Lance, Hollywood pianist and arranger.

Others appearing in this revue will be Ann Jones, Alice Couchman, Patsy Harding, Rosalie Marsh, Barbara Semann, Bailey Warren, Jary Meachum and Ron Whitson, congo drummer.

This Clipping From
WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
TIMES
DEC

Off the Records

By BOB PAYNE

He is not listed among the great opera stars of today, but the singer whose voice Victor has captured on a 45 rpm dis of "La Donna E Mobile," the famous aria from "Rigoletto," appears destined for immortality.

The richness and timbre of this tenor's voice, his mastery of expression, interpretation and delivery of the operatic aria compels this reporter to predict the singer—Enrico Caruso is his name—will go down ultimately in history as the greatest in his field.

The value of a mechanical device that can keep alive the voices of long-dead artists is illustrated graphically in the Caruso recordings that make it possible for his golden voice to be heard years after his death.

This particular record is included in a new Victor album entitled "All Time Favorites." Others in the treasured set are "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," sung by Marian Anderson; Liszt's "Leibestraum" No. 3, played by the First Piano Quartet; "Jalousie," played by the Boston Pops Orchestra; "Make Believe," sung by Allan Jones; "Italian Street Song," sung by Jeannette MacDonald; "Bluebird of Happiness," sung by Jan Peerce, tenor, and "The Blue Danube," played by Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony Orchestra.

Marion Anderson also is featured in another Victor album certain to impress lovers of "voice classics." The contralto displays magnificent range and versatility in "Frauenliebe und Leben," Op. 42 (Woman's Love and Life) by Chamisso-Schumann.

Symphonic music is not always a heavy clashing of chords, a synchronized violin section's exercise on the scale, or a serious, drawn-out presentation of music with a morbid theme. It has its lighter side.

Ample proof of this is provided in a Victor 45 album entitled "Toscanini Conducts Light Music." Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra get together for short, snappy and qualitative presentations of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (Dukas), "The Skaters Waltz," (Waldteufel) and "Colas Breugnon: Overture," Op. 24. (Kabalevsky).

Alog the same line, the Boston Symphony Orchestra achieves novel musical effects in Haydn's "Toy Symphony," with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The real instruments effectively imitate their dime-store counterparts in the unique symphony.

A leading manufacturer of phonograph record changers believes the three-speed player is here to stay. Since his firm is not engaged in manufacture of records, C. P. Cushway, executive vice president of Webster-Chicago Corporation, is neutral in the fight over "which speed is best?"

But he maintains that the growing popularity of 33 1-3 rpm LP's for classical numbers and of 45s for popular songs, will not result in the demise—now or perhaps ever — of the standard 78 rpm disks.

The great bulk of sales remains in 78s, he says, and there are tens of millions of the standards in the hands of the public.

Columbia introduced the LP 33 in 1948 and RCA Victor came out with its 45s early in 1949. Since then the two companies have been feuding, with Columbia gradually bending toward the 45s for popular numbers and Victor utilizing the LP 33 more and more for its classical efforts.

CLASSIC MASTER

Sibelius Stands Alone as Composer Who Has Risen Above Passing Fads

By OLIN DOWNES

ON the 8th of December, that is to say next Friday, Sibelius celebrates in Helsinki his eighty-fifth birthday. He asked a friend recently and rather pathetically if one couldn't be permitted to pass his eighty-fifth birthday "allein." It is to be feared that this cannot happen. Certain inescapable celebrations will doubtless take place, and be accepted as courteously as possible, by a man to whom public attentions are abhorrent and who has been given less reclame in proportion to his stature as an artist than any other composer alive.

Writers who seek a famous musician as a subject for their literary flights, and who indeed need such a peg upon which to hang their special lucubrations, would not find Sibelius susceptible to their lures. A Sibelius clique could have done nothing with him. He is far too intelligent and impersonal, and as a composer too absorbed in the inviolable secrets of creation, to fall into any such ways. This is not a policy, or even a religion; it is an inalienable characteristic, and we shall not forget the day when moved by a friendly impulse he tried to answer a question about the form and general nature of his latest symphony—this was back in 1932. The man's features worked as though he were in a nightmare. Indistinct guttural exclamations struggled to come forth, until finally he shook his head and shouted desperately, "Ich kann nicht."

A corollary to Sibelius' absorption in his art has been his clear perception of where he was going as an artist. We like to recall the effect of his first visit to Bayreuth. One result of Emil Chabrier's visit there, according to the story, was his copying of the score of "Tristan," note for note. Bruckner went to the Festspielhaus as to a shrine, and he became the Wagnerian symphonist. Mahler's Brobdingnagian soul took fire from a performance of "Parsifal," and Mahler said to Sibelius that the symphony must embrace the world. Sibelius declared for pure music, an art undominated by the theatre, or any extra-musical concepts. Leaving Bayreuth, he declared his distaste for the Wagnerian esthetic, returned to Finland and wrote the "Lemminkainen" Suite.

Unhackneyed

This was in 1893-94. It is most significant that the Lemminkainen music, inspired by the poetical tale of the Kalevala, is today as fresh, beautiful and unhackneyed to our ears as it was a half-century ago.

In the "Swan of Tuonela" a young poet converses with Death the Consoler. Its simple instrumentation remains a wonder of subdued color and mystical atmosphere, while "Lemminkainen's Homecoming" stirs us deeply with its precipitant rhythms and wild glory of motion. Incidentally, the two middle numbers of this suite, long withheld from circulation, are now published, and we will bet a bottom dollar after once hearing them that the conductor who programs these pieces will have a triumph.

These are early manifestations of the lonely genius of the young Finnish master. Sibelius was, of course, to go much farther, and in more epochal, if no more tender and inspired directions. His period of nationalism and romanticism is well known to us. It produced stirring and superbly colored music, and it exemplifies strikingly Sibelius' novel, northern orchestration. It was Philip Hale who said that the instrumentation of Sibelius was "like unto Nature's instrumentation of a tempest." Perhaps Sibelius' First Symphony may decline in the repertory before the earlier "Saga," which, with its heroic spirit, its fantastical coloring and climatic power would represent, in and by itself, the advent of a new master. The First, perhaps, but not the second.

Great Symphonist

We have no intention of attempting here a catalogue of the Sibelius scores, or to mark off, as analysts are wont to do, his various "periods." However, it is now clear that the composer of the Fourth to the Seventh Symphonies inclusive, is far and away the greatest symphonist of the first half of the twentieth century. No one has approached or paralleled the phenomenon of the Fourth Symphony in its compression, originality and unprecedented developments.

The harmonic as well as thematic working out of the C natural-F sharp major chordal relations is still entirely new, and may be compared with profit to the procedure of Stravinsky in the same year—1911—with the same basic problem of the two very distantly related triads. The flowering of the two first movements of the Fifth Symphony from the introductory measures is a manifestation, as organic and masterful in a wholly different way, as any germinal working out of Beethoven. There is a raging climax in the finale of the Fourth which ignites, from dissonance to dissonance, with the violence of a chain explosion. The final pages of the Fifth, with polyharmonic brass and wood hymning the theme, and the harmonic crashes and the superimposed tensions of the strings are of unduplicated workmanship and overwhelming grandeur.

One has barely touched in this paragraph on a few illustrative details of Sibelius' art, by way of indicating the immense arch of his progress from the early days of folk poetry and legend to the "absolute" music of the later masterpieces.

It was after the first World War that there came the period in composition of retrenchment in the proportions, forms, instrumentation of the symphonic design. Neoclassicism was the word. The heroic romantic gesture was deemed fustian fit only for the credulous and the bourgeois. The composers claimed a return in their scores to simplicity, objectivity, economy of means, purity of form, as exemplified by classic masterpieces of the eighteenth century. Certain of them even attempted, sedulously if superficially, to emulate the actual idioms of Corelli, Pergolesi, Scarlatti, Mozart, et al. And no more "program music," and a bas

JEAN SIBELIUS, FINNISH COMPOSER, WILL BE 85 NEXT FRIDAY

International Foto Service (Tuovi Nousiainen and Bertil Dahlgren)

A recent photograph of him with his wife, Aino, at their home called Ainola in her honor, where he lives just outside of Helsinki.

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
ENTERPRISE
DEC 4 1950

In the World of Music

Choir College to Expand

The Westminster Choir College as embarked on a $12,000,000 xpansion program, it has been nnounced by its president, Dr. ohn Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the l-acre former Lambert estate in rinceton, N. J., into a campus ntaining a chapel seating 1,200, large concert auditorium for 500, a smaller auditorium for 00 and an open-air amphithea- r to seat 15,000. There also ould be an education building, ormitories, dining halls, gym- sium, playing fields and parking ace for automobiles.

The building program will en- le the college to extend its mu- c training facilities to about 500 adergraduate and 100 graduate udents. Dr. Williamson and Ar- ur Judson, chairman of the uilding committee, said they oped the college would become a nique music center where the ublic may gather to hear the reatest orchestras, choruses, and world-famed artists. Judson is nanager of the New York Phil- armonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon s enough funds are made avail- able, although it is not planned to olicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. nd Mrs. Williamson to provide rained church musicians. While hat still remains the college's pri- mary goal, the new building pro- gram is expected to make the cam- pus a public cultural center sec- ond to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a win- ner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented by the foundation this season.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous Orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the facul- ty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown opened to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inabili- ty of many students to hear Bos- ton's Orchestra, because of a com- pletely-subscribed season.

The experiment has a prece- dent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehears- als on Friday afternoon were sim- ilarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular sub- scription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second bal- cony.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 4 1950

Brahms in Paris: In other words the very fine new record- ing of the fourth Brahams sym- phony by the Boston Symphony, as conducted by Charles Muench, makes good listening, but it has a "French" slant which possibly coerces a little the moods of this specifically German work.

Where a Furtwaengler, a Men- gelberg or Bruno Walter per- ceive this work "in the light of eternity," Muench is more mun- dane and treats it with "esprit." One could never accuse the great French conductor of leading his Bostonians into musical distor- tions, but his emotional approach by way of tempos and less dra- matic breadth than traditional is surprising.

I am not for the pot-bellied heaviness that often goes for Brahmsian profundity, but there is something deeper in the first two movements, something of an epic accounting in the finale which Muench treats (with vir- tuosity) more as a fine musical pattern.

Horowitz at His Best: Victor has achieved some of its best piano recordings in the Schu- mann "Kinder Scenen" which Horowitz plays with simple com- pleteness that will remain a model.

This Clipping From
LATROBE, PA.
BULLETIN
DEC 6 - 1950

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13, as a win- ner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented by the foundation this season.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous Orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College, at Ann- ville.

* * *

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inabil- ity of many students to hear Bos- ton's Orchestra, because of com- pletely-subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the or- chestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoon were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for stu- dents are listed for Thursday eve- nings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

* * *

"The Barrier" is an operatic type of musical drama that brings Lawrence Tibbett to Broadway after 25 years at the Metropolitan Opera.

It is a story of racial conflict in the south which lacks inventive- ness and freshness, and the score by Jan Meyerowitz is completely without variety. There is little spoken dialogue.

Langston Hugher wrote the li- bretto and lyrics, basing the story on his play of 15 years ago, "The Mulatto." Choreography for a flashback sequence was supervised by Charles Weidman and Doris Humphrey, and the latter staged the play for producers Michael Myerberg and Joel Spector.

Tibbett acquits himself well as a plantation owner who eventual- ly is killed by one of his mixed blood offspring. Muriel Rahn is fine as the mistress of the owner, and Wilton Clary turns in a good job as the mulatto who kills his white father.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 4 - 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sev- enth program of the 70th season in Sym- phony Hall yesterday afternoon. The assisting artists were the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor; Peter Sliker, tenor; John Clegg, baritone, and the Rev. Peter R. Blynn, narrator. The program:

"Le Mystere des Saints Innocents" Barraud
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

With characteristic courage, Serge Koussevitzky chose yester- day afternoon to do a brand new work although, as guest conduc- tor, he had every right to fall back on his tried and true pieces for old times' sake. That the work in question didn't make too much ef- fect and that Koussevitzky was doubtless well aware it wouldn't is beside the point: he has always been a champion of new music, and it is to his great credit that he remained in character yester- day.

The work was Henri Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Inno- cents," an oratoro based on Charles Peguy's excessively mys- tical poem drawn from the mas- sacre of the innocents by Herod. Barraud, a contemporary French composer who is also director of the Radiodiffusion Francaise, was inspired in his oratorio by the death of his brother, a hero of the French resistance, at the hands of a German firing squad.

There is thus an atmosphere throughout the work of intense devotion; it is in fact one of the most musico-religious expressions to appear in some time. It is set for four part chorus, children's chorus (sung here by the so- pranos), tenor and baritone solo- ists, and a narrator with a large orchestra. Vocally it is often very beautiful to hear as the style combines the austerity of four- part liturgical polyphony with the naive melodic influence of archaic French folksong. It is not without the impact of con- temporary dissonant counterpoint and rhythmic complexity, how- ever, and achieves moments of powerful vocal tension.

Where it loses its effect is in the strangely derivative sound of the orchestra. The composer does achieve some interesting sonori- ties, but for the most part there are reminiscences of nearly every French school. On their own the choral sections of "Le Mystere" would prove, I am sure, touching and effective. With the orchestra the overall impression is weak- ened; the sounds are not always appropriate to the vocal lines. Thus considered as music and nothing else, this oratorio is not successfully exportable from France; considered for its mys- tico-religious content and its in- spiration in deep personal loss, it more than makes its own-way.

It must be said that the Chor- us Pro Musica, trained for the oc- casion by its director, Alfred Nash Patterson, once again demon- strated itself a really first class choral ensemble, in this formid- ably difficult vocal enterprise. The quality in all voices was ex- cellent, the sopranos doing espe- cially well in this regard, but most commendable was the accu- racy of intonation in dissonant counterpoints and divisis calling for eight voices. Its rhythmic ac- curacy was notable, too, and so for that matter was its enuncia- tion.

The Rev. Peter R. Blynn of the Church of the Advent spoke the narration in just the proper style, too, blending warmth of voice with liturgical rise and fall of period. The solos by Peter Sliker and John Clegg, though not profes- sional, were suitably done, and the sopranos managed to catch much of the character of chil- dren's voices in the closing sec- tion.

Koussevitzky brought the pro- gram to a close with his familiar but always exciting reading of Sibelius' Second Symphony, and with it bid goodbye, for the pres- ent, to the Friday and Saturday audiences of the Boston Sym- phony. It has been a fine and ex- citing fortnight, and I think I speak for all in bidding him an affectionate and appreciative "au revoir." The orchestra is on tour next week, returning on Dec. 15 with Charles Munch conducting. Aldo Cicclini, pianist, will be the soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 4 - 1950

'Open Rehearsals' Continue December 14

The "Open Rehearsal" series launched by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last month on the initi- ative of conductor Charles Munch, continues on Thursday evening, Dec. 14. Starting at 7:30, the session will end between 9:30 and 10. At the first of the series of five such events, the audience registered hearty satisfaction with this new experience. Since the regular concerts are fully sub- scribed for the year, this was a means of hearing the orchestra and watching its colorful conduc- tor despite that situation.

At the Open Rehearsal of Dec. 14, the gifted young Italian pian- ist, Aldo Ciccolini, will be wit- nessed at work with Mr. Munch and the orchestra in the prepara- tion of Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B flat minor. Mr. Ciccolini is making his first visit to this coun- try, and the rehearsal audience will hear him before the subscrip- tion audience, of course.

The remaining dates are: Dec. 14, Jan. 24, March 1 and April 26. All are Thursdays, except Jan. 24, a Wednesday. Subscription tickets for all four remaining dates in the series at $7 (including the tax) will go on sale at Symphony Hall box office on Saturday morn- ing, Dec. 10, at 10 o'clock. Tickets for a single rehearsal are $2, in- cluding the tax.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 5 - 1950

Everything but Ventilation

Editor:

Last Tuesday evening we attended the most wonderful concert that has come our way in years—the Boston Symphony Or- chestra playing Brahms 3rd and Sibelius 2nd Symphony conducted by Koussevitzky in our new state auditorium. Acoustics per- fect, lighting perfect, but—and we mean a great big but! We presume that our new Veterans Memorial Auditorium has a ven- tilating system. Then why was it not used?

After the intermission we could hardly see the orchestra through the blue smoke haze! There must be a ventilating system in our new hall, else how could it have been heated to such an uncomfortably high tem- perature without the use of visible radi- ators? We would like to co-operate. We would be glad to loan the services of our church sexton for the next symphony con- cert. He knows that a large audience is most comfortable if the temperature of the auditorium is not allowed to rise over 72 degrees, and that a generous quantity of fresh air at this temperature should be furnished.

HALF BAKED.

Pawtucket.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 6 1950

Various Mozartiana: The in- exhaustable Mozart genius re- mains an ever-productive source for collectors. Charles Muench and the Boston Symphony (Vic- tor 12-inch LP) offer a fine "Kleine Nacht Musik," coupled with Haydn's "Oxford" Sym phony.

Thanks to Westminster two de lightful 12-inch disks have been made by the Vienna Philarmoni under Henry Swoboda. They d well by details and spirit of such early symphonies as the No. 1 in F-major and the No. 30 i D-major.

[177]

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
DEC 6 - 1950

Music . . .

Henriot Plays With Orchestra

Young French Pianist In Schumann Concerto

By Eric McLean

Two renowned French artists collaborated last night for Les Concerts Symphoniques in the program which closes the first half of the orchestra's season. Nicole Henriot returned as soloist in the Schumann concerto (in which she made her first appearance with the orchestra three years ago), and Charles Munch conducted Handel's Fireworks music, Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Arthur Honegger, and finally Saint-Saens big symphony, No. 3.

Because so little time has elapsed since Miss Henriot's last performance of the Schumann Concerto in this city, it is possible to make a comparison. The two performances were quite different. Last night Miss Henriot was a sharper, more brilliant, and probably more reliable pianist than the first time she appeared here. The opening chords of the Concerto were struck out like sparks from an anvil.

Another change in Miss Henriot's playing was the treatment of tempi. In her first performance here, Miss Henriot took great liberties with the speed to achieve a personal expression. Last night, the Schumann was played with only the minimum of variation.

All in all, Miss Henriot is probably a better pianist today than three years ago. Technically, she is completely equipped. She can produce tremendous power at the keyboard, and has great variety of tone and dynamics. But in the Schumann last night there were only two or three passages which could have been termed personal expression.

It is true that the Schumann has been played so often that personal expression has become next to impossible. But it is for that small margin of subjective meaning that the interpreter must strive, or else he finds himself parroting musical phrases already too familiar to the listener.

For sheer musical life, the liveliest thing on the program was the Saint-Saens Symphony No. 3, with which Charles Munch performed a feat which could be described as the musical equivalent of making a silk purse from a sow's ear. By the time the performance was concluded, many of the audience (including myself) were prepared to accept Saint-Saens as an unrecognized musical god. Fortunately, the feeling disappeared the moment Munch lowered his baton.

This performance of the Saint-Saens Symphony was a feat of conducting rarely seen in Montreal. Munch gave the tritest tune and the most inconsequential rhythm real significance. The orchestra carried his enthusiasm, and were able to support Munch's great demands to the very end.

The Handel Music for the Royal Fireworks was given a lively and enjoyable performance despite some wobbly playing in the brass.

More time and space should probably be devoted to the Honegger selection. It struck me as being pleasant but not particularly memorable, except for the excellent fugue section. I would want to hear it three or four more times.

The program will be repeated this evening.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
DEC 6 - 1950

Orchestra Heard In Saint-Saens

Munch Directs Third Symphony; Henriot in Schumann

By THOMAS ARCHER

Charles Munch directed the Orchestra of Les Concerts Symphoniques in a brilliant performance of the Saint-Saens Third Symphony last night at the Plateau Hall, and supported the young French pianist, Nicole Henriot, in one of the Schumann Piano Concerto that brought out the beauty of that great work in no small measure.

The late Sir Donald Tovey was once asked by a musical snob why he placed Saint-Saens on his Edinburgh symphony programs. "Because," answered Tovey, "he is so damnably clever."

Saint-Saens is always effective, and in this symphony he is enormously so. Hearing it so magnificently played, as in this instance, there are times when you are almost persuaded of its near greatness. In any event it is beautifully scored and full of instrumental color. It is bad to underestimate Saint-Saens.

The orchestra has never played with more beauty of tone, clarity of parts, rhythmic vitality and sense of symphonic drama. The Saint-Saens work is evidently a vehicle for Mr. Munch for it reveals in full his chief qualities as a conductor. his ability to dramatize such a score, to draw from it its color possibilities, and to make his musicians play with both intensity and discipline.

Miss Henriot and Mr. Munch have evidently colloborated many times in concerto playing. With the Schumann a true balance was struck between the solo part and the orchestra. Except for a little forcing by the pianist in the opening measures it was an eminently satisfactory performance.

Miss Henriot's playing is clear, fresh and vigorous. She displayed a welcome understanding of the Schumann idiom with its broad contrast between headlong enthusiasm and intimate romance. The second movement was charmingly done, it had just the right poise and intimacy, the personal, conversational style in which Schumann is matchless. The finale was played in a dashing, chevalieresque style with the music always under control.

The program included a Prelude, Fugue and Postlude by Arthur Honegger, one of the very few novelties the orchestra has offered in the past year or so. It is a solid, if rather dry work. The prelude, with its vivid orchestration and impressive harmonic patterns would seem to be the best of the three movements. Excerpts from Handel's Fireworks Music were authoritatively given.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
DEC 6 1950

Boston Symphony

All-Brahms Program Directed by Koussevitzky Registers Triumph for Griffith Series

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

A performance of exalting beauty was given last night at the Mosque Theater by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The renowned group, by now a familiar feature of the local musical landscape, was directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in an all-Brahms program. The event was the first of a series of symphony concerts arranged and sponsored by Griffith Music Foundation.

It should be said at once that the Foundation deserves the gratitude of every member of last night's audience of nearly 8,500 for providing such a transporting concert. This is no small thing in these days of threatened doom, to be taken for several hours into a world in which beauty is the paramount consideration, where nothing matters but the striving for perfection.

Close at Hand

Such, certainly, appeared to be the aim and purpose of Dr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra. And to the enthralled audience, which listened with rapt attentiveness, perfection seemed very close at hand.

It was especially close in the symphony, Brahms's First, which occupied the second half of the program. The venerable conductor, florid and smiling of face and always deeply expressive of gesture, had been mustering his forces throughout the earlier part of the evening. When the First, the magnificent C Minor, came to hand, he let loose all the pent-up energy with tremendous results.

From the ominous timpani beats which open the symphony, it was evident that here was no routine run-through but rather a transfiguration of the music. The opening section went with a rhythmical drive that was refreshing to the spirit. The slow movement sang with an eloquence that is not often given to it. For once, the scherzo held together as a sort of grandiose joke, written with amazing cleverness.

But the real miracle took place in the finale. The opening section was like a vision of high country (Brahms wrote it during a visit to the Alps), succeeded by the broad and sweeping measures of the allegro. The final peroration, with its shouting brasses and irresistible momentum, was absolutely astounding. And, quite rightly, the audience's acclaim was equally deafening.

Wistful Charm

Of the earlier works, the "Tragic" Overture was by far the more interesting. Made up of appealing little tunes, most of them sad rather than tragic in character, the work has a wistful charm that is unique. A fugal section was realized with a casual deftness that only the Bostonians appear able to achieve.

The remaining composition, the Third Symphony in F Major, never struck this reviewer as one of Brahms's top-notch, major efforts. Throughout, except for a few loud passages, the composition has the sound of chamber music on a fairly large scale. And that is how Koussevitzky played it—with all the clarity, delicacy, attention to detail, balance of inner harmonies that one finds in a good performance of, say, one of the Brahms sextets. There was nothing niggardly about the performance, of course. But one felt that here the composer was occupying rather a small orbit.

All of which helped to emphasize the grandeur and strength of the C Minor that followed. In all works large or small, the orchestra was without peer for warmth, accuracy and ensemble spirit, answering fervently to every demand made by Koussevitzky. May he return to visit us again soon!

This Clipping From
BAKERSFIELD, CALIF.
CALIFORNIAN
DEC 6 1950

HARP TRIO, BARITONE TO ENTERTAIN CLUB MONDAY

Appropriately enough, the Christmas program Monday of Woman's Club of Bakersfield, will be one of the big entertainments of the year. Not only will the Hazel Schertzinger Harp Trio be heard in seasonal music, but John Lombardi, baritone, will sing. He will be accompanied by Ernest St. John Metz, well-known pianist. In addition, the club's own choral group, directed and accompanied by Mrs. Josephine Sweney, will sing three French carols as a finale for the business hour, to be presided over by Mrs. Ralph Baker.

Mrs. Ardrey

Mrs. J. E. Ardrey will introduce Mr. Lombardi and the trio members, who are Gloria Jardine, Karin Bigler and Marie Lundberg.

The harpists, coached by Hazel Schertzinger, is now entering its second season of concerts, and has appeared before many organizations of southern California. John Metz will be at the piano.

In Operatic Roles

Mr. Lombardi was born in Rome. He made his operatic debut as Silvio in Pagliacci after coming to this country at 16 years of age. During World War II he served on a destroyer. Early in his post-war career he came to the attention of Arthur Fiedler, who engaged him to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1947 he sang in Il Trovatore and La Boheme at the Philharmonic in Los Angeles. He sang with the American and National Opera Company in Rigoletto, Pagliacci, Masked Ball and Traviata. He has concertized and appeared on television recently, portraying the role of Tonio for Music Theater.

John Lombardi, singer

Mrs. Ralph R. Jackson is the club's program chairman.

This Clipping From
Boston Mass. Leader
DEC 7 - 1950

Koussevitzky Completes 2nd Week As Guest Conductor Amid Enthusiastic Applause

By MARGARET EARLE

Serge Koussevitzky's second week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was greeted as spontaneously and enthusiastically as was his first, and his presentation of a controversial French choral work by Henry Barraud which was given its American premiere last Friday was received with resounding plaudits. Welcomed by a house that was "sold out" for a second consecutive week, and such comments as "Isn't it wonderful to have him back!", Koussevitzky appeared happy to be in "home territory" once again.

The entire audience relaxed as he raised his baton to conduct one of his favorites, the D Major Symphony of Sibelius. Koussevitzky, less a specialist than most conductors, excels in Sibelius, whose birthday was celebrated in the musical world last week. A series of photographs, one showing Sibelius and Koussevitzky together, and a bust of the Finnish composer by Natalie Koussevitzky, the conductor's first wife, were among the displays at Symphony Hall.

It would be difficut to say whom the audience prefers — Munch or Koussevitzky, for they are entirely different personalities and conductors. Whereas Munch is "easy" with his men, Koussevitzky "drives" them to a dramatic pitch to which the audience is accustomed.

Koussevitzky retired from the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1948 after an illustrious career which took him through twenty-five years as conductor of that distinguished group. Upon his resignation, Boston music lovers felt they had lost a spectacular artist and a beloved friend. When Charles Munch took over the baton in 1949, he entered sacred territory, and it was feared that his efforts, however good, would not receive the enthusiasm Koussevitzky had won. Mr. Munch, however, has captured the admiration of his audiences in his months as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Symphony goers seem to enjoy his style, which places particular emphasis upon French compositions.

During his conductorship, Munch completely revised the seating plan of the orchestra and in his performance last week, Koussevitzky occasionally gave signals to the wrong sections. Munch also changed the orchestra's elevation but many people feel that the former conductor produced better tones with the old arrangement.

Koussevitzky's performance of Sibelius last Friday evening climaxed his appearance as guest conductor in Boston. Subsequently, he will conduct the Israel Philharmonic on its first American tour. But Boston audiences proved however, that their memories are not short and that they had not forgotten this man who, as one woman remarked, "makes us feel that he belongs to us, that we belong to him, and that we both belong together."

7

COMPOSER OF TALENT

Swanson Has Long Wait For Recognition

By CARTER HARMAN

HOWARD Swanson, whose Short Symphony was premiered by the Philharmonic-Symphony with critical acclaim some days ago, says he is not much of a talker, that he puts all of his thought into his music. But, over a cup of coffee the other day, he spoke earnestly of his life and of his musical convictions.

Running through his conversation was a quietly intense belief in his talent—a quietness and intensity that are reflected in his symphony—coupled with a subtle sense of discouragement with his lot. Mr. Swanson is a Negro, 41 years old, whose professional success has been notable only for the past two years.

He knew of his musical gift as a boy, when he had a fine soprano voice and a good ear. When he moved to Cleveland at the age of 9, he determined to study piano and theory. This he continued to do even when he had to support his family. His talent was soon apparent to others, and he was rewarded with a Rosenwald Fellowship which paid his way to Europe in 1930.

He spoke of those two years with detailed memory that he could not bring to bear on his later life in New York. His year in Paris; his departure on foot, leaving all his possessions, two days before the Nazis entered; his forty-mile hike to the south of France; his unfulfilled intention to visit Arab friends in Africa; his ten months' delay in Spain and Portugal before returning here—all these things were clear to him as yesterday's events.

Own Style

"You aren't going to print that, are you?" he asked incredulously when he saw his words being noted down. "What good would that do? I don't want personal publicity. I don't think it would do any good for music. People don't pay much attention to those things. * * *"

Reluctantly he returned to the subject, explaining his loss of heart at leaving Paris before he could complete some large works and get a reputation started, and at the futility of returning to Cleveland. But at least he had begun to understand his own, natural style.

"I experimented with atonalism," he said, "but it never quite satisfied me. Now my music has something 'familiar' about it. Probably comes from the kind of melody I write. People often think it sounds like something they have heard. Sometimes I think so myself, but it doesn't really. It just has a familiar quality."

Mr. Swanson thought this was not only part of his style but was important to music as a whole, because it permits the composer to speak, as it were, to every listener individually rather than as part of a crowd. This, he believes, is of vital importance to composer and audience alike.

The confidence in his ability to communicate carried him through the lean years that followed his departure from Paris. He held a job as a file clerk for three of them, but he had no time for composing and he finally quit with just enough money for three weeks. In that time he completed his first symphony, which up to now has not received a public performance.

Like many another composer, he was convinced that he must write music at any cost, so he did not go back to work but swallowed pride and accepted help from those who believed in him. He would not speak in detail about how he lived then.

Chance

As they often do for musicians, things began to break for Mr. Swanson by chance. David Allen, a pianist friend, was working with Helen Thigpen a couple of years ago, and showed the composer's songs to her. She took a fancy to them and included them in her recitals here and out of town, and sang them at Columbia University's American Music Festival last spring.

Alma Morgenthau, a patron of the arts, who scheduled his "Night Music" at her Locust Valley (L. I.) Music Festival several months ago, invited the composer and Dimitri Mitropoulos to a dinner in January. Miss Thigpen sang and Mr. Allen played Mr. Swanson's piano sonata, and the conductor immediately offered to look at an orchestral work with an eye to performance. That work was the Short Symphony.

If this were a Hollywood script it would probably end here. But Mr. Swanson's life has not been drastically changed except for a wider public recognition. The only financial advantage he got from his Philharmonic performances was that the orchestra paid rent—to the publisher—for score and parts. Mr. Swanson will collect his share from A. S. C. A. P. Mr. Mitropoulos has, however, conducted a recording of "Night Music," which is not yet released for public distribution.

Mr. Swanson does not expect to find himself on easy street, and, as a matter of fact, is rather nervous about becoming famous. He remembers what one of the composers who recommended him for the Rosenwald Fellowship said eleven years ago:

"Somebody has to write American music. It might as well be you."

This Clipping From
Boston Mass. Leader
DEC 7 - 1950

Symphony's 2nd "Open Rehearsal" December 14th

The "Open Rehearsal" series launched by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last month on the initiative of conductor Charles Munch, continues on Thursday evening, December 14. Starting at 7:30, the session will end between 9:30 and 10. At the first of the series of five such events, the audience registered hearty satisfaction with this new experience. Since the regular concerts are fully subscribed for the year, this was a means of hearing the orchestra and watching its colorful conductor despite that situation.

There was an opportunity to hear periods of unbroken playing, combined with interruptions and repetitions which gave fascinating glimpses of the procedures by which Mr. Munch works with the orchestra to seek improved musical expressiveness. It should be noted that the public is excluded from the regular rehearsals.

A highlight of the initial session was when Yehudi Menuhin joined in to complete his preparation of a Mozart Concerto. Incidentally, he declared this new series to be an important innovation in the symphony orchestra field. He felt that it would add greatly to public appreciation of symphony concerts, and draw public and orchestra closer together.

At the Open Rehearsal of December 14, the gifted young Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, will be witnessed at work with Mr. Munch and the orchestra in the preparation of Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B flat minor. Mr. Ciccolini is making his first visit to this country, and the rehearsal audience will hear him before the subscription audience, of course.

The remaining dates are: December 14, January 24, March 1 and April 26. All are Thursdays, except January 24, a Wednesday.

[179]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
DEC 7 - 1950

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Serge Koussevitzky returned as special guest for the Boston Symphony's 70th season to give a specialized program in Carnegie Hall last night.

With Sibelius' 85th birthday coming up tomorrow it was inevitable and fitting that Koussevitzky pay tribute to the most noted of living composers.

That the program was characteristic of Koussevitzky and the performances equally characteristic goes almost without saying. Sibelius' symphonic fantasia "Pohjola's Daughter" and Fifth Symphony led off and the Brahms First Symphony rounded out the evening.

Koussevitzky fashioned the Fifth Symphony as he has so knowingly many times. His ardent belief in the score illumined its beauty and its greatness.

As one of the masterpieces of the 20th century, it once again radiated its final triumph in the last movement even though the pace was a trifle slower than it should have been and the horns not quite so proclamative as in performances of recent memory.

The Bostonians' "music director emeritus" was definitely in command again as he drew out the fineness of the strings and achieved that refinement of performance for which he is noted. In deference to his reappearance, the audience rose on his entrance.

* * *

"Barber" Restored?

Rossini's "Barber of Seville" entertained a responsive audience at the Metropolitan last night.

Restored to the repertory after a season's absence, the work was offered with a strong cast, a fresh musical direction, and a routine stage direction in spite of some touching up here and there.

The lineup of Lily Pons as Rosina, Giuseppe di Stefano as the Count, Salvatore Baccaloni as Dr. Bartolo, Giuseppe Valdengo as Figaro, and Cesare Siepi as Don Basilio promised more vocally than it delivered but injected plenty of spirit together with the usual dash of horse-play into the proceedings.

The vocal honors went unmistakably to Siepi. Miss Pons sang her coloratura with her customary skill but became inaudible in the ensembles and miniature except in her solo flights. The rest did a good, solid job

This Clipping From
FOND DU LAC, WIS.
Commonwealth Reporter
DEC 7 - 1950

Author Of Week

By W. G. ROGERS

John N. Burk, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & The Sun
DEC 7 - 1950

Music

Koussevitzky, Sibelius Saluted

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall served the double purpose of reuniting the orchestra with its former conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and marking the birthday of Jean Sibelius, who will be 85 tomorrow.

Mr. Koussevitzky, looking dapper and spry, was visibly moved by the greeting of his local following. When he appeared almost the entire audience rose and gave him a prolonged ovation. Those interested in such matters will be pleased to know that the maestro is now billed as "music director emeritus."

And those who had forgotten just what kind of maestro he was had a refresher course in last night's performances of Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter" and Fifth Symphony. Brahms' First Symphony rounded out the bill.

It was only fitting that Mr. Koussevitzky should have been on hand to celebrate the birthday of the dean of world composers. The Finnish master has always found an ace interpreter in the conductor "emeritus"—an interpreter whom many regarded as Sibelius' goodwill ambassador in America.

Many have gone so far as to say that there is only one god in modern music—Sibelius—and his prophet is Mr. Koussevitzky. Certainly his propaganda for the master has been of the best kind—the propaganda of good and frequent performances.

Last night's readings were a reminder of the power of the dynamic little man with the baton. The music of Sibelius swirled in exciting spirals of tone. Drama was implicit in the very balance and tempi adopted. The tone was so transparent one almost could see what the music was saying. Even Sibelius might have learned something about his music from last night's concert.

* * *

Sibelius at 85.

Tomorrow the eyes of the music world will be on a little house in the woods north of Helsinki. There Jean Sibelius will celebrate his 85th birthday with his children and grandchildren.

The master lives a simple life in a small community he joined 45 years ago. Cut off from the outer world, he has become a legend. He is one of the few composers of our time who may rightly be called a classic.

Carleton Smith tells me he asked Sibelius about that Eighth Symphony which has long been shrouded in mystery. All he got from him was the reply: "Those people who ask me about my music don't help me to write it."

Several weeks ago, during a visit to Sibelius' home, Mr. Smith was told by the composer's wife that the Eighth Symphony "doesn't exist" and that Sibelius "has destroyed everything he wrote in the last 25 years."

However, one of the maids told Mr. Smith that some 500 sheets of manuscript are piled up in a small upstairs room which Sibelius uses as his music study.

"I think he wants his last symphony to be his greatest," Mr. Smith tells me. "So he won't release it until he's positive it is. When I asked him about it this time he put his hand over his heart and said:

"'That is my secret.'"

Admirers of Sibelius' music are hereby reminded that the master has one passion—cigars, which are scarce in Finland. Mr. Koussevitzky, Arturo Toscanini, Jascha Heifetz and Marian Anderson have sent contributions to the National Arts Foundation.

"When smoking your fine Havanas I feel on the top of my life, which is pretty much when one is 84," he wrote recently in his own brand of self-learned English.

This Clipping From
Boston Mass. Leader
DEC 7 - 1950

Programs Given For Next Concerts By Symphony Orch.

Following the second trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York this week, the eight pair of concerts in the [illegible] Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening series will take place in Symphony Hall December 15 and 16, and the second concert of the Cambridge series on Tuesday, December 12, in Sanders Theatre.

For the Boston concerts Charles Munch, returning from his vacation, will present Haydn's Symphony in E-flat major, No. 103, known as the "Drum Roll," Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto in B-flat minor, and two works by Maurice Ravel, the less familiar First Suite from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Rapsodie Espagnole. Notable at these concerts will be the first appearance in Boston of the young Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, who is making his first visit to ths country in the present season.

In Cambridge Mr. Munch will present Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," and the First Symphony of Robert Schumann.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 7 - 1950

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

Koussevitzky Returns

Serge Koussevitzky, now the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director Emeritus, conducted the third concert of this notable organization's Carnegie Hall evening series yesterday, and began our local observance of Jean Sibelius's eighty-fifth birthday (tomorrow) by devoting the first half of his program to the eminent Finnish composer's "Pohjola's Daughter" and fifth symphony. Brahms's first symphony completed the list.

Seventeen months have elapsed since Dr. Koussevitzky made his last New York appearance as the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, completing twenty-five seasons in this position. In the mean time, he has been active in conducting orchestras on this and three other continents. The orchestra and the audience rose when he first appeared upon the stage to begin a performance which was marked by the interpretative powers which he has exhibited here on many previous occasions.

Both the Bostonians and our Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra are joining in the observance here of the Sibelius anniversary; a Sibelius symphony will be played in Carnegie Hall today, and each of the next three days. The occasion calls, indeed, for some extra-curricular observances on the position and significance of his music, but this must await some occasion with less temporal limitation. The tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter" has not been played here for ten years; its current neglect is undeserved. With ingenuity of form and cogency of musical ideas, it gave an impression of freshness and the combination of individual personality and national flavor which marks Sibelius's music. The same can be said about the fifth symphony, first played here twenty-eight years ago. Time has passed since Sibelius's orchestral works were characterized as austere; this work is essentially romantic.

Admirable playing marked the performances of all three works in the program. Dr. Koussevitzky has long been noted as a champion of Sibelius' works, and his interpretation realized the essential savor both of the symphonic poem and the symphony, with pervasive lucidity and eloquence, just proportions of orchestral sonority. Both readings gave a sense of spaciousness. The interpretation of the Brahms symphony also found the conductor in his best form, broad, expressive and sonorous, stylistically persuasive. Apart from an unusual ritardando in a section of the finale, the tempi were straightforward and well conceived; the chorale near the close had one of the most imposing proclamations which it has received in Carnegie Hall's long history.

American Bach

The American Bach Society made its debut in Times Hall last night under Martin Bernstein's direction. When we think of how disproportionate the performances of Bach's cantatas are to the imposing figure of some two hundred that he wrote, we must welcome a group that will concentrate on this treasury of music. Not since the old Friends of Music have we had any substantial representation of this literature in mid-town concert halls.

Mr. Bernstein has sought to approximate Bach's proportions by settling on the number of twenty, which is about the size of his chorus and also about the size of his orchestra. But the latter produces a fuller sound than the singers, especialy fuller than the tenors and basses.

Perhaps Mr. Bernstein is not yet acquainted with the acoustics of the hall, and did not realize how loud his orchestra was playing. It not only covered the chorus in many instances, but performing by itself, in the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, its sound was also overbearing. The performances were otherwise creditable, but uneven.

The intonation of the string body as a whole was remarkably good for a group just formed. Individual members were at times out of tune with Robert Conant's harpsichord, which was, in addition, not quite audible enough. There was a fine concert master, Joseph Margolies, and other good soloists too numerous to mention.

The solo singers were Joan Brainerd, soprano; Jean Handzlik, alto; Howard Fried, tenor, and Jerome Sacks, bass. Any organization consigned to one area of music literature has the especially difficult task of distilling every last ounce of variety out of this material, and this is an accomplishment that still lies ahead of Mr. Bernstein. Since his is a young group faced with very difficult music to perform, his efforts call for a certain patience on our part. Organizations with such ambitious intentions do not spring up full-blown.

A. B.

Barraud Oratorio

Chorus Pro Musica Heard Under Koussevitzky's Baton

By Harold Rogers

Serge Koussevitzky, musical director emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the first American performance yesterday afternoon of "Le Mystère des Saints Innocents," an oratorio in five parts by Henry Barraud. This formidable work, even with 62 bars cut from the fourth part, lasted for 55 minutes. After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky played the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

The oratorio, first performed on May 8, 1947, by the Orchestre National of the Radiodiffusion Française, is dedicated to the memory of Jean Barraud, the composer's brother. The composer himself is director of the Radiodiffusion. The text is drawn from the mystical writings of Charles Péguy (1873-1914), a convert to Roman Catholicism. While each part is in the nature of a meditation, the fifth part deals more literally with Herod's slaughter of the innocents shortly after the birth of Jesus.

* * *

God throughout is represented in the text as speaking in the first person. There are symbolical observations on faith, hope, and charity. There are remarks about the crucifixion, the prayers of sinners and of sleepy children, and the slaughter ordered by Herod. The mood of the music alternates between ecstatic reverie and agonized, impassioned outbursts.

The Chorus pro Musica, trained by Alfred Nash Patterson, their regular conductor, sang the choral parts in French, as did John Clegg and Peter Sliker, the tenor and baritone soloists. The narration, however, was given in English by the Rev. Peter R. Blynn of the Church of the Advent in Boston. He declaimed his words in a straight line and even tone.

The music itself is apparently conceived in three styles—medieval plain chant (the men's voices moving in gaunt consecutive fifths), the impressionism of Debussy, and the more cacophonical methods of the post-impressionists. Yet each style ably serves the mystical structure of the piece.

Music can be judged on two bases—what it says to the ear and what it says to the heart. Those listeners who are attuned to Péguy's mysticism are likely to react to this music more intensely than those who are not. The listeners who are not sympathetic to the mystical approach will doubtless find this music more of an aural experience than an emotional one.

* * *

The ear, in this case, is flooded with great waves of sound, many of which mount to tidal proportions. This wailing, moaning, or shouting usually subsides into serene pools of sadness and mourning. The vocal writing in the quieter portions is extremely well done so that the choral singing is lucid, the words somewhat comprehensible. But in the more agitated portions the writing becomes so unvocal that the chorus loses its focus, the words are gone, only an aura of sound remains. The composer will have to accept the blame; the Chorus pro Musica was well trained and more than proved its ability when given the chance.

The question is not merely the final effect of a work as to its musical sound, but the quality of its inspiration.

As for the Sibelius Second, everyone knows how Dr. Koussevitzky can conduct Sibelius.

Tel. Critcher 5-0000

ATLANTIC HIGHLANDS
N.J.
JOURNAL
12/8/50

Atlantic Highlands Journal, FRI., DEC. 8, 1950

WORLD OF MUSIC:

WESTMINSTER CHOIR COLLEGE TO EXPAND

NEW YORK (AP)—The Westminister Choir College has embarked on a $12,000,000 expansion program, it has been announced by its president, Dr. John Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the 98-acre former Lambert estate in Princeton, N. J., into a campus containing a chapel seating 1,000, a large concert auditorium for 3,500, a smaller auditorium for 1,000 and an open-air amphitheater to seat 15,000. There also would be an education building, dormitories, dining halls, gymnasium, playing fields and parking space for automobiles.

The building program will enable the college to extend its music training facilities to about 500 undergraduate and 100 graduate students. Dr. Williamson and Arthur Judson, chairman of the building committee, said they hoped the college would becofe a unique music center where the public may gather to hear the greatest orchestras, choruses and world-famed artists. Judson is manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon as enough funds are made available, although it is not planned to solicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. and Mrs. Williamson to provide trained church musicians. While that still remains the college's primary goal, the new building program is expected to make the campus a public cultural center second to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented this season by the foundation.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

Symphony Plays Again

Monteux Introduces Copland Score

By Marjory M. Fisher

Last night's San Francisco Symphony concert, which will be repeated tomorrow night, brought the premiere of Aaron Copland's Symphony No. 3, and it was hailed with enthusiasm by the collegiate listeners. For a work of its kind to win such immediate success with an audience at first hearing is unusual, to say the least. It is not the type of music Friday afternoon audiences prefer—which probably is one reason Pierre Monteux programmed it only for evening presentation.

Commissioned by the Koussevitsky Foundation and first performed by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's baton in 1946, it won the New York Music Critics' Circle Award as the best American orchestral work produced in New York that season.

Prize Work

Last night's performance gave no cause to dispute that award—although tomorrow night's undoubtedly will do more to substantiate it. For while it was evident that the major portion of rehearsal time had been devoted to the Copland, it was also evident that it was not played with the same assurance and complete comprehension that marked the playing of the Sibelius "Finlandia" which followed it.

Played in commemoration of Sibelius' 85th birthday (today), the "Finlandia" came off in brilliant fashion—any roughness of tone being accepted politely as an expression of Nordic ruggedness.

Mozart

Certainly the concert ended better than it began. For the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony which opened the program had a perfunctory 'uninspired' heavy-handed performance which suggested a sight-reading session rather than a concert performance.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" came off better. There was much nice solo playing by first chair men and the whole was admirable—even if not an exciting substitute for the indisposed Zino Francescatti. (We've heard the Strauss score too often Francescatti, not often enough.)

, DECEMBER 7, 1950.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SIBELIUS WORKS

With Old Master, Koussevitzky, at Helm as Guest Leader, Orchestra Is at Its Best

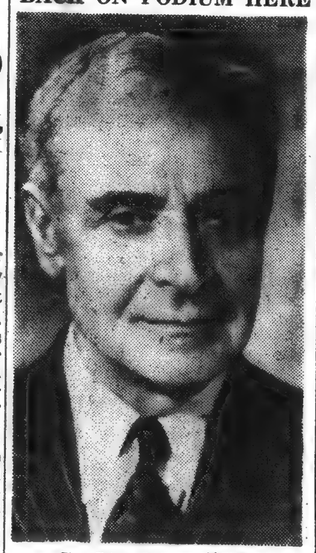
By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned as its guest leader last night in Carnegie Hall. It must be said that the result was something of a revelation. For there is no denying that when Koussevitzky, with his extraordinary faculty for orchestral discipline, tone and beauty of phrase, takes charge of this body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the king of them all. The luster and brilliancy of the sound, the precision of the ensemble had the effect of the wholly exceptional. And last night Dr. Koussevitzky appeared to be singularly in the vein as interpretator.

In honor of Sibelius' eighty-fifth birthday, which is tomorrow, there were two of his compositions on this program, as there will be another, the Second Symphony, on the Boston Symphony program of tomorrow afternoon. The concert last night opened with the charmingly imaginative music suggested by the episode of Wainomoinen's wooing of Pohjol's daughter from the Kalevala.

The simplicity of the folk-style in which the music is written, and on the other hand the various harmonic and orchestral subtleties of the middle part of the piece, which we may fairly take to depict the encounter of the sage on his sledge and the lady who sits weaving on the rainbow as the orchestra shimmers out in a hundred iridescences, are characteristics as yet unfamiliar to our audiences. The more is Dr. Koussevitzky to be thanked for making this legendary fantasy better known.

BACK ON PODIUM HERE



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

But the next work was the noble Fifth symphony, which long since has won its place in the repertory. The score, nevertheless—indeed, the more rather than the less—requires the most perceptive interpretation for its full value to reach the audience. Few symphonies that we know, if any, since those of Brahms and Beethoven, develop so naturally and with such life-force as the first movement of this work of Sibelius. It seems to be one breathing organism, one mysterious product of nature. There is the sense of the solitude made the more eloquent by natural sounds, or the stirrings of the forest.

Some call this symphony a happy and a pastoral creation. But it broods and self-communes, sometimes with tragical accent. The slow movement is a set of free variations upon a sing-song melody that the old nurse might have hummed to the child. There are certain strange modulations and half lights of instrumentation which throw into tender relief the simple old song. The end of the symphony is Homeric in its sweep and grandeur.

Dr. Koussevitzky reserved the power till it accumulated and grew, as it were, as if he himself could no longer control it. In previous pages he was so aware of the spaciousness and the grand simplicities of the work that he could afford to let the music speak for itself and to follow faithfully, which is the greatest necessity, precisely what Sibelius had indicated on the music page. In the simplicity, the profound understanding and sense of proportion lay the triumph of this performance.

No less remarkable was the effect, for a final climax of the concert, of the very familiar C minor symphony of Brahms. It is a conductor's war-horse, at the least. At the most it can be an achievement of epical greatness. We had never heard Koussevitzky give the score such grandeur and eloquence—a performance masterfully proportioned and coordinated, and of overwhelming impact.

This Clipping From RETAILING DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 8 - 1950

Magnavox Sponsors Airing of Rehearsal

FT. WAYNE, Ind., Dec. 7. — A series of hour-long radio programs broadcasting a portion of the Ft. Wayne Philharmonic Orchestra's final rehearsal before each of its subscription concerts is being sponsored by the Magnavox Co. here.

In the first program presented late in November, Igor Buketoff, Philharmonic conductor, was heard rehearsing the orchestra in the final movement of Beethoven's Fifth and in the first movement of the Rachmaninoff Second Piano Concerto with soloist Jacques Abram at the piano. Roger Hall, Philharmonic business manager, serves as narrator for the entirely unrehearsed, spontaneous rehearsals which are being aired over the CBS outlet, WANE.

Other guests who will be heard on future programs in the series include Samuel Sorin, pianist, Oscar Natzka, basso, and Yfrah Neaman, violinist.

The program idea was based on a similar successful series of programs which was originated two seasons ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Final arrangements for the series—especially designed to be of interest to music educators and music studens in this area—were made by Mr. Hall, Lynn Miller of radio station WANE, Mr. Buketoff and Lauren K. Hagaman, advertising manager for Magnavox.

This Clipping From
NORRISTOWN, PA.
TIMES HERALD
DEC 8- 1950

Saturday scheduling: NBC—9.30 A. M. Boston Symphony Rehearsal; 2.30 P. M. Roundtable on Children's Conference; 6.30 NBC Theater; 8.30 Man Called X; 10.30 Grand Ole Opry. . . CBS—11.30 A. M. Junior Miss; 2 P. M. Music With Girls; 4 Make Way for Youth; 7.30 Vaughn Monroe; 9 Gang Busters. . . ABC—9 A. M. No School Today; 12.30 P. M. American Farmer; 2 Metropolitan Opera "Tristan and Isolde;" 7.30 Buzz Adlam Playroom; 10 Saturday in Houston. . . MBS—12 Noon Man on Farm; 3 P. M. Dunn on Discs; 5 True or False; 7 Al Helfer on Sports; 9.30 Guy Lombardo.

[181]

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

Postlude

Honor Paid To Sibelius On Birthday

By Paul Hume

Today is the eighty-fifth birthday of Jan Sibelius.

Last night in Constitution Hall, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid handsome tribute to the greatness of the Finnish composer.

The tone poem, Pohjola's Daughter, and the fifth symphony occupied the first half of the concert, one of several programs Koussevitsky is leading in this, the fiftieth anniversary year of the orchestra he made great.

The title of Music Director Emeritus is now Koussevitsky's when he stands before the Boston Orchestra. If ever a man merited a distinguished title for his services Koussevitsky richly deserved his. For a quarter of a century he built one of the world's greatest symphonic aggregations.

During his years in Boston, no conductor in America was more persistent or effective in making known and appreciated the granite-like musc of Sibelius.

The two pieces of Sibelius played last night show his genius at its best. The fifth symphony is the most successful combination of the songful and with the unapproachable austerity that marks so much good Sibelius.

Pohjola's Daughter, with its exciting rhythmic buildup, is typical of those fine pieces inspired by the Finnish epic, Kalevala. Both are played with great intensity, even in the somewhat relaxed moments of the symphony's slow movement.

However, the Boston Symphony is no longer the orchestra Koussevitsky polished till it shone. Its climaxes found the full tone of the orchestra loud but not the perfectly balanced and unforced splendor it once was. The changes that have come to the orchestra in the past two years are less apparent when Koussevitsky conducts, but even he cannot restore what no longer exists.

Howard U. Concert

Paralleling the orchestra program in time though surpassing it for beautiful program planning, Mieczyslaw Horszowski played a truly great piano recital at Howard University.

He followed sonatas by Scarlatti with the Hammerklavier of Beethoven. We are told his performance of this titan among sonatas was tremendous.

His masculine combination of delicacy and strength assured the most satisfying kind of pianism imaginable.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
DEC 8 - 1950

AN EDUCATIONAL as well as entertaining item for the young folks is RCA Victor's new 10-inch Long Playing disk of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." This new version is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and narration is by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

THE FAMILIAR piece in which instruments play the parts of the characters in the story is as much dependent on a good job of narration as it is on a perfect execution of the score. Trust Koussevitzky and the Boston boys to take care of the score. The narration by Mrs. Roosevelt, we think, is perhaps preferable to the many recordings by professional actors now available on wax. Her story is told simply and directly, just as a mother might tell her youngsters while the music unfolds the action of the clever musical story.

The Sentinel, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1950

WORLD OF MUSIC:

WESTMINSTER CHOIR COLLEGE TO EXPAND

NEW YORK (AP)—The Westminister Choir College has embarked on a $12,000,000 expansion program, it has been announced by its president, Dr. John Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the 98-acre former Lambert estate in Princeton, N. J., into a campus containing a chapel seating 1,000, a large concert auditor um for 3,500, a smaller auditorium for 1,000 and an open-air amphitheater to seat 15,000. There also would be an education building, dormitories, dining halls, gymnasium, playing fields and parking space for automobiles.

The building program will enable the college to extend its music training facilities to about 500 undergraduate and 100 graduate students. Dr. Williamson and Arthur Judson, chairman of the building committee, said they hoped the college would becofe a unique music center where the public may gather to hear the greatest orchestras, choruses and world-famed artists. Judson is manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon as enough funds are made available, although it is not planned to solicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. and Mrs. Williamson to provide trained church musicians. While that still remains the college's primary goal, the new building program is expected to make the campus a public cultural center second to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented this season by the foundation.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

10 SEC. I TIMES-HERALD Washington, D. C. FRIDAY, DEC. 8, 1950

Symphony Under Koussevitzky Scores Triumph

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Constitution hall was filled last night with the sound of the Boston Symphony's great music-making.

It was the group's second visit for the present season and t was Koussevitzky's turn to conduct them. Charles Munch, the present permanent conductor, brought the Bostonians here for their first visit and will return with them early in the new year.

Returning Jan. 7

Koussevitzky comes again Jan. 7 to lead the concert of the Israeli Philharmonic which will launch its first American tour from the capital.

Last night's concert was a calmer, less excited and less exciting event than last month's program under the brilliant French artist. Which is not say that it was not as fine an example of symphonic art. The Boston Symphony is the first American orchestra, a flexible instrument able to serve the artistic purposes of any master.

The members still play as well for their former conductor as ever they did during his 25-year reign. The matchless string tone which he developed is still their prime prerogative, and the soloists in wind and brass choirs are equally competent and sensitive.

Today being the 85th birthday of Jean Sibelius, Finland's grand old man of music, Koussevitzky elected to devote the first half of last night's program to two of his works, the Fantasy, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the brief and no longer familiar Symphony, No. 5. They are characteristic expressions. Both develop fragmentary themes that later are gathered together into longer phrases.

Challenge to Genius

This technical treatment was Sibelius' important and original addition to the art of thematic development. In the works heard last night he surrounded these brief expressions with orchestral color of great beauty and complexity. For it is no mere matter of contrasted instrumentation but a complex texture of many melodic figures deriving in greater part from the basic material.

Such a texture in sound and movement is precisely the kind of expression to challenge Koussevitzky's genius. He is master of the problems in acoustic proportion posed by this music. He is master, also, of broad and thoughtful orchestral address that can make clear to the discerning ear the nobility of the Sibelius message.

Having dealt thus sympathetically and reverently with a great Finnish romanticist, the eminent Russian conductor turned to the last of the German romanticists to offer the Brahms First Symphony. This music he treated with far more classic restraint than do the Germans themselves.

[182]

BRIELLE, N.J
TIMES
12/8/50

The Brielle Times, FRI., DEC. 8, 1950

WORLD OF MUSIC:

WESTMINSTER CHOIR COLLEGE TO EXPAND

NEW YORK (AP)—The Westminister Choir College has embarked on a $12,000,000 expansion program, it has been announced by its president, Dr. John Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the 98-acre former Lambert estate in Princeton, N. J., into a campus containing a chapel seating 1,000, a large concert auditor um for 3,500, a smaller auditorium for 1,000 and an open-air amphitheater to seat 15,000. There also would be an education building, dormitories, dining halls, gymnasium, playing fields and parking space for automobiles.

The building program will enable the college to extend its music training facilities to about 500 undergraduate and 100 graduate students. Dr. Williamson and Arthur Judson, chairman of the building committee, said they hoped the college would becofe a unique music center where the public may gather to hear the greatest orchestras, choruses and world-famed artists. Judson is manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon as enough funds are made available, although it is not planned to solicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. and Mrs. Williamson to provide trained church musicians. While that still remains the college's primary goal, the new building program is expected to make the campus a public cultural center second to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented this season by the foundation.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
DEC 8 - 1950

ON RCA VICTOR'S 45s (Red Seal) you can get Haydn's Toy Symphony played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky and The Christmas Festival, arranged by Leroy Anderson and played by the Boston Pops.

✦ ✦ ✦

AND THERE ARE a number of pop singles to further the Yuletide spirit. On Victor 45s the personable Fran Allison sings The Christmas Tree Angel and Christmas in My Heart: Perry Como does a swell job on There is No Christmas Like a Home Christmas and The Christmas Symphony; Freddy Martin's orchestra plays Sleigh Ride and Christmas Time with vocals by Merv Griffin and the Martin Men; and Phil Regan injects a Hibernian touch by telling Christmas Story and crooning Leprechaun Lullaby.

The first release under RCA Victor label of the Hour of Charm Choir and Phil Spitalny's All-Girl orchestra features Gladys Gollahon's song of faith, Our Lady of Fatima, coupled with Schubert's Ave Marie, both beautifully done. Perry Como adds a sacred touch with Bless This House, and The Rosary, aided by choral background and Mitchell Ayres orchestra.

You may have Blue Christmas and White Christmas on one 45 rpm played by Hugo Winterhalter's orchestra and sung by him; chorus and another platter offers jingle bells and holiday effects as Ernie Benedict's orchestra plays The Little Toy Village and Merry Christmas Polka with both refrains by the Kendall Sisters.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
DEC 8 1950

Audience Rises in Tribute to Koussevitzky

The audience rose and applauded as Serge Koussevitzky walked on Constitution Hall stage last night to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a spontaneous tribute to a man who has made a great contribution to American musical life.

The orchestra played beautifully, of course, in a concert that consisted of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

There were two other works on the program—a symphonic fantasy and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. But Sibelius' music bores me so thoroly that I don't feel justified in commenting upon the Boston's performance of it.

The Brahms, tho, was magnificent in tone and conception. The Andante movement unfolded gracefully under Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic guidance, and the finale stirred the audience to cheers.

Mr. Koussevitzky will return on Jan. 7 to conduct the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra of which he says "The public will have great joy from the performance and from the attitude to art of the musicians themselves."

MILTON BERLINER.

News of Music

Rapport Difficult as Koussevitzky Again Conducts Boston Symphony

By Alice Eversman

The eve of the birthday anniversary of Finland's great composer, Jean Sibelius, was an appropriate occasion for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to devote the greater part of its program in Constitution Hall last night to his music. The presence of the Finnish Minister and Mme. Jutila added to the interest of the event, which saw also the return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to his old post as conductor of the orchestra. Now Music Director Emeritus, he shows the effects of the slight abatement of his many duties and directed with fire and energy.

It was a pleasant reunion for all concerned and the audience stood to welcome the distinguished conductor on his entrance. Since Dr. Koussevitzky's retirement, the orchestra has been under an entirely different type of leadership and was not immediately amenable to its former conductor's style. That style, as many performances have proven, is designed to extract with the greatest finesse and, at the same time, the greatest beauty and forcefulness, the content of the music To that end it required the complete co-operation between the musicians and conductor which has gained the Boston ensemble its fame.

It was not so easy to establish the old rapport last night. It was obvious in the effort to maintain the continuity in both Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter" and the "Symphony No. 5," although a direct, unbroken thread is not to be found in this composer's music. It is more the building of passage on passage until Sibelius' impersonal manner of depicting ideas reveals the immeasurable beauty contained in them. The orchestra played with its customary superb quality of tone and impeccable musicianship. It was slow, however, in getting into the special mood needed for a superlative Sibelius performance.

There was little of spontaneous excitement in "Pohjola's Daughter" to offset the quieter themes and to make the long plucked-string intervals, or the sameness of the string pattern in some places, most effective. The opening cello solo was excellently player by Samuel Mayes. If the "Symphony No. 5" in itself does not offer the substance some of the later ones do, it is a remarkable example of Sibelius' power to build long lines from a mass of detail and to employ his fine sense of tone color. The reading took cognizance of all that and it was highlighted by a wealth of nuance. It fell just short, nevertheless, of the creative duty left to the orchestra in the matter of atmosphere and a projection of that strange quality of Sibelius' music that is like no other. Dr. Koussevitzky's intentions were evident and while the musicians responded well for the most part, the smooth, unified and inspired development did not come forth as it has in the past.

The performance of Brahms' "Symphony No. 1," on the other hand, was magnificent. Rarely has so fine a delineation of it been given or one so sharply defined. Most of all, it had a velvety contour in spite of its intensity and grandeur. There was exaltation in the interpretation, and even in the sound of the instruments, and with little effort, Dr. Koussevitzky led his musicians in a presentation that will be memorable. Each number on the program was the occasion for an ovation to the conductor, who has never been in better form.

Howard School Presents Horszowski in Recital

By Elena de Sayn

The Howard University School of Music presented Mieczyslaw Horszowski in a piano recital in the Andrew Rankin Memorial Chapel last night.

It was not very long ago that the artist's ensemble playing created quite a furor in the Library of Congress, where he appeared with the New York Quartet. To hear Mr. Horszowski alone was to magnify the first impression tenfold. His accomplishment cannot be measured by ordinary standards, or a common yardstick. He stands alone as a personality and a man of intelligence and emotional power. The pianist can compel an audience to listen, awed and breathless, for an hour to what he has to say, because it is so absorbingly interesting.

Mr. Horszowski found a great deal in Beethoven's "Hammerclavier" sonata, especially in the "Adagio Sostenuto." The immense scope of the work has a symphonic expanse and grandeur. It is considered one of the composer's most difficult, technically and interpretatively. The "Adagio," as played by Mr. Horszowski, was a recital of human experiences put into the language of music. There were measures which resembled dialogues, with voices falling and rising under the stress of emotion. The colossal fugue in the finale, its intricate polyphony and architecture brought to the fore the artist's firm grasp and the expertise of a master. He received a tremendous ovation.

Following the Beethoven, four Scarlatti sonatas in contrasting style—G Minor, B Flat Major, A Minor, G Major—reflected the composer's lyrism and vitality as presented. Debussy's "Reflects dans l'eau," "Hommage a Rameau," and "Movement" were less convincingly set forth in spite of technical perfection.

Only a Pole can feel Chopin's music as Mr. Horszowski demonstrated it last night. If Vladimir de Pachman was considered its great exponent in the past, the palm can now be handed to Mr. Horszowski. It is enough to hear him play a mazurka to sense his nationality. In addition to "Mazurkas op. 59, No. 1 and op. 56 No. 2," the artist played "Etudes op. 25, No. 6, and 2; and op. 10 No. 7" and ended the recital with the "Bolero op. 19." The familiar passages and cross rhythms of the studies seemed new and fascinating. He was encored vigorously.

HERALD-TRIBUNE

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1950

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

Koussevitzky Returns

Serge Koussevitzky, now the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director Emeritus, conducted the third concert of this notable organization's Carnegie Hall evening series yesterday, and began our local observance of Jean Sibelius's eighty-fifth birthday (tomorrow) by devoting the first half of his program to the eminent Finnish composer's "Pohjola's Daughter" and fifth symphony. Brahms's first symphony completed the list.

Seventeen months have elapsed since Dr. Koussevitzky made his last New York appearance as the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, completing twenty-five seasons in this position. In the mean time, he has been active in conducting orchestras on this and three other continents. The orchestra and the audience rose when he first appeared upon the stage to begin a performance which was marked by the interpretative powers which he has exhibited here on many previous occasions.

Both the Bostonians and our Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra are joining in the observance here of the Sibelius anniversary; a Sibelius symphony will be played in Carnegie Hall today, and each of the next three days. The occasion calls, indeed, for some extra-curricular observances on the position and significance of his music, but this must await some occasion with less temporal limitation. The tone poem, "Pohjola's Daughter" has not been played here for ten years; its current neglect is undeserved. With ingenuity of form and cogency of musical ideas, it gave an impression of freshness and the combination of individual personality and national flavor which marks Sibelius's music. The same can be said about the fifth symphony, first played here twenty-eight years ago. Time has passed since Sibelius's orchestral works were characterized as austere; this work is essentially romantic.

Admirable playing marked the performances of all three works in the program. Dr. Koussevitzky has long been noted as a champion of Sibelius' works, and his interpretation realized the essential savor both of the symphonic poem and the symphony, with pervasive lucidity and eloquence, just proportions of orchestral sonority. Both readings gave a sense of spaciousness. The interpretation of the Brahms symphony also found the conductor in his best form, broad, expressive and sonorous, stylistically persuasive. Apart from an unusual ritardando in a section of the finale, the tempi were straightforward and well conceived; the chorale near the close had one of the most imposing proclamations which it has received in Carnegie Hall's long history.

American Bach

14 Sec. III TIMES-HERALD Washington, D.C. FRIDAY, Dec. 8, 1950

Symphony Under Koussevitzky Scores Triumph

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Constitution hall was filled last night with the sound of the Boston Symphony's great music-making.

It was the group's second visit for the present season and it was Koussevitzky's turn to conduct them. Charles Munch, the present permanent conductor, brought the Bostonians here for their first visit and will return with them early in the new year.

Returning Jan. 7

Koussevitzky comes again Jan. 7 to lead the concert of the Israeli Philharmonic which will launch its first American tour from the capital.

Last night's concert was a calmer, less excited and less exciting event than last month's program under the brilliant French artist. Which is not say that it was not as fine an example of symphonic art. The Boston Symphony is the first American orchestra, a flexible instrument able to serve the artistic purposes of any master.

The members still play as well for their former conductor as ever they did during his 25-year reign. The matchless string tone which he developed is still their prime prerogative, and the soloists in wind and brass choirs are equally competent and sensitive.

Tribute to Sibelius

Today being the 85th birthday of Jean Sibelius, Finland's grand old man of music, Koussevitzky elected to devote the first half of last night's program to two of his works, the Fantasy, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the brief and no longer familiar Symphony, No. 5. They are characteristic expressions. Both develop fragmentary themes that later are gathered together into longer phrases.

This technical treatment was Sibelius' important and original addition to the art of thematic development. In the works heard last night he surrounded these brief expressions with orchestral color of great beauty and complexity. For it is no mere matter of contrasted instrumentation but a complex texture of many melodic figures deriving in greater part from the basic material.

Challenge to Genius

Such a texture in sound and movement is precisely the kind of expression to challenge Koussevitzky's genius. He is master of the problems in acoustic proportion posed by this music. He is master, also, of broad and thoughtful orchestral address that can make clear to the discerning ear the nobility of the Sibelius message.

Having dealt thus sympathetically and reverently with a great Finnish romanticist, the eminent Russian conductor turned to the last of the German romanticists to offer the Brahms First Symphony. This music he treated with far more classic restraint than do the Germans themselves.

[187]

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HERALD,

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von FRED LOW

12.8.1950

Siepi hervorragend im "Barbier von Sevilla"

In der Vorstellung am Mittwoch von Rossinis "Barbier von Sevilla" an der Metropolitan Oper gab Cesare Siepi nach seiner ersten Szene im 1. Akt mit stürmischer bezeisterte Ovationen, der verdiente Lohn für die überragende Leistung, die gesanglich und darstellerisch meisterhaft war. Der junge italienische Bassist kommt als Musikmeister Basilio in einer schwarzen zu kurz geschnittenen Toga, aus der die beweglichen Hände und die unbeholfen schreitenden Füße herausragen, doch der überwältigend komische Eindruck wird nicht nur durch das Kostüm, sondern vor allem durch das wunderbare Spiel hervorgerufen, das sich in vielen Einzelheiten zu einer prächtigen Gesamtheit abrundet. Wenn Cesare Siepi aber singt, dann vergißt man selbst an seine Darstellung, um nur keinen Ton dieser einzigartigen Stimme zu verlieren. Mittellage hohes Register, Tiefe — der Wohlklang, das satte volle Timbre sind in allen Lagen ausgezeichnet und die deutliche Aussprache, das mustergültige parlando zeigen die vollendete Technik des Künstlers. Cesare Siepi hat mit seinem König Philipp (Don Carlos) großen Erfolg erzielt, mit dem Don Basilio hat er das Publikum der Metropolitan im Sturm erobert. — Lily Pons war zum erstenmal in dieser Saison auf der Bühne der Oper, sie stellte ihr großes technisches Können und ihre Erfahrung in der Rolle der Rosina neuerlich unter Beweis; ihre Kunst wußte die Schwierigkeiten der Koloratur in der hohen Lage intelligent zu überwinden. Giuseppe Valdengo war der gutgelaunte, spielfreudige Figaro, gesanglich ausgezeichnet disponiert, Salvatore Baccaloni der lustige Bartolo, der zu seinen besten Rollen zählt und Giuseppe DiStefano sang trotz einer Erkältung mit schöner Stimme. — Herta Glaz als Haushälterin, George Cehanovsky (Fiorella), Paul Franke (Sergeant) und Ludwig Burgstaller (Ambrogio) ergänzten das heitere Ensemble, das sich und dem Publikum zur Freude sang und spielte. — Alberto Erede dirigierte im richtigen Lustspieltempo und unterstützte musikalisch sicher die Solisten auf der Bühne durch diskretes Halten des Orchesters.

Amerikanische Bach-Gesellschaft

Die Amerikanische Bach-Gesellschaft veranstaltete ihr erstes Konzert am Mittwoch abend in der Times Hall mit Aufführungen von Kantaten und dem vierten Brandenburg-Konzert. Mitwirkend waren 22 Sänger und ein Orchester, bestehend aus 17 Musikern. Jeder Versuch, die Musik des deutschen Meisters immer mehr den großen Massen des Publikums zugänglich zu machen, verdient Förderung; das neue Bach-Ensemble ist aber noch nicht so weit, um die Wiedergabe erfolgreich zu gestalten. Mit wenigen Ausnahmen war der Vortrag monoton und wenig ausdrucksvoll, der Stil nicht klar genug, um das Werk zur Wirkung zu bringen. Martin Bernstein dirigierte Orchester und Chor; von den Sängerinnen war Jean Handzlik (Alt) die Beste, und der helle Ton der Soloflöte (Emmanuel Mesthene) kam zu guter Geltung. Die Bach-Gesellschaft kündigt für den 13. März ihr nächstes Konzert an, im Programm sind drei Kantaten und das Doppelkonzert für zwei Geigen. — Die ausgezeichnete Ausführung des Programmheftes mit Erläuterungen und Übersetzung der Texte von Sydney Beck (Music Division, New York Public Library) ist bemerkenswert.

Koussevitzky dirigiert Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, der frühere langjährige ständige Dirigent des Boston Symphonie Orchesters kehrte Mittwoch abend als Gast an die Spitze des Ensembles zurück, um die New Yorker Konzertserie dieser Woche zu leiten. Im Programm waren zu Ehren des 85. Geburtstages des finnischen Komponisten Jean Sibelius zwei seiner Werke, die symphonische Dichtung "Fohjolas Tochter" und die fünfte Symphonie, ferner gelange die erste Symphonie von Brahms zur Wiedergabe. Die 5. Symphonie von Sibelius ist eine der bedeutendsten Schaffungen des nordischen Komponisten, sie wurde in den ersten Wochen des Weltkriegs 1914 geschrieben. Der erste Satz atmet träumerisch im Bild der finnischen Landschaft, er schließt dramatisch leidenschaftlich; das Allegro moderato ist rhythmisch in seinen Tanzfiguren und wird gefolgt von einem gesangsvollen Andante — leidenschaftliche Themen dominieren im Finale, das mit einer gewaltigen Steigerung schließt. Die symphonische Dichtung "Fohjolas Tochter" ist nur sehr selten in Konzertaufführungen zu hören. Volksweisen sind die Basis der Komposition, deren Dichtung der finnischen Legende entstammt. Serge Koussevitzky brachte beide Werke zu großartiger Geltung, er läßt der Musik freie Bahn, ohne sie durch Überbetonen oder eigenwillige rhythmische Freiheiten zu verändern. — Die hervorragende Wiedergabe der ersten Symphonie von Brahms beschloß den Abend der Bostoner Symphonie. Serge Koussevitzky hat in das Programm seiner beiden restlichen Konzerte die zweite Symphonie von Sibelius gestellt, New Yorker Philharmoniker und Philadelphia Orchester werden ebenfalls Aufführungen von Werken des finnischen Komponisten bringen.

Clifford Herzer

Der Pianist Clifford Herzer gab sein Konzert am Mittwoch abend in der Town Hall; im Programm waren Werke von Beethoven, Schubert, Prokofieff, Kabalevsky und Chopin. In der Wiedergabe der Beethoven-Sonate As-Dur op. 110 zeigten sich Musikverständnis und gute Technik; der Pianist bevorzugt starke Akzente, die dem Vortrag der Chopin-Stücke und "Visions Fugitives" von Prokofieff nicht immer zum Vorteil geraten.

Israel Orchestra To Play Here Jan. 7

Postlude

Honor Paid To Sibelius On Birthday

By Paul Hume

Today is the eighty-fifth birthday of Jan Sibelius.

Last night in Constitution Hall, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid handsome tribute to the greatness of the Finnish composer.

The tone poem, Pohjola's Daughter, and the fifth symphony occupied the first half of the concert, one of several programs Koussevitsky is leading in this, the fiftieth anniversary year of the orchestra he made great.

The title of Music Director Emeritus is now Koussevitsky's when he stands before the Boston Orchestra. If ever a man merited a distinguished title for his services Koussevitsky richly deserved his. For a quarter of a century he built one of the world's greatest symphonic aggregations.

During his years in Boston, no conductor in America was more persistent or effective in making known and appreciated the granite-like musc of Sibelius.

The two pieces of Sibelius played last night show his genius at its best. The fifth symphony is the most successful combination of the songful and with the unapproachable austerity that marks so much good Sibelius.

Pohjola's Daughter, with its exciting rhythmic buildup, is typical of those fine pieces inspired by the Finnish epic, Kalevala. Both are played with great intensity, even in the somewhat relaxed moments of the symphony's slow movement.

However, the Boston Symphony is no longer the orchestra Koussevitsky polished till it shone. Its climaxes found the full tone of the orchestra loud but not the perfectly balanced and unforced splendor it once was. The changes that have come to the orchestra in the past two years are less apparent when Koussevitsky conducts, but even he cannot restore what no longer exists.

Howard U. Concert

Paralleling the orchestra program in time though surpassing it for beautiful program planning, Mieczyslaw Horszowski played a truly great piano recital at Howard University.

He followed sonatas by Scarlatti with the Hammerklavier of Beethoven. We are told his performance of this titan among sonatas was tremendous.

His masculine combination of delicacy and strength assured the most satisfying kind of pianism imaginable.

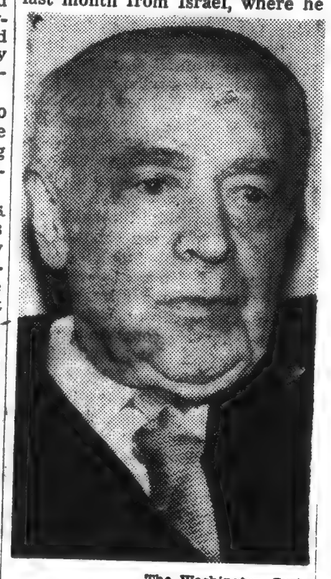
Plans for a tour of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, with the opening concert to be held in Washington January 7, were announced yesterday by Serge Koussevitsky.

Dr. Koussevitsky, director emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led in a program at Constitution Hall last night, told a press conference yesterday that Israel was a nation of music lovers, and its orchestra would surprise the American public.

The national tour will include about 55 to 60 concerts over a 10-week period, Dr. Koussevitsky said. He will lead about 18 of the concerts, Leonard Bernstein about 25, and Eleazer de Carvalho the remainder, he added.

The opening concert, at Constitution Hall, is sponsored by the Louis D. Brandeis Zionist District, of which A. S. Kay is president. The tour is under the patronage of the American Fund for Israel Institutions.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who returned last month from Israel, where he worked with the 14-year-old orchestra for six weeks, said "it is an orchestra that can play in any city in the country. I am sure the public who come to listen will have a great joy."



The Washington Post

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . Meets the Press

The orchestra is "very popular in Israel."

In Tel Aviv, with 300,000 inhabitants, the hall in which he led the orchestra had a seating capacity of about 1100, he said. But so great was the interest in music, "I had to repeat the same performance 10 times. There is no other place where you would have to do that," he said.

Dr. Koussevitsky said composition of the program to be given here had not been decided upon, but "will be a sort of classical progra mwith no modern music."

"To play modern music means to make propaganda for the composer. The orchestra is coming to make propaganda for itself. I don't think the public can judge an orchestra when it is not familiar with the music."

The program will probably include a Beethoven, Brahms or Tschaikovsky symphony, he said, and every program will include a work by an Israeli composer. Ben-Haim will be the composer featured in the Washington concert.

"Certainly, they do not have a Beethoven, but where is there a Beethoven today?" he said. "It is a tremendous thing that such a little country can have such a fine orchestra."

[184]

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HERALD,

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von FRED LOW

Dec. 8, 1950

Siepi hervorragend im "Barbier von Sevilla"

In der Vorstellung am Mittwoch von Rossinis "Barbier von Sevilla" in der Metropolitan Oper erhielt Cesare Siepi nach seiner großen Szene im 1. Akt minutenlange begeisterte Ovationen, der verdiente Lohn für die überragende Leistung, die gesanglich und darstellerisch meisterhaft war. Der junge italienische Bassist kommt als Musikmeister Basilio in einer schwarzen zu kurz geschnittenen Toga, aus der die beweglichen Hände und die unbeholfen schreitenden Füße herausragen, doch der überwältigend komische Eindruck wird nicht nur durch das Kostüm, sondern vor allem durch das wunderbare Spiel hervorgerufen, das sich in vielen Einzelheiten zu einer prächtigen Gesamtheit abrundet. Wenn Cesare Siepi aber singt, dann vergißt man selbst an seine Darstellung, um nur keinen Ton dieser einzigartigen Stimme zu verlieren. Mittellage, hohes Register, Tiefe — der Wohlklang, das satte volle Timbre sind in allen Lagen ausgezeichnet und die deutliche Aussprache, das mustergültige parlando zeigen die vollendete Technik des Künstlers. Cesare Siepi hat mit seinem König Philipp (Don Carlos) großen Erfolg erzielt, mit dem Don Basilio hat er das Publikum der Metropolitan im Sturm erobert. — Lily Pons war zum erstenmal in dieser Saison auf der Bühne der Oper, sie stellte ihr großes technisches Können und ihre Erfahrung in der Rolle der Rosina neuerlich unter Beweis; ihre Kunst wußte die Schwierigkeiten der Koloratur in der hohen Lage intelligent zu überwinden. Giuseppe Valdengo war der gutgelaunte, spielfreudige Figaro, gesanglich ausgezeichnet disponiert, Salvatore Baccaloni der lustige Bartolo, der zu seinen besten Rollen zählt und Giuseppe DiStefano sang trotz einer Erkältung mit schöner Stimme. — Herta Glaz als Haushälterin, George Cehanovsky (Fiorella), Paul Franke (Sergeant) und Ludwig Burgstaller (Ambrogio) ergänzten das heitere Ensemble, das sich und dem Publikum zur Freude sang und spielte. — Alberto Erede dirigierte im richtigen Lustspieltempo und unterstützte musikalisch sicher die Solisten auf der Bühne durch diskretes Halten des Orchesters.

Amerikanische Bach-Gesellschaft

Die Amerikanische Bach-Gesellschaft veranstaltete ihr erstes Konzert am Mittwoch abend in der Times Hall mit Aufführungen von Kantaten und dem vierten Brandenburg-Konzert. Mitwirkend waren 22 Sänger und ein Orchester, bestehend aus 17 Musikern. Jeder Versuch, die Musik des deutschen Meisters immer mehr den großen Massen des Publikums zugänglich zu machen, verdient Förderung; das neue Bach-Ensemble ist aber noch nicht so weit, um die Wiedergabe erfolgreich zu gestalten. Mit wenigen Ausnahmen war der Vortrag monoton und wenig ausdrucksvoll, der Stil nicht klar genug, um das Werk zur Wirkung zu bringen. Martin Bernstein dirigierte Orchester und Chor; von den Sängerinnen war Jean Handzlik (Alt) die Beste, und der helle Ton der Soloflöte (Emmanuel Mesthene) kam zu guter Geltung. Die Bach-Gesellschaft kündigt für den 13. März ihr nächstes Konzert an, im Programm sind drei Kantaten und das Doppelkonzert für zwei Geigen. — Die ausgezeichnete Ausführung des Programmheftes mit Erläuterungen und Übersetzung der Texte von Sydney Beck (Music Division, New York Public Library) ist bemerkenswert.

Koussevitzky dirigiert Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, der frühere langjährige ständige Dirigent des Boston Symphonie Orchesters kehrte Mittwoch abend als Gast an die Spitze des Ensembles zurück, um die New Yorker Konzertserie dieser Woche zu leiten. Im Programm waren zu Ehren des 85. Geburtstages des finnischen Komponisten Jean Sibelius zwei seiner Werke, die symphonische Dichtung "Fohjolas Tochter" und die fünfte Symphonie, ferner gelange die erste Symphonie von Brahms zur Wiedergabe. Die 5. Symphonie von Sibelius ist eine der bedeutendsten Schaffungen des nordischen Komponisten, sie wurde in den ersten Wochen des Weltkriegs 1914 geschrieben. Der erste Satz atmet träumerisch im Bild der finnischen Landschaft, er schließt dramatisch leidenschaftlich; das Allegro moderato ist rhythmisch in seinen Tanzfiguren und wird gefolgt von einem gesangsvollen Andante — leidenschaftliche Themen dominieren im Finale, das mit einer gewaltigen Steigerung schließt. Die symphonische Dichtung "Fohjolas Tochter" ist nur sehr selten in Konzertaufführungen zu hören, Volksweisen sind die Basis der Komposition, deren Dichtung der finnischen Legende entstammt. Serge Koussevitzky brachte beide Werke zu großartiger Geltung, er läßt der Musik freie Bahn, ohne sie durch Überbetonen oder eigenwillige rhythmische Freiheiten zu verändern. — Die hervorragende Wiedergabe der ersten Symphonie von Brahms beschloß den Abend der Bostoner Symphonie. Serge Koussevitzky hat in das Programm seiner beiden restlichen Konzerte die zweite Symphonie von Sibelius gestellt, New Yorker Philharmoniker und Philadelphia Orchester werden ebenfalls Aufführungen von Werken des finnischen Komponisten bringen.

Clifford Herzer

Der Pianist Clifford Herzer gab sein Konzert am Mittwoch abend in der Town Hall; im Programm waren Werke von Beethoven, Schubert, Prokofieff, Kabalevsky und Chopin. In der Wiedergabe der Beethoven-Sonate As-Dur op. 110 zeigten sich Musikverständnis und gute Technik; der Pianist bevorzugt starke Akzente, die dem Vortrag der Chopin-Stücke und "Visions Fugitives" von Prokofieff nicht immer zum Vorteil geraten.

Israel Orchestra To Play Here Jan. 7

Plans for a tour of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, with the opening concert to be held in Washington January 7, were announced yesterday by Serge Koussevitsky.

Dr. Koussevitsky, director emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led in a program at Constitution Hall last night, told a press conference yesterday that Israel was a nation of music lovers, and its orchestra would surprise the American public.

The national tour will include about 55 to 60 concerts over a 10-week period, Dr. Koussevitsky said. He will lead about 18 of the concerts, Leonard Bernstein about 25, and Eleazer de Carvalho the remainder, he added.

The opening concert, at Constitution Hall, is sponsored by the Louis D. Brandeis Zionist District, of which A. S. Kay is president. The tour is under the patronage of the American Fund for Israel Institutions.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who returned last month from Israel, where he worked with the 14-year-old orchestra for six weeks, said "it is an orchestra that can play in any city in the country. I am sure the public who come to listen will have a great joy."

The orchestra is "very popular in Israel."

In Tel Aviv, with 300,000 inhabitants, the hall in which he led the orchestra had a seating capacity of about 1100, he said. But so great was the interest in music, "I had to repeat the same performance 10 times. There is no other place where you would have to do that," he said.

Dr. Koussevitsky said composition of the program to be given here had not been decided upon, but "will be a sort of classical progra mwith no modern music."

"To play modern music means to make propaganda for the composer. The orchestra is coming to make propaganda for itself. I don't think the public can judge an orchestra when it is not familiar with the music."

The program will probably include a Beethoven, Brahms or Tschaikovsky symphony, he said, and every program will include a work by an Israeli composer. Ben-Haim will be the composer featured in the Washington concert.

"Certainly, they do not have a Beethoven, but where is there a Beethoven today?" he said. "It is a tremendous thing that such a little country can have such a fine orchestra."

Postlude

Honor Paid To Sibelius On Birthday

By Paul Hume

Today is the eighty-fifth birthday of Jan Sibelius.

Last night in Constitution Hall, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid handsome tribute to the greatness of the Finnish composer.

The tone poem, Pohjola's Daughter, and the fifth symphony occupied the first half of the concert, one of several programs Koussevitsky is leading in this, the fiftieth anniversary year of the orchestra he made great.

The title of Music Director Emeritus is now Koussevitsky's when he stands before the Boston Orchestra. If ever a man merited a distinguished title for his services Koussevitsky richly deserved his. For a quarter of a century he built one of the world's greatest symphonic aggregations.

During his years in Boston, no conductor in America was more persistent or effective in making known and appreciated the granite-like muse of Sibelius.

The two pieces of Sibelius played last night show his genius at its best. The fifth symphony is the most successful combination of the songful and with the unapproachable austerity that marks so much good Sibelius.

Pohjola's Daughter, with its exciting rhythmic buildup, is typical of those fine pieces inspired by the Finnish epic, Kalevala. Both are played with great intensity, even in the somewhat relaxed moments of the symphony's slow movement.

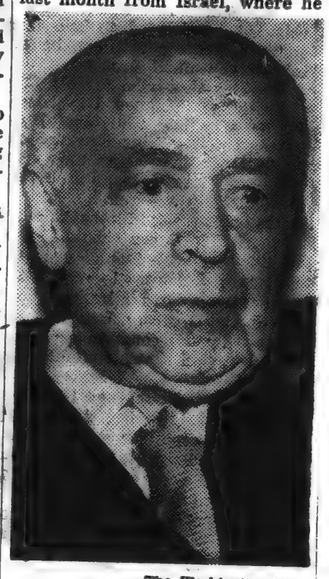
However, the Boston Symphony is no longer the orchestra Koussevitsky polished till it shone. Its climaxes found the full tone of the orchestra loud but not the perfectly balanced and unforced splendor it once was. The changes that have come to the orchestra in the past two years are less apparent when Koussevitsky conducts, but even he cannot restore what no longer exists.

Howard U. Concert

Paralleling the orchestra program in time though surpassing it for beautiful program planning, Mieczyslaw Horszowski played a truly great piano recital at Howard University.

He followed sonatas by Scarlatti with the Hammerklavier of Beethoven. We are told his performance of this titan among sonatas was tremendous.

His masculine combination of delicacy and strength assured the most satisfying kind of pianism imaginable.



The Washington Post

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . Meets the Press

[184]

This Clipping From
OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN
DEC 9 - 1950

Music And Drama

Community Chest Appeal For Arts Enterprises?

By Irving Kolodin

NEW YORK — An idea which has been gathering subsurface momentum in various parts of the country broke water almost simultaneously recently in Hartford and New York. Concerned with the increasing cost of producing music and the threat to the continued existence of both local and national institutions, the Hartford idea of a "Music Council" to bring all of its local activities under a single fund-gathering agency was echoed by Virgil Thomson in the New York Herald Tribune a day later, with the proposal that the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Metropolitan Opera put their administrative problems in the care of the Port of New York Authority, which, he said, "seems to have a real knack for public service."

Both trends of thought are related to the procedure followed in such a place as Louisville, Kentucky, where an Arts Fund, raised by an annual campaign, is divided among various cultural enterprises in proportion to need, public service, etc. Even further they resemble the means by which such English enterprises as Covent Garden, the Sadler's Wells Ballet, and various orchestras (not including the Royal Philharmonic, which is privately supported) are assisted by the Arts Council in Great Britain. The difference is that the American plans provide for fund-raising efforts directed at the public, with all interested parties making their appeals simultaneously. Thus what we have is another version of the Community Chest program or the United Jewish Appeal, which have established beyond question that more money can be raised in one big drive than in a scattering of small ones.

The urgent need for a fresh approach to the whole problem of maintaining the symphony orchestras and the one permanent opera of this country on something like a going basis is underscored by the precarious condition in which most of those ventures now find themselves. Even the Boston Symphony, with its supposedly rock-ribbed financial structure created under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky, is rapidly exhausting capital funds; the Philadelphia Orchestra would be in straits without municipal participation, and others from coast to coast have to steer a narrow course to elude financial shoals.

er's Choral Fantasia. During this same period there will be numerous other musical events in the great new Royal Festival Hall, including a recital by Yehudi Menuhin and his sister Hephzibah and orchestral programs directed by Sir Adrian Boult and Sir Malcolm Sargent.

* * *

The first full-length Gilbert and Sullivan operetta came to television last week by way of CBS, with the presentation of Trial by Jury with Patricia Morison as the featured "broken-hearted bride." "Full-length" is somewhat of an exaggeration here, for the work in toto is hardly more than half an hour in length, and it was further pared to permit commercials. A rather brutal intrusion was the one made halfway through, when the progress of the play was left suspended while an announcer extoled the merits of a motor car.

Since television is a medium in which the unexpected reigns supreme, it was hardly surprising that this Trial by Jury solved most visual problems competently while by-passing the aural ones.

* * *

The 85th birthday of Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer, on December 8, recalled to mind a remark of Sir Thomas Beecham a year or so ago. Mention was made of the campaign to send Sibelius a birthday gift of his favorite cigars, one box for each year of his life. Eyes twinkling, Beecham remarked: "Odd people, you Americans. You don't play Sibelius music as much as you used to, and so he doesn't receive royalties. Instead you send him cigars."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 9 - 1950

'One-Package' Music Financing May Solve Riddle of Support

By IRVING KOLODIN

AN IDEA which has been gathering subsurface momentum in various parts of the country broke water almost simultaneously recently in Hartford and New York.

Concerned with the increasing cost of producing music and the threat to the continued existence of both local and national institutions, the Hartford idea of a "Music Council" to bring all of its local activities under a single fund - gathering agency was echoed by Virgil Thomson in the New York Herald Tribune a day later, with the proposal that the Philharmonic - Symphony and the Metropolitan Opera put their administrative problems in the care of the Port of New York Authority, which, he said, "seems to have a real knack for public service."

* * *

BOTH TRENDS of thought are related to the procedure followed in such a place as Louisville, Ky., where an Arts Fund, raised by an annual campaign, is divided among various cultural enterprises in proportion to need, public service, etc. Even further they resemble the means by which such English enterprises as Covent Garden, the Sadler's Wells Ballet, and various orchestras (not including the Royal Philharmonic, which is privately supported) are assisted by the Arts Council in Great Britain.

The difference is that the American plans provide for fund-raising efforts directed at the public, with all interested parties making their appeals simultaneously. Thus what we have is another version of the Community Chest program or the United Jewish Appeal, which have established beyond question that more money can be raised in one big drive than in a scattering of small ones.

* * *

THE URGENT need for a fresh approach to the whole problem of maintaining the symphony orchestras and the one permanent opera of this country on something like a going basis is underscored by the precarious condition in which most of those ventures now find themselves. Even the Boston Symphony, with its supposedly [illegible] financial structure created under the guidance of Serge Koussevitsky, is rapidly exhausting capital funds; the Philadelphia Orchestra would be in straits without municipal participation, and others from coast to coast have to steer a narrow course to elude financial shoals.

Hope of the tax relief which would give a whiff of oxygen to the moribund prospects of the organizations seems dimmer now than previously, unless there is a revision of attitude in Washington on a subject far from most legislative minds.

* * *

WHAT SEEMS to be required is an interior Marshall Plan to preserve for our own citizens what we are so concerned about overseas. In a way we are robbing our own Pauls to benefit the Pierres of France, which is well enough while we can afford it.

The irony would be for tax monies which could be well used by an American orchestra or the Metropolitan to find their way, directly or indirectly, to the support of Covent Garden or the Vienna Opera. Such an allusion was made, half humorously a year ago by Edward Johnson at a ceremonial lunch for Sadler's Wells Ballet people; but it becomes less and less humorous as time passes and the conditions at home harden.

* * *

A BASIC FACTOR in the replacement of Fritz Reiner by Eugene Ormandy as conductor of the Metropolitan's "Fledermaus" production (scheduled for Dec. 20) was the situation vis-a-vis the recording companies.

With a Reiner version already in being for RCA Victor, and awaiting release, he obviously could not do one for Columbia. On the other hand, for him to rehearse the production for the Met and another conductor then to rerehearse it for a Columbia recording would be both expensive and impractical.

It will mark Ormandy's debut as a conductor for the stage in this country—unless you consider as preparation for the Met the apprenticeship he served with the Capitol Theater on Broadway in the late '20s.

* * *

ASSUMING that Arturo Toscanini's health is sufficiently improved, he is scheduled to open the new London concert hall next May as initial event of the Festival of Britain.

On May 3 there will be a ceremony in the presence of the King and Queen, for which admittance will be by invitation only. On the next day the first of the public concerts will be given, with Toscanini conducting one of his favorite programs: The First and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven.

During this same period there will be numerous other musical events in the great new Royal Festival Hall, including a recital by Yehudi Menuhin and his sister Hephzibah.

(Copyright, S. R. L.)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
DEC 9 1950

Symphony Under Koussevitzky Scores Triumph

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

(Reprinted from yesterday's Late Editions.)

Constitution hall was filled last night with the sound of the Boston Symphony's great music-making.

It was the group's second visit for the present season and it was Koussevitzky's turn to conduct them. Charles Munch, the present permanent conductor, brought the Bostonians here for their first visit and will return with them early in the new year.

Koussevitzky comes again Jan. 7 to lead the concert of the Israeli Philharmonic which will launch its first American tour from the capital.

Example of Symphonic Art

Last night's concert was a calmer, less excited and less exciting event than last month's program under the brilliant French artist. Which is not say that it was not as fine an example of symphonic art. The Boston Symphony is the first American orchestra, a flexible instrument able to serve the artistic purposes of any master.

The members still play as well for their former conductor as ever they did during his 25-year reign. The matchless string tone which he developed is still their prime prerogative, and the soloists in wind and brass choirs are equally competent and sensitive.

Today being the 85th birthday of Jean Sibelius, Finland's grand old man of music, Koussevitzky elected to devote the first half of last night's program to two of his works, the Fantasy, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the brief and no longer familiar Symphony, No. 5. They are characteristic expressions. Both develop fragmentary themes that later are gathered together into longer phrases, a complex texture of many melodic figures deriving in greater part from the basic material.

Such a texture in sound and movement is precisely the kind of expression to challenge Koussevitsky's genius. He is master of the problems in acoustic proportion posed by this music. He is master, also, of broad and thoughtful orchestral address that can make clear to the discerning ear the nobility of the Sibelius message.

Having dealt thus sympathetically and reverently with a great Finnish romanticist, the eminent Russian conductor turned to the last of the German romanticists to offer the Brahms First Symphony. This music he treated with far more classic restraint than do the Germans themselves.

Challenge to Maestro

This technical treatment was Sibelius' important and original addition to the art of thematic development. In the works heard last night he surrounded these brief expressions with orchestral color of great beauty and complexity. For it is no mere matter of contrasted instrumentation but

[175]

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
BANNER

The Week In Music

By IRVING KOLODIN
Music Editor, The Saturday Review of Literature

Koussevitzky

[illegible] has been [illegible] momentum in va[illegible] symphony broke [illegible] simultaneously [illegible] in Hartford and New [illegible]

Concerned with the interesting [illegible] of producing music and the [illegible] the continued existence [illegible] of [illegible] local [illegible] and national [illegible] enterprises, the Hartford Idea [illegible] a Music [illegible] Council [illegible] all of its [illegible] and a small [illegible] Philharmonic [illegible] New York Herald Tribune [illegible] a day later [illegible] with the [illegible] Philharmonic-Symphony and the Metropolitan Opera put their administrative problems in the care of the Fund of New York Arts Horizon which, he said, "seems to have a real knack for public [illegible]."

Both kinds of thought are related to the procedure followed [illegible] a place as Louisville, [illegible] place an Arts Fund, [illegible] an annual campaign, [illegible] among various cultural [illegible] in proportion to [illegible] public service, etc. Even [illegible] assemble the means by which such English enterprises as Covent Garden, the Sadler's Wells Ballet, and various orchestras (not including the Royal Philharmonic, which is privately supported, are assisted by the Arts Council in Great Britain. The difference is that the American plans provide for fund-raising efforts directed at the public, with all interested parties making their appeals simultaneously. Thus what we have is another version of the Community Chest program or the United Jewish Appeal, which have established beyond question that more money can be raised in one big drive than in a scattering of small ones.

The urgent need for a fresh approach to the whole problem of maintaining the symphony orchestras and the one permanent opera of this country on something like a going basis is underscored by the precarious condition in which most of those ventures now find themselves. Even the Boston Symphony, with its supposedly rock-ribbed financial structure created under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky, is rapidly exhausting capital funds; the Philadelphia Orchestra would be in straits without municipal participation, and others from coast to coast have to steer a narrow course to elude financial shoals. Hope of the tax relief which would gave a whiff of oxygen to the moribund prospects of the organizations seems dimmer now than previously, unless there is a revision of attitude in Washington on a subject far from most legislative minds.

What seems to be required is an interior Marshall Plan to preserve for our own citizens what we are so concerned about overseas. In a way we are robbing our own Pauls to benefit the Pierres of France, which is well enough while we can afford it. The irony would be for testimonies which could be well used by an American orchestra or the Metropolitan to find their way, directly or indirectly, to the support of Covent Garden or the Vienna Opera. Such an illusion was made, half humorously a year ago by Edward Johnson at a ceremonial lunch for Sadler's Wells Ballet people; but it becomes less and less humorous as time passes and the conditions at home harden.

It was the prospect of music by Francis Pouleno, French modernist, which took me to the Martin Beck Theater recently, where "Ring Round the Moon" is playing; but what kept me there was Jean Anouilh's script, adroitly translated by Christopher Fry, and the superb playing of a cast that included Lucile Watson and Oscar Karlweis as the well-known names, and such others as Denholm Elliott, Stella Andrew, Brenda Forbes, Francis Compton, and Philip Tonge, who may be presently unknown but will not hold that status long.

Poulenc's music (played, I imagine, by a rather smaller ensemble than he contemplated) is by no means inconsequential; but with all admiration for its whimsicality and poignance—both well suited to the matter in hand—one must recognize that the play could get along quite nicely without it. As with Raoul Dufy's six splendid fore-curtains, Poulenc's score is an embellishment but not an essential part of the Gilbert Miller production. I mention this in no disparagement of Poulenc's accomplishment, which is wholly consistent with his talent, but merely to establish that this is a play with music rather than a musical play.

To characterize this amusing, absorbing and superlatively well-played "charade with music," as the program titles it, is no matter for a paragraph. You are asked to imagine a house party in the Auvergne of 1912, with costumes and manners to match, at which the principal character is a young man named Hugo, who looks so much like his twin brother, Frederic, that only one's propensity to blush can tell them apart. (Both parts are brilliantly played by Denholm Elliott). Between them is Diana, daughter of a fabulously wealthy manufacturer (a kind of Basil Zaharoff), who is in love with one brother but loved by the other. Between THEM, the brother-not-in-love introduces a beautiful but "unimportant" ballet girl, who is to arouse the interest of the other brother and make him fall out of love with Diana. The complications are more than witty and brilliant—they are humane and touching, as well as completely diverting thanks to the luminous writing of Fry, the pungent delivery of that great actress Lucile Watson, as a wheel-chair-ridden aunt of the brothers, and the wistful playing of Oscar Karlweis as the multimillionaire. Yes, the Poulenc music is pleasant enough; and I will always be grateful to it for leading me to so wholly remarkable an experience.

Gerard Souzay is a French baritone whose slim budget of recordings nevertheless suggests an artist of substantial profile, resource and interest. At his American debut here on Sunday evening, November 26, his physical profile was slim, his artistic powers even more imposing than they had been, gramophonically conveyed. He did honor to his mentor Pierre Bernac and credit to himself in this first endeavor.

Souzay

Conceiving Paris as his vocal focus, he swept round the Continent in a program that began with a group in Italian (an excerpt from Handel's "Berenice," Scarlatti's "O Cessate di piagarmi," and Durante's "Danza, Danza"), moved to Germany with Schubert. ("Fischerweise" and "Ded Doppelgaenger") paused in France for Debussy, Faure and Caplet, winding up in Spain with de Falla. In all of these Souzay was well versed (by which, musically, may be meant a singer with a sense of the words as well as the musical line), with a power of inflection and emphasis which is all-important in this kind of singing.

Schubert's "Das Wandern" was a little off-hand for best results, but "Nacht und Traeume" was splendidly comprehended, in a fervent but well-controlled mezza voce which demonstrated his command of an all-important vocal attribute. As for "Der Doppelgaenger," it was both terrorizing and vocally temperate, achieving a sharp dramatic effect within a reasonable range of musical projection.

For the whole, Souzay seems in need of a strong guiding hand to supervise some of his more obvious platform mannerisms, to channel his impulses as an actor into more useful purposes as a singer. With so much artistry of voice, hand gestures and raised eyebrows are unnecessary. He was assisted by James Shomate, a pianist of uncommon quality.

Personality of the Week

Patricia Morison is the young lady with the long brunette hair who quarreled and kissed, quarreled and made up some 500 times with Alfred Drake in the Cole Porter show called "Kiss Me, Kate."

After the long bout with the Bard (Kate was originally Shakespeare's in "The Taming of the Shrew") Miss Morison took a vacation from the spotlight, but came back into it prominently a few nights back when she played the "broken-hearted bride" in the first "complete" Gilbert and Sullivan production ever seen on television. "Trial by Jury," by name, which, by the excision of a few reprises, matched the half-hour length of the program.

Morrison

One of those theatrical rarities, a native New Yorker, Pat grew up close enough to midtown to attend Washington Irving High School, where she won a scholarship to study at the Beaux Arts in Paris . . . However, she was more taken by the boards of the theater than the drawing board and turned instead to the Neighborhood Playhouse, where she learned stage right from stage left, studied dancing with Martha Graham and, finally, took a few singing lessons . . . Here, finally, she found her real career and soon made a debut in "The Two Bouquets," an operetta produced by Marc Connolly . . . Fame and fortune beckoned from Hollywood, where she went in the late Thirties, only to languish in smallish parts, some leads in obscure "independents," etc.

Part of the "Kiss Me, Kate" legend is that Cole Porter thought of her for Kate, discovered she was on the Coast and invited her to audition . . . Miss Morison lacked the wherewithal for the journey, but was, fortunately, invited to fly East to do a show for the military in time to audition for Porter and be accepted.

During and since the run of the show she has pursued serious vocal study with Richard Borchard aiming, among other things, at "Carmen" . . . Pat is five-feet-four, with or without stockinged feet, weighs 115, describes her eyes as blue-gray and her hair as reddish brown . . . It hangs below her waist and goes up in center part with a braided knot at the back.

When not working at her singing Miss Morison is a record addict, with considerable in the way of rare items, both of the serious vocalists, whom she hopes one day to emulate, and of small jazz combinations . . . When not busying herself with some form of music, Pat exercises that talent which almost took her to the Beaux Arts by painting on oil . . . Yes, she can also cook . . .

This Week's Baton

Scintillant, sensitive, satisfying are some of the single sibilants which seem suitable for the English pianist who calls himself, simply, Solomon . . . That he has risen to eminence despite this unseemly self-style is a special tribute to the scope and character of his art, for there are those who vowed they'd not patronize an artist who advertised himself in the "household-name" style before he had, professionally, a name at all.

Solomon

Actually, Solomon is a modest, self-effacting man, both at the keyboard and away from it, who stumbled on the practice of calling himself just Solomon when he made a debut in London years ago as a prodigy with orchestra and found that instead of listing him as Solomon Cuttner, the printer had omitted his last name altogether.

He has been avenging himself on the printing trade ever since . . . Not merely an English pianist but truly a Londoner (he was born within sound of Bow Bells, with all the prerogatives thus implied), Solomon had several tries at American popularity as a young man before finding his present popularity in post-war years.

Somewhat like Rubinstein, he was first a young virtuoso with a flamboyant style before finding his niche as a mature pianist with a fine musical understanding and a special sympathy for Haydn and Schumann, Brahms and certain works of Beethoven . . . Phonograph recordings for His Master's Voice (the English counterpart of RCA Victor) did much to build a receptive audience during his war-time absence, and Solomon's style and the critics' approval did the rest . . . During an American "season" that will keep him here from October to March, Solomon will be heard with the Boston, San Francisco and Philadelphia orchestras . . . With the latter he will play the Brahms B flat Concerto six times, in Washington and New York as well as in the Academy of Music.

Doubtless on these trips he'll spend some time with bridge, to which he is devoted, unless he chooses to drive from one place to another (he is also devoted to that) . . . Having spent so much of his life watching the baton in other men's hands, the one we award him, honorarily, will serve at least as a prop for his piano top as he strides forward, from score to score, as wise in art as he is Solomon in name . . .

(Copyright, 1950, by The Saturday Review of Literature)

Rehearse Number for 'Dance In-Rou..'

—Photo by Mary Noel

Lillian Hunt (left) and Joy Zibart rehearse the former's original composition for violin and dancer which they will present in the Circle Theater's "dance in-the-round" Wednesday and Thursday nights in the YMCA auditorium.

Featured with Mrs. Hunt and Mrs. Zibart are Stanley MacLeod and Bobby Jean Steele, pianists, a vocal chorus and dance group.

The program will include Charles Bryan's "Bell Witch Cantata," sung by the chorus with dances by Mrs. Zibart; "Prologue to 'Look Homeward Angel'" by Tom Scott and "Uirapuru" by Villa-Lobos, both danced by Mrs. Zibart; "Sonato for Piano and Violin," and "Everywoman and the Seven Deadly Sins," danced by Mrs. Zibart and the dance group to music by Norman Dello Joio.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 9- 1950

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony Responds as of Old to Baton of Koussevitzky, Conducting as Guest

Serge Koussevitzky, music director emeritus of the Boston Symphony, returned as guest conductor of the orchestra at the Academy of Music last night and treated the capacity audience to an evening of glorious music. It was a memorable concert, for Dr. Koussevitzky, who was invited to return to the orchestra during its 70th anniversary season, chose to perform the two symphonies which he probably does better than any others in the repertoire. These were the Brahms Third and the Sibelius Second.

Every time we hear him conduct the Brahms Third Symphony we feel obliged to declare that Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of this noble work is one step above that of any of his colleagues. To some, these may sound like fighting words, but there is a warmth and serenity in his projection of the symphony that we have never heard equalled anywhere.

This was especially true of the placid second movement, in which the lovely long melodic lines were phrased with the utmost subtlety and grace, and the third movement, which emerged as a beautiful song of fulfillment. The entire symphony had about it a glow that made the listener feel good all over.

Then there was the never-to-be-forgotten thrill of the Sibelius Second, another orchestral gift to the composer on his birthday. This is an extremely difficult symphony to interpret. In unsympathetic hands it can sound quite dull and meaningless—and often does. But Dr. Koussevitzky takes his time with the work. He conceives it on a broad scale, with sweeping lines and excitingly built climaxes. As a result, every phrase is full of meaning, and the hearer is constantly kept on the qui vive. Small wonder that at the symphony's triumphant conclusion there was a long and spontaneous ovation.

At the beginning of the concert, the conductor was also greeted with warm applause and a rising tribute by both the orchestra and the audience. He opened the program with Brahms' "Tragic" Overture, performed with ample vitality, but taken at slightly too rapid a pace to impart to it the necessary weight and eloquence.

Throughout the evening, we noticed that the old sheen had returned to the Boston Orchestra—not the light polish which was evident during Dr. Koussevitzky's last few seasons with the group, but that incandescent vibrancy and vitality it boasted half a dozen seasons ago. Altogether, it was a wonderful feeling to have this grand conductor back again, and we sincerely hope that he will pay frequent visits to the orchestra which he built into a world leader during his 25-year tenure at its helm.

[186]

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
1950

More Toppers: RCA Victor has released three more Red Seal surefire recordings.

The ever-popular Boston Pops orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, gets credit for the most novel arrangement, the clever "Classical Juke Box," based on "(Put Another Nickel In) Music! Music! Music!" by Weiss-Baum, arranged by Leroy Anderson. If you have wondered vaguely, while listening to some current popular tune, where you might have heard that song before, this one provides amazing proof that a great many of them spring forth almost directly from the classical and symphonic arrangements.

On the reverse side is Anderson's "Syncopated Clock," good for more than one listen.

Haydn's "Toy Symphony," by the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presents in excellent style: First Movement: Allegro; Second Movement: Menuetto and Trio; and Third Movement: Finale: Allegro. The orchestra's reading of this ingratiating little composition will appeal to both young and old.

Last but not least by any means is Gladys Swarthout's versions of two lyrical melodies — Massenet's "Elegie" and Hahn's "Les Cygnes" —with Gibner King at the piano and cello obbligato by Leonard Rose. Miss Swarthout does both of these haunting tunes with her usual ex-

Gems of Columbia: Columbia continues to turn out some of the best 7-inch 33 1-3 LP records on the market.

Rating tops among the most recent releases are Alan Dale's "Let Do It Again" and "Rainbow Gal"; the ear-tickling "Li'l Ole You" and "Longing" by the Godfrey ducters, Janette Davis and Bill Lawrence; one of Sammy Kaye's best in some time, "To Think You've Chosen me" and "You oughta Be In Pictures"; one of the better recordings of "The Petite Waltz" by Frankie Yankovic and His Yanks; Ken Griffin's superlative organ redition of "In A Little Gypsy Tea Room," with Hawaiian guitar and "Petite Waltz" on the flip, and Dick Jurgen's can't-miss "Girl With The Beautiful Eyes" and "Blue Heaven Waltz."

You can't go wrong on these.

• • •

It's Here To Stay: According to an Associated Press dispatch, a leading manufacturer of phonograph changers predicts that the three-speed player will be with us for a long time to come.

C. P. Cushway, executive vice president of Webster-Chicago corporation, also has these observations on the field of recordings:

1. The disc record, whether it revolves at 33 1-3, 45 or 78 revolutions a minute, will continue to be the most popular for reproducing music in the home.

2. Magnetic wire and tape recorders will continue to gain in favor for making home recordings—for "voice snapshots."

Webster-Chicago is one of the largest manufacturers of record changers in the business, producing players both for use in console combinations turned out by other manufacturers and for sale under its own name.

But since it does not manufacture records, Cushway points out that the company is somewhat like a razor manufacturer who does not make blades but makes razors to use blades produced by others. Consequently, he explains, "we don't have any preference for one speed over the other whatsoever."

But because of the tens of millions of standard 78 RPM records in the hands of the public, Cushway expects it to be years before the 78 RPM speed can be dropped —if ever.

There were about 15,000,000 standard 78 RPM players in the hands of the public when Columbia Records introduced the 33 1- RPM long playing record in 1948. Early the following year RCA Victor came out with its 45 PRM discs.

Webster-Chicago has been doing a big business in replacement of three-speed changers for installation in sets already in the hands of the public. Of some 1,200,000 three-speed changers sold, Webster-Chicago has made more than 600,000.

Of the 1,200,000 total, about 600,000 have gone to manufacturers for inclusion in radio or television combination sets, about 400,000 for replacement of obsolete changers, and 200,000 as plug-in units to be played through radio and television sets.

On the question of record speeds, a company that makes all three, but has steered clear of the 33 1-3 vs. 45 RPM fight between Columbia and RCA Victor reports that on its hit tunes, the great bulk of sales still is in 78s. A spokesman adds that for popular tunes, the percentage of sales in 45s in gaining, while for classical numbers and albums the 33 1-3s are still on the upgrade. But neither has gained enough to foreshadow any early demise for the 78.

BOB PAGE

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 10 1950

PROGRAM NOTES

By JOHN ROSENFIELD

Conductors' 'Goetterdaemmerung' and Who Shall Follow Podium Geniuses

This being the "Daemmerung" of the podium gods, it might be appropriate to repeat a Koussevitzky story. When his legion of admirers are gathered, one is certain to say, "Uncle Serge, you have done so much for new music. New music will continue to come but when you are gone, who is there to introduce it? Who with your skill, your prestige, your genius? There will be nobody."

Whereupon Koussevitzky enters a mild disclaimer, "Oh, you young people are always flattering me. There will be other conductors. There are other conductors."

"Well, who?" he will be asked.

"Oh, there are many. Let see, there's—. No. But there's—. No, not he. Maybe, there's—"

Then Koussevitzky will give up. Turning to his wife, he will say, "Just who is there, Natasha?"

Koussevitzky's inability to designate a succession to the line of podium giants was not merely a virtuoso's vanity. As a matter of fact, Natasha, who is there?

★ ★ ★

THE ERA OF PRIMA DONNA conductors began in this country roughly, in the second decade of the century. Karl Muck in Boston was not a conductor of the Boston Symphony but the conductor. The year 1912 marked the arrival of Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia. He was an obscure young Englishman who had done wonders with the Cincinnati Symphony.

Gustav Mahler was to have ushered in the big conductor era for the New York Philharmonic but quarreled with everybody, returned to Europe and died. Toscanini had arrived at the Metropolitan and was not thought a symphony man, just an operatic generalissimo.

New York was to endure the selfless existing ministrations of Josef Stransky for another decade, or the adventuresome but hardly polished efforts of Walter Damrosch.

Philadelphia and Boston had already defied their conductors before Mengelberg came to New York, won a godhead of short duration, and was cast into outer darkness by Toscanini.

★ ★ ★

KARL MUCK, a most Teutonic Bostonian, went under a cloud during the first World War. Boston did not settle down until the arrival of Koussevitzky. The Russian, whose baton technique and general musicianship were suspect, eventually commanded a treacherous situation. Both he and his orchestra were permitted to grow into a sort of greatness and with greatness to inspire reverence.

The Boston Symphony of a few seasons ago was probably the finest symphonic instrument ever created. It was a virtuoso orchestra and, better, had a personality, an unequaled brightness, a rich counterbalance and a silken texture.

Stokowski, whose resident activities in Philadelphia ceased thirteen years ago, left a magnificent orchestra that also had personality. It was a sort of human pipe organ with the richest, lushest string-tone ever invented. This is not to say that the other choirs were less than magnificent. The Philadelphia tone was darker and thicker than the Boston and less adapted to general repertoire, particularly the modern French or works influenced by Paris.

Koussevitzky. . . . "Who else is there?"

★ ★ ★

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra was created by Stokowski for his own purposes. These were, in the happy phrase of Time Magazine, "The fabrication of the musical wow." Restless, experimental, exhibitionistic, Stokowski began to impress his individuality of temperament and best qualities of the orchestra on the music.

He opened the moot question of how much of a performance should be Beethoven and how much Stokowski. The interpreter had the subtlety in Stokowski's mind.

The man has continued to be challenging. It is doubtful that many of his innovations have had validity to survive more than their one-time sensation. He continues at 68 to work magic with any orchestra in the matter of timbres.

★ ★ ★

TOSCANINI effected his sensations another way, denying all the while that he was trying to. Moreover he wrote off his as charlatans chief competitors in podium supremacy, which was not exactly generous or basically true.

Toscanini ignored the romantic or literary implications of music either out of blissful ignorance or arrogant disdain. His concern has been with notes and markings. In musical phraseology, in accuracy and detail, in the projection of both dynamic extremes and subtleties, he has been unmatched.

He sees himself as the instrument of the composer's intentions. This may be true in the bare results of execution. But composers are also philosophers and emotional dramatists. Philosophy and emotion are thoroughly drained. His music was agitations, excitements and no message.

It comes out, not Beethoven or Tchaikovsky, not even Mozart or Bach. It comes out Toscanini with the prima donna stamp on it.

★ ★ ★

ORMANDY, who succeeded Stokowski in Philadelphia, is a slick eclectic whose greatest achievement has been to preserve the ultra quality of the ensemble. Munch, now in Boston, is no Koussevitzky for majesty and authority. Now that Toscanini is idle with the NBC Symphony, through ill-health or ill-humor, that excellent organization is merely going through the motions of giving a season.

There will be no other Stokowskis, Toscaninis or Koussevitzkys for perhaps a generation. In truth the new music public wants something different and something more. It is almost fatal for a conductor to exercise either distracting gestures or extreme interpretative liberties. The conductor is valued most as a craftsman, and he is also asked to impart a virtuoso glow to the music he must execute cleanly.

★ ★ ★

THE CONDUCTOR TODAY has perhaps a taller order to fill than his glamorous prodium ancestors. He is asked to "wow" the public without creating the wows, a paradoxical assignment but one that must be filled according to specifications.

Worship or adulation is not in the nature of today's audiences. Stokowski's hairdo was once a model. Today an imitator would be advised by his board of directors to visit his barber.

Today's public appears to be remote of antics, egoistic indulgences, distortions of standard works or any other extent of insincerity.

Probably the public of 1950 takes great musicianship for granted, expects it as a starting point. After that it wants a great man.

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR-NEWS
DEC 10 1950

UP AND DOWN THE SCALE

An old musical friendship was renewed in New York when Albert Spalding, American violinist, and Ernst Von Dohnanyi, pianist-composer, met again for the first time in 20 years to record for Remington Records the three Brahms Sonatas for violin and piano they had last played together in 1930. The friendship started in 1923 when Dohnanyi's concerto for violin and orchestra had been given its world premiere by Spalding in Europe.

String quartets by six outstanding British composers are being performed by the Curtis String Quartet during six concerts in the lecture hall of the Free Library of Philadelphia. Edward Elgar's "Quartet for Strings" was given with string quartets of Haydn and Mendelssohn for the opening concert in the series, while subsequent programs will offer quartets of Frederick Delius, John Blackwood McEwen, Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Benjamin Britten.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools. The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely-subscribed season.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
DEC 10 1950

Being in Tune

That Is the Basic Essential of a Good Orchestra, Says Dr. Koussevitzky

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

WHAT makes a really good orchestra? Many elements enter into the fabrication of such a complex mechanism, to be sure, but primarily the group must be in tune. Sounds simple, doesn't it?

But behind that simplicity is a great deal that does not meet the eyes. Being in tune means that each player hits precisely the right note on his instrument, not above or below pitch. It means also that he reaches that note at exactly the right time and in the right rhythm, sometimes not easy to do when there is a rapid passage. Furthermore, depending on his position on the stage, he must anticipate the note, as the double bass players often must do. This anticipation makes all the notes reach the conductor—and therefore the audience—at the proper second.

✣ ✣ ✣

IN search of further information on this subject, your reporter went backstage the other night at the Mosque to ask a foremost authority, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for his ideas. They were readily forthcoming, even though the famous musician was even then climbing into his jacket for his first appearance of the evening on the stage.

"You are right about a good orchestra being perfectly in tune," Dr. Koussevitzky said, in a slow, Russian-type accent. "This is more important than people realize. When an orchestra like the Boston is in tune, it is because we have worked hard together in rhearsal, always trying to reach the perfect combination of sounds.

"But this orchestra, playing, by itself, is not enough. The player must also have perfect hearing when he practices at home. He must try over each interval, each whole tone or half tone or whatever it might be. Then, when the notes appear in the music, he is instantly ready to put his fingers just so"—and the conductor gestured in the violin position—"and out comes the note, perfectly."

✣ ✣ ✣

"BEING in tune is very important," he went on, straightening his white tie. "But it is also necessary to play together for a long time, so that each player can learn by experience how the man next to him, and the one across the stage, is going to play.

"After all, I led the Boston for more than 25 years now and I am proud of the kind of sound we produce. This was not done immediately. We had our troubles together. But everybody worked hard. Everybody says the Boston Symphony is the greatest orchestra in the world. I think so, too." And the conductor gave a little chuckle.

There was a small flurry of excitement as Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president of Griffith Foundation, arrived backstage on her customary visit to wish the visiting artist the best of success. When that was over, the maestro had one more subject on his mind—his choice of an all-Brahms program.

"Tonight I hope you will hear just what we have been talking about. And under the best of circumstances. What could be better than a program of the works of one composer? Especially when it is Brahms.

✣ ✣ ✣

"THIS is the way we can hear many sides of a composer, one short work, another that is in a mood of contemplation and still another that is full of power. That way we can all learn a good deal about Brahms, about the way he thought of music, the different moods in which he wrote."

We agreed heartily, and had the audacity to ask the maestro to continue his one-composer programs on future visits here. And next time, could we please have an all-Wagner program? Such a concert had not been given here since 15 years ago.

"Yes," said Dr. Koussevitzky, his eyes lighting up at the thought, "you have my promise. Next time it shall be all-Wagner.

"And now I must go to the stage," he said, as we shook hands and parted.

This Clipping From
OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Glee Club

John M. Teal, 5620 Western Avenue, is one of 50 members of the Harvard University Glee Club selected to sing in a performance of the "Magnificat in D," by Bach, which was given at the University's Sanders Theater on December 6.

Activities planned for the club for the coming year include performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra and a spring concert tour to New York, Cleveland, Syracuse and Pittsburgh.

This Clipping From
SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Spartan to Be Boston Soloist

Miss Marguerite Willauer of Spartanburg has been engaged to sing the solo soprano parts in the Bach Christmas Oratorio with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carl M[illegible] conducting. Dec. 22 and 23 in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This will be Miss Willauer's first engagement with the Boston Orchestra, which is one of the world's greatest symphony organizations.

MISS WILLAUER studied voice at Converse College with Mrs. Radiana Pazmor, and after taking her B. Mus. degree in 1945, continued her studies with William Whitney at the New England Conservatory in Boston, where she secured her Artist Diploma in 2 years. She studied also in New York with Joseph Regneas.

She has sung as soloist with most of the prominent choral societies of New England, and has been heard in recital frequently in Boston at the Gardner Museum and at Harvard University. She recently sang in Bach's "Sleepers Wake" in Worchester, Mass.

On Dec. 16 she will appear in the Messiah in Lexington, Mass., and on Jan. 22, 1951, she will be heard in the Saint Cecilia Society's performance of the Mozart Requiem in Jordan Hall, Boston with an orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

In private life Miss Willauer is Mrs. James Stagliano. Her husband is the solo French horn player of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 10 1950

More Toppers: RCA Victor has released three more Red Seal surefire recordings.

The ever-popular Boston Pops orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, gets credit for the most novel arrangement, the clever "Classical Juke Box," based on "(Put Another Nickel in) Music! Music! Music!" by Weiss-Baum, arranged by Leroy Anderson. If you have wondered vaguely, while listening to some current popular tune, where you might have heard that song before, this one provides amazing proof that a great many of them spring forth almost directly from the classical and symphonic arrangements.

On the reverse side is Anderson's "Syncopated Clock," good for more than one listen.

Haydn's "Toy Symphony," by the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presents in excellent style: First Movement: Allegro; Second Movement: Menuetto and Trio; and Third Movement: Finale: Allegro. The orchestra's reading of this ingratiating little composition will appeal to both young and old.

Last but not least by any means is Gladys Swarthout's versions of two lyrical melodies — Massenet's "Elegie" and Hahn's "Les Cygnes" —with Gibner King at the piano and cello obbligato by Leonard Rose. Miss Swarthout does both of these haunting tunes with her usual ex-

Gems of Columbia: Columbia continues to turn out some of the best 7-inch 33 1-3 LP records on the market.

Rating tops among the most recent releases are Alan Dale's "Let Do It Again" and "Rainbow Gal"; the ear-tickling "Li'l Ole You" and "Longing" by the Godfrey ducters, Janette Davis and Bill Lawrence; one of Sammy Kaye's best in some time, "To Think You've Chosen me" and "You oughta Be In Pictures"; one of the better recordings of "The Petite Waltz" by Frankie Yankovic and His Yanks; Ken Griffin's superlative organ rendition of "In A Little Gypsy Tea Room," with Hawaiian guitar and "Petite Waltz" on the flip, and Dick Jurgen's can't-miss "Girl With The Beautiful Eyes" and "Blue Heaven Waltz."

You can't go wrong on these.

• • •

It's Here To Stay: According to an Associated Press dispatch, a leading manufacturer of phonograph changers predicts that the three-speed player will be with us for a long time to come.

C. P. Cushway, executive vice president of Webster-Chicago corporation, also has these observations on the field of recordings:

1. The disc record, whether it revolves at 33 1-3, 45 or 78 revolutions a minute, will continue to be the most popular for reproducing music in the home.

2. Magnetic wire and tape recorders will continue to gain in favor for making home recordings—for "voice snapshots."

Webster-Chicago is one of the largest manufacturers of record changers in the business, producing players both for use in console combinations turned out by other manufacturers and for sale under its own name.

But since it does not manufacture records, Cushway points out that the company is somewhat like a razor manufacturer who does not make blades but makes razors to use blades produced by others. Consequently, he explains, "we don't have any preference for one speed over the other whatsoever."

But because of the tens of millions of standard 78 RPM records in the hands of the public, Cushway expects it to be years before the 78 RPM speed can be dropped —if ever.

There were about 15,000,000 standard 78 RPM players in the hands of the public when Columbia Records introduced the 33 1- RPM long playing record in 1948. Early the following year RCA Victor came out with its 45 PRM discs.

Webster-Chicago has been doing a big business in replacement of three-speed changers for installation in sets already in the hands of the public. Of some 1,200,000 three-speed changers sold, Webster-Chicago has made more than 600,000.

Of the 1,200,000 total, about 600,000 have gone to manufacturers for inclusion in radio or television combination sets, about 400,000 for replacement of obsolete changers, and 200,000 as plug-in units to be played through radio and television sets.

On the question of record speeds, a company that makes all three, but has steered clear of the 33 1-3 vs. 45 RPM fight between Columbia and RCA Victor reports that on its hit tunes, the great bulk of sales still is in 78s. A spokesman adds that for popular tunes, the percentage of sales in 45s is gaining, while for classical numbers and albums the 33 1-3s are still on the upgrade. But neither has gained enough to foreshadow any early demise for the 78.

BOB PAGE

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 10 1950

PROGRAM NOTES

By JOHN ROSENFIELD

Conductors' 'Goetterdaemmerung' and Who Shall Follow Podium Geniuses

This being the "Daemmerung" of the podium gods, it might be appropriate to repeat a Koussevitzky story. When his legion of admirers are gathered, one is certain to say, "Uncle Serge, you have done so much for new music. New music will continue to come but when you are gone, who is there to introduce it? Who with your skill, your prestige, your genius? There will be nobody."

Whereupon Koussevitzky enters a mild disclaimer, "Oh, you young people are always flattering me. There will be other conductors. There are other conductors."

"Well, who?" he will be asked.

"Oh, there are many. Let see, there's—. No. But there's—. No, not he. Maybe, there's—."

Then Koussevitzky will give up. Turning to his wife, he will say, "Just who is there, Natasha?"

Koussevitzky's inability to designate a succession to the line of podium giants was not merely a virtuoso's vanity. As a matter of fact, Natasha, who is there?

★ ★ ★

THE ERA OF PRIMA DONNA conductors began in this country roughly, in the second decade of the century. Karl Muck [illegible] was not a conductor of the Boston Symphony but the conductor. The year 1912 marked the arrival of Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia. He was an obscure young Englishman who had [illegible] with the [illegible] Gustav Mahler was [illegible] in the big [illegible] for the New York [illegible] but quarreled with [illegible] to Europe and [illegible] arrived at the [illegible] was not thought [illegible] just an operatic [illegible]

New York was to endure [illegible] existing [illegible] of Josef Stransky for another decade, or the adventuresome but hardly polished efforts of Walter Damrosch. Philadelphia and Boston had already defied their [illegible] before Mengelberg came to New York, won a good deal of short duration, and was cast into outer darkness by Toscanini.

★ ★ ★

KARL MUCK, a most Teutonic Bostonian, went under a cloud during the first World War. Boston did not settle down until the arrival of Koussevitzky. The Russian, whose baton technique and general musicianship were suspect, eventually commanded a treacherous situation. Both he and his orchestra were permitted to grow into a sort of greatness and with greatness to inspire reverence.

The Boston Symphony of a few seasons ago was probably the finest symphonic instrument ever created. It was a virtuoso orchestra and, better, had a personality, an unequaled brightness, a rich counterbalance and a silken texture.

Stokowski, whose resident activities in Philadelphia ceased thirteen years ago, left a magnificent orchestra that also had personality. It was a sort of human pipe organ with the richest, lushest string-tone ever invented. This is not to say that the other choirs were less than magnificent. The Philadelphia tone was darker and thicker than the Boston and less adapted to general repertoire, particularly the modern French or works influenced by Paris.

Koussevitzky. . . . "Who else is there?"

★ ★ ★

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra was created by Stokowski for his own purposes. These were, in the happy phrase of Time Magazine, "The fabrication of the musical wow." [illegible] Stokowski began to [illegible] experimental, extroverted [illegible] individuality of temperament [illegible] qualities of the orchestra [illegible] the music.

He opened the moot question of how much a performance should be Beethoven and how much Stokowski, the interpreter had the melody in Stokowski's mind.

The [illegible] has continued to be [illegible]. It is doubtful that many of his innovations have had validity enough to survive more than their one [illegible] sensation. He continues at [illegible] work magic with any orchestra [illegible] in the matter of timbres.

★ ★ ★

TOSCANINI effected his sensations another way, denying all the while that he was trying to. Moreover he wrote off his as charlatans chief competitors in podium supremacy, which was not exactly generous or basically true.

Toscanini ignored the romantic or literary implications of music either out of blissful ignorance or arrogant disdain. His concern has been with notes and markings. In musical phraseology, in accuracy and detail, in the projection of both dynamic extremes and subtleties, he has been unmatched.

He sees himself as the instrument of the composer's intentions. This may be true in the bare results of execution. But composers are also philosophers and emotional dramatists. Philosophy and emotion are thoroughly drained. His music was agitations, excitements and no message.

It comes out, not Beethoven or Tchaikovsky, not even Mozart or Bach. It comes out Toscanini with the prima donna stamp on it.

★ ★ ★

NORMANDY, who succeeded Stokowski in Philadelphia, is a slick eclectic whose greatest achievement has been to preserve the [illegible] quality of the ensemble. Munch, now in Boston, is no Koussevitzky for majesty and authority. Now that Toscanini is idle with the NBC Symphony, through ill-health or ill-humor, that excellent organization is merely going through the motions of giving a season.

There will be no other Stokowskis, Toscaninis or Koussevitzkys for perhaps a generation. In truth the new music public wants something different and something more. It is almost fatal for a conductor to exercise either distracting gestures or extreme interpretative liberties. The conductor is valued most as a craftsman, and he is also asked to impart a virtuoso glow to the music he must execute cleanly.

★ ★ ★

THE CONDUCTOR TODAY has perhaps a taller order to fill than his glamorous prodium ancestors. He is asked to "wow" the public without creating the wows, a paradoxical assignment but one that must be filled according to specifications.

Worship or adulation is not in the nature of today's audiences. Stokowski's hairdo was once a model. Today an imitator would be advised by his board of directors to see his barber.

Today's public [illegible] to be repelled by antics, [illegible] eccentricities, distortions of standard works or any other patent of insincerity.

Probably the public of 1950 takes great musicianship for granted, expects it as a starting point. After that it wants a great man.

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR-NEWS
DEC 10 1950

UP AND DOWN THE SCALE

An old musical friendship was renewed in New York when Albert Spalding, American violinist, and Ernst Von Dohnanyi, pianist-composer, met again for the first time in 20 years to record for Remington Records the three Brahms Sonatas for violin and piano they had last played together in 1930. The friendship started in 1923 when Dohnanyi's concerto for violin and orchestra had been given its world premiere by Spalding in Europe.

String quartets by six outstanding British composers are being performed by the Curtis String Quartet during six concerts in the lecture hall of the [illegible] Library of Philadelphia. Edward Elgar's Quartet for Strings was given with string quartets of Haydn and Mendelssohn for the opening concert in the series, while subsequent programs will offer quartets of Frederick Delius, John Blackwood McEwen, Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Benjamin Britten.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools. The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely-subscribed season.

Being in Tune

That Is the Basic Essential of a Good Orchestra, Says Dr. Koussevitzky

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

WHAT makes a really good orchestra? Many elements enter into the fabrication of such a complex mechanism, to be sure, but primarily the group must be in tune. Sounds simple, doesn't it?

But behind that simplicity is a great deal that does not meet the eyes. Being in tune means that each player hits precisely the right note on his instrument, not above or below pitch. It means also that he reaches that note at exactly the right time and in the right rhythm, sometimes not easy to do when there is a rapid passage. Furthermore, depending on his position on the stage, he must anticipate the note, as the double bass players often must do. This anticipation makes all the notes reach the conductor—and therefore the audience —at the proper second.

✣ ✣ ✣

IN search of further information on this subject, your reporter went backstage the other night at the Mosque to ask a foremost authority, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for his ideas. They were readily forthcoming, even though the famous musician was even then climbing into his jacket for his first appearance of the evening on the stage.

"You are right about a good orchestra being perfectly in tune," Dr. Koussevitzky said, in a slow, Russian-type accent. "This is more important than people realize. When an orchestra like the Boston is in tune, it is because we have worked hard together in rhearsal, always trying to reach the perfect combination of sounds.

"But this orchestra, playing, by itself, is not enough. The player must also have perfect hearing when he practices at home. He must try over each interval, each whole tone or half tone or whatever it might be. Then, when the notes appear in the music, he is instantly ready to put his fingers just so"—and the conductor gestured in the violin position—"and out comes the note, perfectly."

✣ ✣ ✣

"BEING in tune is very important," he went on, straightening his white tie. "But it is also necessary to play together for a long time, so that each player can learn by experience how the man next to him," and the one across the stage, is going to play.

"After all, I led the Boston for more than 25 years now and I am proud of the kind of sound we produce. This was not done immediately. We had our troubles together. But everybody worked hard. Everybody says the Boston Symphony is the greatest orchestra in the world. I think so, too." And the conductor gave a little chuckle.

There was a small flurry of excitement as Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president of Griffith Foundation, arrived backstage on her customary visit to wish the visiting artist the best of success. When that was over, the maestro had one more subject on his mind—his choice of an all-Brahms program.

"Tonight I hope you will hear just what we have been talking about. And under the best of circumstances. What could be better than a program of the works of one composer? Especially when it is Brahms.

✣ ✣ ✣

"THIS is the way we can hear many sides of a composer, one short work, another that is in a mood of contemplation and still another that is full of power. That way we can all learn a good deal about Brahms, about the way he thought of music, the different moods in which he wrote."

We agreed heartily, and had the audacity to ask the maestro to continue his one-composer programs on future visits here. And next time, could we please have an all-Wagner program? Such a concert had not been given here since 15 years ago.

"Yes," said Dr. Koussevitzky, his eyes lighting up at the thought, "you have my promise. Next time it shall be all-Wagner.

"And now I must go to the stage," he said, as we shook hands and parted.

This Clipping From
OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Glee Club

John M. Teal, 5620 Western Avenue, is one of 50 members of the Harvard University Glee Club selected to sing in a performance of the "Magnificat in D," by Bach, which was given at the University's Sanders Theater on December 6.

Activities planned for the club for the [illegible] year include performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra and a spring concert tour to New York, Cleveland, Syracuse and Pittsburgh.

This Clipping From
SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Spartan to Be Boston Soloist

Miss Marguerite Willauer of Spartanburg has been engaged to sing the solo soprano parts in the Bach Christmas Oratorio with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carl Munch conducting, Dec. 22 and 23 in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This will be Miss Willauer's first engagement with the Boston orchestra, which is one of the world's greatest symphony organizations.

MISS WILLAUER studied voice at Converse College with Miss Radiana Pazmor, and after taking her B. Mus. degree in 1945, continued her studies with William Whitney at the New England Conservatory in Boston, where she secured her Artist Diploma in 2 years. She studied also in New York with Joseph Regneas.

She has sung as soloist with most of the prominent choral societies of New England, and has been heard in recital frequently in Boston at the Gardner Museum, and at Harvard University. She recently sang in Bach's "Sleepers, Wake" in Worchester, Mass.

On Dec. 16 she will appear in the Messiah in Lexington, Mass., and on Jan. 22, 1951, she will be heard in the Saint Cecilia Society's performance of the Mozart Requiem in Jordan Hall, Boston, with an orchestra composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

In private life Miss Willauer is Mrs. James Stagliano. Her husband is the solo French horn player of the Boston Symphony.

[197]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC

CONCERT OVATIONS FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

He Leads Boston Symphony in Brahms and Sibelius Music for Carnegie Audience

By OLIN DOWNES

The performances of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall were as remarkable a tribute to that conductor's mastery and the quality of the orchestra as those of Wednesday night. The program contained no novelties or unfamiliar compositions, but this did not dull the greatness of the music discoursed, or the immense enthusiasm of a highly demonstrative audience.

The three works were the Brahms' "Tragic" overture, a masterpiece which is not played often enough; the Brahms Third Symphony and the Sibelius Second.

In the overture Dr. Koussevitzky caught that essence which cannot be signified by only notes and barlines: the quality of Greek simplicity, impersonality, grandeur of fate; that depth of thought and controlled power which say so much more than emotional hysteria.

He also gave a noble and poetical reading of the Third Symphony. But this is a curious work, with all its beauty and the strength of the first and last movements. They feel as if they had been created at the same time and in the same mood, while the middle movements, more personal and smaller in conception, sound like chamber music, or symphonized piano intermezzi. However, each movement received its full due. The opening theme was flung from the orchestra like a bolt from Jove, and the remiscence of this theme suffused the final pages with the loftiest beauty.

However, the overwhelming climax of the afternoon was the Sibelius symphony. It seems rather repetitious to make this remark, for that is what customarily happens when the Second Symphony is given anywhere near the masterful treatment which it received yesterday. But such is the fact. The audience was seized by the symphony, from the first note to the last, and no wonder. The music emerges from northern landscapes to chant of eternal verities and of the unconquerable spirit of man. It thrills by its sense of spaces and solitudes, its hum and skirl of the elements, and its bardic power.

The idiom is that of Sibelius' earlier period, and it is just too, too direct, uncompromising and unevasive to be always satisfactory to those of us who inhabit, apparently, the higher esthetic brackets of the musical art. It is also contemporaneous in the reverberation of its ancestral voices prophecying war, in its brusqueness and masculinity ,and invocation of the heroic spirit. It moves with a seven-league stride and it makes a great deal of other music sound affected, artificial and small.

The audience remained long in the hall to applaud the symphony. We have heard Dr. Koussevitzky when he was more solicitous of polish of detail in performing it, but never when he brought to the work such breadth, grandeur of design, and epical utterance.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

GREAT SCHUBERT QUINTET

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4; the Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducing (Victor, one 12-inch LP); String Quintet in F major; the Vienna Concert House Quintet (Westminster, one 12-inch LP); Quintet in F minor; Clifford Curzon, piano, with the Budapest Quartet (Columbia, one 12-inch LP). The Symphony and the Piano Quintet stand among the year's finest performances and recordings. Munch brings this, perhaps Brahms' greatest work, to life with truly astonishing vigor in a superb recording. The Budapesters remain by all odds The quartet of quartets while Mr. Curzon's playing more than matches his reputation. The String Quintet shouldn't be overlooked, either, its first movement being one of Brahms' most appealing things. All three are practically obligatory for Brahms admirers.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 3 in E-flat and Scherzo Capriccioso; the Vienna Symphony under Heney Swoboda (Westminster, one 12-inch LP). Piano Quintet in A major, Op. 81; the Chigi Quintet (London FFRR, one 12-inch LP). String Quintet in G major; the Vienna Concert House Quintet (Westminster, one 12-inch LP). Each of these works is filled with Dvorak's highly personal lyric idiom, with the two Quintets ranking well above the Symphony in musical merit. The Piano Quintet, done by the Chigi Quintet, is the best performance, but the String Quintet has the edge musically. The symphonic works are mostly dull.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Symphony Rehearsal For Public Thursday

Another of the popular "Open Series" rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall on Thursday. Starting at 7:30 P. M., the season will end between 9 and 10. At the first of five such events the audience registered hearty satisfaction with this new experience. Since the regular concerts are fully subscribed for the year, this was a means of hearing the orchestra and watching its colorful conductor, Charles Munch, despite that situation.

This Clipping From
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS
DEC 10 1950

Author Of the Week

John N. Burk, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting maternal. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston [illegible]

This Clipping From
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
DEC 10 1950

PROKOFIEFF: "Peter and the Wolf, Op. 67." Eleanor Roosevelt, narrator, and Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. RCA Victor LM-45.

Mrs. Roosevelt gives a vivid and lively reading of the old folk-tale which delights children the world over. Prokofieff's musical setting, with its striking tunes for the various characters, comes off spiritedly in this recording.

HEART OF THE VIOLIN CONCERTO: Movements from best known larger works for the violin, played by Mischa Mischakoff, concertmaster of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, with RCA Victor Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-1101.

A digest of standard violin repertory with orchestral accompaniment. Concertos and larger works represented, some shortened, are by Mozart, Tschkaikowsky, Wieniawski, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruch, Lalo and Mendelssohn.—E. C. W.

This Clipping From
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 10 1950

Notes and Footnotes—

—By Gunby Rule

Orchestra To Play Christmas Music

PREVIOUSLY announced as the main fare for the Knoxville Symphony Orchestra's concert Tuesday is the "Christmas Oratorio" by J. S. Bach. But preceding the Bach, patrons will hear a delightful, imaginative musical story called "Peter and the Wolf."

"Peter" was butchered up by novelty bands for rather wide radio exploitation several years ago, but the abuse nevertheless served to familiarize many with the saucy themes which represent Peter, the Bird, the Duck, the Hunters and the Wolf. The story, of course, is a children's tale, but the appeal of Serge Prokofieff's musical setting is probably greater for adults. It is the piece which was narrated (and recorded) recently by Eleanor Roosevelt and the Boston Symphony. The narrator Tuesday will be Dick Lane, Knoxville actor.

For the hour-long oratorio, David Van Vactor and the orchestra will be joined by the University of Tennessee Chorus and student soloists trained by Dr. John Carl Tegnell. The soloists will be Mrs. Peggy Wakefield Shanton, soprano; Sam Scarbrough, tenor, and Robert Goddard Jr., bass, all of Knoxville, and Miss Freddie Sherrod of Covington, contralto.

DR. JOHN C. TEGNELL

The orchestra will open the Bijou Theater program at 8:15 p. m. with the Wedding March from "Feramors" by Anton Rubenstein.

* * *

MARYVILLE MUSICIANS HERE

WILLIAM CURTIS HUGHES, Maryville College organist, and the Maryville College A Cappella Choir directed by Harry Harold Harter, will give a public recital at 8:15 p. m. tomorrow at Second Presbyterian Church

The Knoxville chapter of the American Guild of Organists, which sponsors the concert, will have a banquet at 6 p. m. at First Methodist Church honoring pastors and choir directors.

Mrs. Shanton Mr. Scarbrough

HIS BAND COMING—Gene Krupa, presiding at the drums, will bring his orchestra to Knoxville Wednesday for a concert and dance at Chilhowee Park auditorium from 9 to 1. The musicians will appear Thursday in Oak Ridge at the Grove Recreation Center.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
DEC 10 1950

'Peter and the Wolf' Has Wide Appeal

RCA VICTOR'S December Red Seal list contains a variety of albums and singles released for the Christmas season.

Outstanding among them is an album of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which marks the record debut of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator in this new reading, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Recorded at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass. last summer, the new Eleanor Roosevelt "Peter and the Wolf" is a work with broad appeal to all ages of record lovers, from the smallest child to the family elders.

Music lovers who have been awaiting the release of the second album in Wanda Landowska's recording of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier" will be able to purchase this in time for the Yuletide season.

Another instrumental highlight of RCA Victor's December Red Seal list is a new reading of the beloved Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto by Jascha Heifetz.

This Clipping From BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
DEC 10 1950

Mrs. F.D.R. Tells Story On Record

By RECORDER

The record companies, as well as Santa Claus, have discovered the children.

Time was when children's records were kin to castor oil. But no more. Like toys, they have steadily, under the guidance and counsel of educators, grown better, more enjoyable and more educational.

And not the least surprising are those who appear on these disks. A new RCA Victor album of "Peter and the Wolf" is a case in point.

LIKE A GRANDMOTHER.

The distinguished Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, sounding, as one critic put it, "like a grandmother reading a pleasant little story to her grandchildren" has recorded the delightful and perennially popular Prokofieff musical tale with the musically distinguished Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Most children know the story but to hear Mrs. Roosevelt read it while the orchestra plays its musical component is to heap marshmallow on a treat.

HAS A MORAL.

Then there's Harl McDonald's "Children's Symphony" of familiar tunes. Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, it is a symphony in miniature using eight nursery rhymes for themes. Children will delight in identifying them and at the same time hear more clearly what actually goes on in a symphony. (Columbia; one 10-inch LP).

Something more earthy, but illustrating a moral, is Columbia's picture story album "Gene Autry at the Rodeo." No need to explain who he is. If you have a couple of six-year-old cowboys around home, you'll know.

This Clipping From
WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
TIMES
DEC 10 1950

Off the Record

By BOB PAYNE

The staccato drumbeat which plays the title role in "The Thing," current novelty sensation of the juke boxes, is jarring the eardrums of coffee drinkers and dancing bobby soxers across the nation.

Just what is the thing? That's what the author wants us to guess. He had nothing more in mind. He just took a plot that has been used, perused and abused since "The Lady or the Tiger," wrapped it in a sterotyped song pattern, and came up with a hit tune.

Actually it is a take-off on a "shaggy dog" type of story, which through the years has been told in many versions. One goes like this:

A man received a note, on a piece of blue paper and written in French, a language he did not understand. He showed the note to a Frenchman, who read. Then the Frenchman knocked him down and trampled him with his feet. He showed it to a woman who said she could read French. She read it, then slapped his face and attempted to claw out his eyes with her fingernails. Other attempts ended in the same manner.

Finally he took the blue note to a close friend who understood the French tongue. His friend promised faithfully not to lose his temper, no matter what the note said.

Thereupon, the man reached out to hand his friend the note. It slipped from his fingers, was caught in a gust of wind, sailed out the window and out of sight, never to be seen again.

Still, people persist in guessing. For this reason this column will give, for the most ridiculous identification of "The Thing," one 45 rpm recording of the song (and be glad to get rid of it.)

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt has turned bedtime story teller for a collaborative performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They team up on "Peter and the Wolf," a symphonic tale for children, on a Victor LP 33 1-3 rpm vinylite platter.

Mrs. Roosevelt's highly cultured diction doesn't lend itself too well to the animated style necessary to entertaining children—unless they are Boston children, perhaps.

The major works of Charles Ives, written shortly after the turn of the century and generally regarded as an important forerunner of modern music, will be recorded by Polymusic Records.

The first volume, a 12-inch LP 33 containing six numbers, has been released. The songs include "Over the Pavements," "The Unanswered Question," "Halloween" and "Central Park in the Dark Some 40 Years Ago," all for orchestra; "Sonata No. 2" for violin and piano, and "Largo," for a trio composed of violin, piano and clarinet.

The technically excellent recording features the Polymusic Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Vladimir Cherniavsky; Elliott Magaziner, violin; Frank Glazer, piano, and David Weber, clarinet.

This Clipping From LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE
DEC 10 1950

Leopold Stokowski conducts his own orchestra in a capital performance of the "Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz;" the Boston Pops Orchestra under the baton of Arthur Fiedler plays that most popular of instrumental tangos, "Jalousie" by Gade, and The First Piano Quartet does all manner of tender things to "Liebestraum."

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL
DEC 10 1950

WAX MUSEUM

Classical

By JAMES HART

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony as recorded at Tanglewood have romped through a pair of highly ingratiating works for younger listeners in time for the holiday trade. Both have been brilliantly recorded by Victor.

One of these, found on a single 45 rpm disk, is the Haydn "Toy" Symphony, which makes its point with birds and toy bugles, drums and cuckoo-calls. It's pleasant and rather simple-minded fun, and the Boston orchestra plays it for all it is worth.

Somewhat more ambitious is the new version of Prokofieff's Peter and the Wolf, in which the orchestra enlists (as narrator) no less distinguished a story-teller than Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

It should be enough to say of this set that it contains some of the finest orchestral playing within memory, a quality superbly matched in the recording; and that Mrs. Roosevelt's handling of the fairy-tale is admirably straightforward, humorous without the patronizing leer that has characterized certain other readings. If your family hasn't yet found its way to this piece the new version should engage your attention at once.

* * *

THE SAME ORCHESTRA, under its new conductor, Charles Munch, has rendered a major service this month to Schubert-lovers, offering through Victor (on a single LP-10 and on 45s) a tautly controlled performance of that master's wonderful Symphony No. 5 in B-flat Major.

Not a match for the Fifth Symphony (in the same key), or of course for the later two masterworks, the Second is still a most attractive score, and it boasts a finale, at least, foreshadowing the greater things to come. If you have been content heretofore to limit your acquaintance with Schubert's orchestral work to the "Unfinished" Symphony or the "Great" C Major, you'll find a wealth of attractive music in the Second. It should suggest the desirability of hearing the remaining earlier symphonies as well. All of them are now available on records, most of them on LP.

The only previous discing of this work was done several years back by Howard Barlow and the CBS orchestra. It was adequate but not much more, and those who first found the music in that earlier pressing will now discover a new richness of detail awaiting them.

* * *

PIERRE MONTEUX has in the past made rather a specialty of French or Russian music on records, and it comes as a mild surprise to find him currently employed with Beethoven's Eighth Symphony (San Francisco Symphony. Victor LP-10 and 45s).

As in his earlier release of the same composer's Second, the approach here stresses the regularities of feature in the music. One is tempted again to use the adjective "Gallic," of which the conductor must be heartily sick by this time.

On any event, it is a treatment to which the music responds effectively, and Victor has recorded the orchestra well—perhaps a little too well, since the clarity in which they work reveals an occasional inability to keep up with the conductor's intentions.

* * *

A FINAL orchestral disc (also Victor, LP-12): Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play Mozart's "Ein Kleine Nachtmusic" (released some months ago in standard form) and the Hadyn "Oxford" Symphony, No. 92 in G. The results in this instance are not especially arresting.

NEW RÔLE—J. Carroll Naish (Life With Luigi), in today's Family Theatre (KPOJ, 4).

CLASSICAL—Moments Musical by Jon Alexander airs via KPFK Thursday nights.

Popular

By TED HALLOCK

Victor collected six exciting items by Perez Prado, the taste of Mexico City and Manhattan, as an addition to the label's "for dancing" series of albums. Prado is the maestro whose unit introduced the new dance step plaguing those oldsters who finally mastered the rhumba after 20 years—"The Mambo."

His U. S. release, "Mambo No. 5," sold so many copies that Victor transferred his work from its main label to the familiar brown and gold pop series.

Prado's sound is no innovation, either in tempo or theme. It can be likened readily to Stan Kenton's Afro-Cuban [illegible] against a four-four background. Perez differs from Stan in that his instrumentation is simpler, his orchestra smaller, his emphasis wholly on the beat—a powerful, swingy thing no one can resist.

These records, attired in an attractive Mexico City studio, represent an organization as exciting now as Curat's music must have been two decades ago. Buy them (Victor album WP 302).

* * *

VICTOR, in grabbing "Call Me Madam's" cast for a waxing of the score from same, missed Ethel Merman unfortunately, but hosts Paul Lukas, Galina Talva, et remainder. It's a good show-type collection, but Dinah Shore just ain't Ethel (Victor album WOC 1). Same label's "Guys and Dolls" set is notable for its tunes rather than performers. Damon Runyon's prose set to Frank Loesser's music makes good sense, and happy listening (Victor album WK 27).

Everyone misses "swing" music circa 1935-1940. The original records of this era are mostly worn out, with no possibility of replacement. Victor is leading the field (holding most of the good masters: Goodman, Shaw, Dorsey, Miller, Barnet, Clinton) in reissuing the best products of that period on relatively indestructible 45 rpm discs.

It's latest, Tommy Dorsey's "Opus No. 1," "Marie," "Song of India," and three other faves (Victor album WP 238). RCA plans to issue a series of things by Waller, Basie, and the above-named leaders after January 1, all of which were cut during the golden half-decade previously mentioned.

* * *

AS RED SKELTON would have it, Nat Cole's "Tunnel of Love" is cute (Capitol 45-3752). Jimmy Dorsey's driving Dixieland band-within-his-band is turning out some potent jazz under the guise of pops, such as "Dixieland Band from Santa Claus Land" (Columbia LP 1-866).

Gene Krupa's little two-beat group produces interesting Chicago-style jazz. Gene is certainly entitled to have at Dixie, having begun beating two spoons on the Windy City soda fountain where he was first possessed of the urge (Victor 42-3165).

OLD SONGS—Specialist Peggy Bowers, heard on Visitin' Time (KEX, Saturdays, 9:30 p. m.).

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 10 1950

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's triumphant return to Symphony Hall, which brought him in six concerts before all four subscription audiences, might be called guest-conducting in reverse. Even after a full season of the latters, five weeks in the present one, it is Koussevitzky, not Munch, who is the familiar figure. As familiar as our own daily surroundings is the uniquely sumptuous and resplendent sound he obtains from an orchestra, particularly the one with which he was so long identified. In the main he gave us as well works in which he has been repeatedly heard here: the Second and Fifth Symphonies of Sibelius, Brahms' Third and his perennial First. A little off the beaten track were the former composer's "Pohjola's Daughter," played here only five times and not since 1937, and the latter's Tragic Overture, that went unperformed at the Hall between '33 and '49. Wholly new and arguably not quite worth the amount of time consumed in preparing and performing it, though it has its points, was Barraud's oratorio, "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents." I would still say far better that sincere and expert, if not particularly original or compelling music, than one more performance of the Brahms First, that needs a rest if anything ever did.

* * *

Ordinarily, it is to the guest-conductor that we look for the welcome change from routine, the unfamiliar piece or the fresh approach to the old standby. That, with the exceptions noted, Koussevitzky on the one hand did not and on the other hand could not provide us. Anyway, it was good to see him again, and from a musical point of view his fortnight of guesting was far from profitless. I, for one, would not have missed for a good deal the Brahms Third, set forth so eloquently, and there were at least portions of the other things on which I look back with pleasure. Also, I am glad that Munch is returning, with the stimulating program he has planned for this week.

Whatever its merits, the Barraud was a step in the right direction. And Koussevitzky had good reason for giving us some Sibelius: the somber Finn turned 85 last Friday. True to his word, Mr. Munch neglected him last season and has not declared his intention of playing him in this one. The Latins do not fancy his music, steeped in northern grays and heavy with northern repressions. Charles Martin Loeffler compared it to cod liver oil. And I still recall the beloved Georges Longy's comments on the Fifth Symphony. Said that great oboist to me after the local premiere under Monteux, who didn't like it either: "Zere is nossing zere; no melody, no harmony, no counterpoint, no form, no orchestration: nossing!"

* * *

Even if his appeal is largely limited to certain countries: his own, the Scandinavian ones, England and America, and even to certain people in those countries, Sibelius is not a figure to be lightly brushed aside. No man can be ignored who has created a style and idiom so distinctive as his. The trouble is that that idiom was both his long suit and his greatest liability. Fascinating at first it has not worn well—and I do not speak for myself alone. Critical coolness toward his music is now far commoner than critical enthusiasm for it.

* * *

It is possible that the most ardent supporters of Sibelius have proved his worst enemies. Instead of accepting him as a tone poet with a message that was part racial, part personal, the musical interpreter, like Norway's Grieg and Bohemia's Smetana before him, of a land that had not previously had fitting musical representation, critics like Cecil Gray hailed him, not merely as an important symphonist, but as the greatest since Beethoven.

* * *

It is a sign of a flaw somewhere that Sibelius has not composed anything in 25 years. The great creators who have lived beyond 60 years have gone on creating, giving us in some cases their very best music. It has been reported that Sibelius has an Eighth Symphony worked out in his head but has not committed it to paper. Unlike Strauss, who lived three months past his 85th birthday and died, so to speak, with his pen in hand, Sibelius was perhaps loath to write music that would not enhance his reputation. But at least you respect Strauss for trying; and the music of his last quarter century is by no means wholly negligible.

Koussevitzky's recent homage to Sibelius was accordingly much to the point. But why did he have to play the Second and Fifth, that he had so conspicuously run into the ground hereabouts? He admitted the other day to finding the Seventh the greatest. For him the Fourth, unheard here in a decade, is "experimental," but your true Sibelian holds it highest of all. There is charming matter in the Third, that Koussevitzky brought out after both Muck and Monteux had pronounced it valueless. My own favorite is the less characteristic [illegible] and it may be that the less pretentious suites and tone poems will outlast them all.

* * *

The Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, will make his Boston debut at this week's symphony concerts, playing the Tchaikovsky First Concerto. Mr. Munch will revive Haydn's "Drumroll" Symphony, the Frist Suite from Ravel's "Daphis and Chloe" and his Spanish Rhapsody.

* * *

The New England Opera Theatre will perform Mozart's "La Finta Giardiniera" at the Opera House this afternoon and the Trapp family will appear in Jordan Hall. The Handel and Haydn Society sings Handel's "Messiah" at Symphony Hall tonight and tomorrow night. At Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening Teresa McGovern, soprano, gives her first Boston recital, with Collins Smith as accompanist. On Wednesday evening, with Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violist, as soloists, the Zimbler Sinfonietta gives its first concert of the season, and Camille Girouard, baritone, sings at Recital Hall, with Alice Girouard at the piano. On Thursday evening the Boston Symphony gives the second of its public rehearsals, and the Conservatory Chorus gives a concert in Jordan Hall featuring Haydn's Imperial Mass. Lorna Cooke de Varon conducts.

* * *

The fourth concert of Boston University's festival of New England music will take place at Jordan Hall tomorrow evening. Chamber music by Hill, Piston, Loeffler and Porter will be performed by Symphony men and others (free). On Tuesday evening at Mutual Hall Emmalina di Vita, soprano, Sandy Anselmo, baritone and Dana Lordly, pianist, will present operatic excerpts and light music.

[189]

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
DEC 10 1950

In the Realm of Music

MUSICAL CALENDAR

Today

8 P.M.—[illegible] Program, Kleinhans Music Hall.

8 P.M.—[illegible] Glee Club, Kleinhans Music Hall.

8 P.M.—[illegible], Westminster Choir, Kleinhans Music Hall.

Tomorrow

8 P.M.—[illegible] Chamber Music, Grosvenor Recital Hall.

Tuesday

8 P.M.—[illegible], Amherst Central High School auditorium.

8 P.M.—[illegible] Choirs, Kleinhans Music Hall.

Wednesday

8:30 P.M.—Bach's B Minor Mass, Kleinhans Music Hall.

Friday

8:30 P.M.—[illegible] Pipe, Kleinhans Music Hall.

By KENNETH GILL

Making their inaugural U. S. concert tour after a three-year stay in Europe, the Ukrainian Male Chorus, Natra, will appear at 8:30 in Kleinhans Music Hall on Tuesday evening. Conducted by Dr. Leo Turkevich, previously managing director of the Ukrainian Theater or Opera at Lwow and director of operatic orchestras at Warsaw, Posnan and other European cities, the chorus will present an evening of Ukrainian religious and folk music.

Dr. Turkevich

Organized from among a group of DP Ukrainians located in and around the Foreloster DP Camp in the French Occupational Zone of Austria in the Fall of 1946, the chorus has given over 300 concerts throughout Austria, Germany and Switzerland and is currently making its first tour of the North American Continent.

Bach B Minor Mass

In commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach, the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, the Buffalo Schola Cantorus and the Buffalo Oratorio Society will perform in the Bach B Minor Mass, this Wednesday evening, in Kleinhans Music Hall.

Soloists for the work will be Panna Genia, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Chester Watson, bass. The performance, which begins at 8 p. m. is the culmination of three years preparation of the choral clubs, under the direction of Cameron Baird.

School Children

Combined choruses numbering 450, an orchestra of 35, and a number of unusual Christmas Carols combine to provide a most attractive program of Christmas music, which will be presented this afternoon by the Music Department of the Buffalo Public Schools in Kleinhans Music Hall at 3 o'clock.

Soloists include Gertrude Lutzi, Ruth Hill, Verner Gibson, James Davis, Joan Derner, Mary Ann Bermel, and Janet Devine. Philip Teibel will play Massenet's Meditation. Pierne's The Children at Bethlehem, Part II, will be featured. The program will be directed by William Breach.

Carol Ceremony

The Chromatic Club holds its annual Christmas program in conjunction with the Candlelight Carol Service at Westminster Church this evening at 8 o'clock. The Westminster Junior and Senior Choirs, directed by Hans Vigeland, perform with the major work of the evening to be Benjamin Britten's Ceremony of Carols. In this work, Martha Gomph will provide the harp accompaniment, while Ruth Vigeland will conduct.

Solo work on the program will be carried by Alene Hornung, soprano. Carl Burgwardt, tenor, and Justine Gladkowski, contralto.

This evening, in the auditorium of the Troop I Post, 432 Franklin St., the American Legion Auxiliary Glee Club will appear in concert. Michael C. Slominski will conduct the women's chorus in works of Millard, Strauss, Humperdinck, Schubert and Dvorak.

Guest soloist will be Janet Becker, pianist, who selects Pinto's Scenes of Childhood, Respine's Nocturne and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 13.

Fredonia at Pops

Friday night's Pop Concert by the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in Kleinhans Music Hall will salute Fredonia State Teachers College. Two students of Fredonia will appear as soloists, with Rita De Marchi, pianist, playing Dohnanyi's Rhapsody in C Major and Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, singing One Fine Day from Puccini's Madame Butterfly and Lover, Come Back to Me from Romberg's New Moon.

In addition, the concert will have Richard Bain, the nation's youngest harmonica concert soloist, playing Guion's Harmonica Player and Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody, No. 1. Bain has starred with Fred Waring and has appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henry Aaron will conduct the orchestra in works of Wagner, Bizet and Anderson.

Concert Notes

Through the courtesy of the Buffalo Musicians Local 43, AFL, the Albright Art Gallery will be able to present the Buffalo Symphonette in a program of chamber music at 8.30 p. m. Saturday, December 30th. Fred Ressel will conduct.

Eugene Istomin, 1943 Levintritt Award winner, is the next soloist for the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in concerts December 17th and 19th. A former student of Horszowski and Serkin, Istomin is well known for his appearances with most of the major orchestras. His work for the Buffalo concert is the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

Eugene Istomin

Conductor William Steinberg's choice for the orchestra is Mozart's Overture to the Marriage of Figaro and Bruckner's Romantic Symphony No. 4. At the concert, Steinberg will receive the Bruckner Medal from the Bruckner Society of America in appreciation of his efforts to create greater interest in the composer's works.

Amherst Symphony

Tuesday evening finds the Amherst Symphony Orchestra performing in a Christmas Festival Concert in the auditorium of the Amherst Central High School at 8.30 p. m. Joseph Wincenc conducts the orchestra in Symphonic Sketches of Chadwick, Five Variants of Dives and Lazarus by Vaughan Williams, Tobani's Around the Christmas Tree, and Bennett's symphonic arrangement of Irving Berlin's White Christmas.

A community chorus, prepared by Allen Giles, will sing a group of carols by Praetorius, Pergolesi and Holst, in addition to joining the orchestra for Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. Carol singing by the entire attendance will close the program.

Oratorio

Handel's Messiah will be given this afternoon in St. John's Lutheran Church, Lancaster. Performing will be the Lancaster Choral Club and the Lancaster Men's Chorus, both under the direction of Marlo Schermerhorn. Soloists for this fifth annual presentation are Clara Kamien, Jane Kindead and Cleta Schermerhorn, sopranos; Elizabeth Baker, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Earl Obermeyer, bass. Squire Haskin is the organist.

Canisius Program

Christmas music will make up the program for the Canisius College Glee Club this afternoon in the Mary Seaton Room of Kleinhans Music Hall. Robert Schulz will direct, while Alfred C. Boyd, Jr., and Robert E. Casey, Jr., are the accompanists. Soloists will be taken by William W. Meissner, tenor, and Robert M. Priore, baritone.

Societies and Studios

Students of the Community Music School will give a recital in the school at 5 o'clock today.

Ruth Koehler Nichols presents voice students in a recital at the Central Park Methodist Church tomorrow night. Marjorie Nichols, pianist, will be the guest soloist.

Tomorrow at 8.30 p. m., Laura Duerstein will direct the Old Masters' Singers in a program presented for the Business & Professional Women's Club. On Monday, December 18th, Miss Duerstein features a Christmas Festival of Song, with the same group, in the Church of Christ, Williamsville. Ruth Johnson is the soprano soloist, while Allen Giles and Jay Eyler are the accompanists.

Grosvenor Recital

In 1944, when Eugene Ormady was touring Australia, he was so greatly impressed with Leonard Hungerford's playing that he urged the young pianist to come to the United States to continue his studies.

After enrolling in the Juilliard Graduate School, Hungerford began working with Carl Friedberg, one of this country's greatest scholars of piano music. This year Hungerford became the first recipient of the newly-established Carl Friedberg Award.

Tomorrow evening, Hungerford will appear in the Grosvenor Chamber Music series and will present a program of lesser known works by Schubert and Brahms.

Hungerford's appearance in this series has been made possible by the membership of the Twentieth Century Club who were entertained this last week by the young pianist in private recital on Wednesday morning.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Musical Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will give the eighth pair of concerts in the Friday and Saturday series in Symphony Hall this week and the second concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre next Tuesday.

Mr. Munch will open his Boston program with Haydn's Symphony No. 103, known as the "Drum Roll," and not performed at these concerts for many years. The soloist will be Aldo Ciccolini, the young Italian pianist, who recently made his American debut in New York, following a brilliant career in Europe since the war, and a tour of South America just completed. He will appear with the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto. Mr. Munch will end the program with two works by Maurice Ravel, the less familiar First Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Rapsodie Espagnole.

For his Cambridge program, Mr. Munch will present Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and Schumann's "Spring" Symphony No. 1.

Next week the third concert of the Tuesday evening series will be given in Symphony Hall on December 19. Mr. Munch will present Haydn's Symphony No. 103 and Schumann's First Symphony. As soloist, Ania Dorfman will be heard in Beethoven's First Piano Concerto.

TODAY—The Trapp Family Singers give their only Boston concert of the season in Jordan Hall. The program: an entire group of Christmas carols, a group of folksongs from the Austrian Alps, and a group devoted to instrumental music for recorders, viol da gambovs, and other instruments: 3.30 P. M.

The New England Opera Theatre presents "La Finta Giardinara" by Mozart entitled "Violanta's Revenge" at the Opera House with Raymond Smolevett, Adele Addison, Mac Morgan and others: 8 P. M.

The Handel and Haydn Society sing G. Handel's "Messiah" oratorio in Symphony Hall 8:30 P. M.

The Lowell House Musical Society presents "An Afternoon of Opera" at Lowell House, Harvard University: 3-7 P. M.

Boston College Glee Club holds a joint concert with Emmanuel College Glee Club in Emmanuel College auditorium, 400 the Fenway. The program includes "Four Landscapes" by Lloyd; Romberg; "Ave Maria" by Arkadelt; Song and Daughters of the Land Robbins; "Clara: P. M.

Annual [illegible] Service at the Central Congregational Church, Walnut Street, Newtonville: 8 P. M.

The Boston Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Aurelio Gressalin gives a concert at [illegible] o'clock in the Conservatory auditorium, 31 Hemenway Street. The program includes the Chorale, Prize Song, and [illegible] from the Mastersingers by Richard Wagner.

A Christmas concert will be sung by the massed choirs of the First Baptist Church of Medford, [illegible] voices, piano, bells, soloists, and organ: 7 P. M.

TOMORROW—Boston University Festival of Music at Jordan Hall. The Stradivarius Quartet and other assisting artists will play. Program: Sextet for Woodwinds and [illegible]; Hill: Sonatina for violin and harpsichord; Piston: Two Rhapsodies for Oboe, [illegible] and Piano, Loeffler; String Quartet No. 3, Porter. The concert is free: 8:30 P. M.

Virgil Fox, distinguished organist, in his sixth [illegible] of the season at Harvard Memorial Church. The program: Magnificat [illegible]; Buxtehude; Chromatic [illegible] on the name of Bach. Piston; Toccata, [illegible] Fugue in C. Bach; Christmas Chorale Preludes from the "Orgelbuchlein"; Prelude and Fugue in A minor, [illegible]: 8:30 P. M.

Weitz Orchestral Society of Malden in a free concert at Cary Auditorium, Malden High School. The program: Poet and Peasant Overture, von Suppe; Symphony in E minor, No. 5, fourth movement, Dvorak; Violin [illegible] with orchestra, Mendelssohn; Knightsbridge March, Coates; Violets Waltz, [illegible]; Variations on a theme of Corelli, Tartini-Kreisler; Malaguena, de Sarasate; Hungarian Dances, Bartok, South Pacific Selections: 8:15 P. M.

TUESDAY—Christmas Convocation, Boston University Chorus, Dr. James R. Houghton, conductor, Trinity Church, Copley Square: 8 P. M.

Chamber music ensemble of the Cambridge Center for Adult Education in a free concert. The program: Christmas Concerto, Corelli; Concerto in D Minor, Bach; the chorus will sing Bach chorales, familiar carols and songs from other lands, at 42 Brattle street, Cambridge: 8:30 P. M.

Musical portraits, a unique musical entertainment featuring opera scenes in English acted out on stage with fundamental properties. New England Mutual Hall: 8:30 P. M.

Teresa McGovern, soprano, sings at Jordan Hall. The program: Ah, mio cor; Handel; Se Florindo e fedele, Scarlatti; Se tu m's ami, Pergolesi; Stizzoso mio Stizzoso, Pergolesi; Ritorna Vincitor from "Aida," Verdi; Der Doppelganger, Schubert; Wohin, Schubert; Der Leirmann, Schubert; Aufenthalt, Schubert; O nuit, deese du mystere, Piccinni; Dansons la gigue, Poldowski; Panis Angelicus, Franck; The time is long, Mavourneen, and three Irish airs: 8:30 P. M.

Wheelock College Glee Club gives a candlelight service at the Second Church of Boston: 4 P. M.

WEDNESDAY—Camille Girouard, baritone, sings at Recital Hall, Gainsborough at Huntington avenue. The program: Three songs by Handel; Il Neige, Bemberg; Traume, Krah; Song of the Flea, Moussorgsky; This Day is Mine, Ware; Credo, Verdi; Gloucester Fisherman's Prayer, Cunningham; On a Fair Sunday Morning, O'Carolan; Sweet Little Jesus Boy, MacGimsey; Little Jack Horner, Black; Air from "Prince Igor," Borodin, and four popular songs: 8:30 P. M.

Annual Christmas Concert of the Longy School of Music will be held in the School building at 8:30 P. M. A cappella music and carols will be sung by the chorus, under the direction of Paul Matthen.

Friends of Chamber Music, Inc., in its second season of a series of three programs by the Zimbler Sinfonietta will present its opening concert at Jordan Hall. Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Joseph de Pasquale are the soloists. The program:

Symphony for Strings No. 8 ..... William Boyce
Bach violin concerto in E and sonata for unaccompanied violin
Music of Mourning ..... Hindemith
Rispettie Stambotti ..... Malpiero
8:30 P. M.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Soloists, Nancy Marsh, Charlotte Zimmer, Richard McLoon, Dean Bouzianis, John Hancock Hall (Tickets $1.00, tax included): 8:15 P. M.

THURSDAY—The Conservatory Chorus in a special Christmas concert at Jordan Hall. The program: Third Mass in D Minor, Haydn; Carols from Canada, Latin America; Spirituals and carols from the southern Appalachians: 8:15 P. M.

FRIDAY—Piano Recital by Katherine Southworth of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Friday evening, Dec. 15, in Recital Hall at the Conservatory, at 8:15 P. M. There will be selections by Bach, Scarlatti, Haydn, Beethoven, Chopin, Tcherepnine and Debussy. The public is cordially invited to attend; no tickets required.

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
EVENING TELEGRAM
DEC 10 1950

CONCERT MUSIC

NEW YORK (UP) — Charles Munch, conducting Brahm's Fourth symphony with the Boston Symphony orchestra, makes the chords come at you top-sides foremost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms. (RCA Victor; 12-inch LP.)

Josef Krips, in his new recording of the Fourth with the London Symphony, places the center of gravity just below center and the chords come tumbling end-over-end at you, spilling and splashing (London; 12-inch LP.)

That is the essential difference between these rivals—transparency and sublime order by Munch and a surcharged turbulence, which is not unaffecting, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

BULL WHIP MENGELBERG

The former conception is that of Willem Hengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip was his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine — he commands it (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch LP.)

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart. Kleiber's is new, with superlative ffrr quality, whereas Mengelberg's is prewar and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among twentieth century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony. The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece. (Concert Hall; 12-inch LP.)

—Delos Smith.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
DEC 10 1950

In the Realm of Music

MUSICAL CALENDAR

Today

P. M.
8 —[illegible] Program, Kleinhans
2 —[illegible] Glee Club, Klein-[illegible] Hall
8 —[illegible] Program, Westminster

Tomorrow

8:30—Weed Chamber Music, Grosvenor Library

Tuesday

8:00—Christmas Festival, Amherst Central High School
8:30—Ukrainian Male Chorus, Kleinhans Music Hall

Wednesday

8:30—Bach's B Minor Mass, Kleinhans Music Hall

Friday

8:30—Philharmonic Pops, Kleinhans Music Hall

By KENNETH GILL

Making their inaugural U. S. concert tour after a three-year stay in Europe, the Ukrainian Male Chorus, Vatra, will appear at 8:30 in Kleinhans Music Hall on Tuesday evening. Conducted by Dr. Leo Turkevich, previously managing director of the Ukrainian Theatre or Opera at Lwow and director of operatic orchestras at Warsaw, Posnan and other European cities, the chorus will present an evening of Ukrainian religious and folk music.

Dr. Turkevich

Organized from among a group of DP Ukrainians located in and around the Foreloster DP Camp in the French Occupational Zone of Austria in the Fall of 1946, the chorus has given over 900 concerts throughout Austria, Germany and Switzerland and is currently making its first tour of the North American Continent.

Bach B Minor Mass

In commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach, the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, the Buffalo Schola Cantorus and the Buffalo Oratorio Society will perform in the Bach B Minor Mass, this Wednesday evening, in Kleinhans Music Hall.

Soloists for the work will be Panna Genia, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Chester Watson, bass. The performance, which begins at 8 p. m. is the culmination of three years preparation of the choral clubs, under the direction of Cameron Baird.

School Children

Combined choruses numbering 450, an orchestra of 35, and a number of unusual Christmas Carols combine to provide a most attractive program of Christmas music, which will be presented this afternoon by the Music Department of the Buffalo Public Schools in Kleinhans Music Hall at 3 o'clock.

Soloists include Gertrude Lutzi, Ruth Hill, Verner Gibson, James Davis, Joan Derner, Mary Ann Bermel, and Janet Devine. Philip Teibel will play Massenet's Meditation. Pierne's The Children at Bethlehem, Part II, will be featured. The program will be directed by William Breach.

Carol Ceremony

The Chromatic Club holds its annual Christmas program in conjunction with the Candlelight Carol Service at Westminster Church this evening at 8 o'clock. The Westminster Junior and Senior Choirs, directed by Hans Vigeland, perform with the major work of the evening to be Benjamin Britten's Ceremony of Carols. In this work, Martha Gomph will provide the harp accompaniment, while Ruth Vigeland will conduct.

Solo work on the program will be carried by Alene Hornung, soprano. Carl Burgwardt, tenor, and Justine Gladkowski, contralto.

This evening, in the auditorium of the Troop I Post, 432 Franklin St., the American Legion Auxiliary Glee Club will appear in concert. Michael C. Slominski will conduct the women's chorus in works of Millard, Strauss, Humperdinck, Schubert and Dvorak.

Guest soloist will be Janet Becker, pianist, who selects Pinto's Scenes of Childhood, Respine's Nocturne and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 13.

Fredonia at Pops

Friday night's Pop Concert by the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in Kleinhans Music Hall will salute Fredonia State Teachers College. Two students of Fredonia will appear as soloists, with Rita De Marchi, pianist, playing Dohnanyi's Rhapsody in C Major and Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, singing One Fine Day from Puccini's Madame Butterfly and Lover, Come Back to Me from Romberg's New Moon.

In addition, the concert will have Richard Bain, the nation's youngest harmonica concert soloist, playing Guion's Harmonica Player and Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody, No. 1. Bain has starred with Fred Waring and has appeared as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henry Aaron will conduct the orchestra in works of Wagner, Bizet and Anderson.

Concert Notes

Through the courtesy of the Buffalo Musicians Local 43, AFL, the Albright Art Gallery will be able to present the Buffalo Symphonette in a program of chamber music at 8:30 p. m. Saturday, December 30th. Fred Ressel will conduct.

Eugene Istomin, 1943 Levintritt Award winner, is the next soloist for the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in concerts December 17th and 19th. A former student of Horszowski and Serkin, Istomin is well known for his appearances with most of the major orchestras. His work for the Buffalo concert is the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 in G Major.

Eugene Istomin

Conductor William Steinberg's choice for the orchestra is Mozart's Overture to the Marriage of Figaro and Bruckner's Romantic Symphony No. 4. At the concert, Steinberg will receive the Bruckner Medal from the Bruckner Society of America in appreciation of his efforts to create greater interest in the composer's works.

Amherst Symphony

Tuesday evening finds the Amherst Symphony Orchestra performing in a Christmas Festival Concert in the auditorium of the Amherst Central High School at 8:30 p. m. Joseph Wincenc conducts the orchestra in Symphonic Sketches of Chadwick, Five Variants of Dives and Lazarus by Vaughan Williams, Tobani's Around the Christmas Tree, and Bennett's symphonic arrangement of Irving Berlin's White Christmas.

A community chorus, prepared by Allen Giles, will sing a group of carols by Praetorius, Pergolesi and Holst, in addition to joining the orchestra for Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. Carol singing by the entire attendance will close the program.

Oratorio

Handel's Messiah will be given this afternoon in St. John's Lutheran Church, Lancaster. Performing will be the Lancaster Choral Club and the Lancaster Men's Chorus, both under the direction of Marlo Schermerhorn. Soloists for this fifth annual presentation are Clara Kamien, Jane Kindead and Cleta Schermerhorn, sopranos; Elizabeth Baker, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Earl Obermeyer, bass. Squire Haskin is the organist.

Canisius Program

Christmas music will make up the program for the Canisius College Glee Club this afternoon in the Mary Seaton Room of Kleinhans Music Hall. Robert Schulz will direct, while Alfred C. Boyd, Jr., and Robert E. Casey, Jr., are the accompanists. Soloists will be taken by William W. Meissner, tenor, and Robert M. Priore, baritone.

Societies and Studios

Students of the Community Music School will give a recital in the school at 5 o'clock today.

Ruth Koehler Nichols presents voice students in a recital at the Central Park Methodist Church tomorrow night. Marjorie Nichols, pianist, will be the guest soloist.

Tomorrow at 8:30 p. m., Laura Duerstein will direct the Old Masters' Singers in a program presented for the Business & Professional Women's Club. On Monday, December 18th, Miss Duerstein features a Christmas Festival of Song, with the same group, in the Church of Christ, Williamsville. Ruth Johnson is the soprano soloist, while Allen Giles and Jay Eyler are the accompanists.

Grosvenor Recital

In 1944, when Eugene Ormady was touring Australia, he was so greatly impressed with Leonard Hungerford's playing that he urged the young pianist to come to the United States to continue his studies.

After enrolling in the Juilliard Graduate School, Hungerford began working with Carl Friedberg, one of this country's greatest scholars of piano music. This year Hungerford became the first recipient of the newly-established Carl Friedberg Award.

Tomorrow evening, Hungerford will appear in the Grosvenor Chamber Music series and will present a program of lesser known works by Schubert and Brahms.

Hungerford's appearance in this series has been made possible by the membership of the Twentieth Century Club who were entertained this last week by the young pianist in private recital on Wednesday morning.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1950

Musical Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will give the eighth pair of concerts in the Friday and Saturday series in Symphony Hall this week and the second concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theatre next Tuesday.

Mr. Munch will open his Boston program with Haydn's Symphony No. 103, known as the "Drum Roll," and also performed at these concerts [illegible] years. The soloist will be Aldo Ciccolini, the young Italian pianist, who recently made his American debut in New York, following a brilliant career in Europe since the war, and a tour of South America just completed. He will appear with the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto. Mr. Munch will end the program with two works by Maurice Ravel, the less familiar First Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Rapsodie Espagnole.

For his Cambridge program, Mr. Munch will present Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and Schumann's "Spring" Symphony No. 1.

Next week the third concert of the Tuesday evening series will be given in Symphony Hall on December 19. Mr. Munch will present Haydn's Symphony No. 103 and Schumann's First Symphony. As soloist, Ania Dorfman will be heard in Beethoven's First Piano Concerto.

TODAY—The Trapp Family Singers give their only Boston concert of the season in Jordan Hall. The program: an entire group of Christmas carols, a group of folksongs from the Austrian Alps, and a group devoted to instrumental music for recorders, viol da gamboys, and other instruments: 3:30 P. M.

The New England Opera Theatre presents "La Finta Giardiniera" by Mozart entitled "Violanta's Revenge" in the Opera House with Raymond Smolovel, Adele Addison, Mac Morgan and others: 8 P. M.

The Handel and Haydn Society sing G. Handel's "Messiah," oratorio in Symphony Hall 8:30 P. M.

The Lowell Tenor [illegible] presents "An Afternoon of Opera" at [illegible] House, Harvard University: 3 P. M.

Boston College Glee Club holds a joint concert with Emmanuel College Glee Club in Emmanuel College auditorium, 400 the Fens. The program includes "Your Land and My Land," Romberg; Ave Maria, [illegible]; Daughters of [illegible]: 8:30 P. M.

Annual [illegible] Central Congregational Church, Walnut Street, Newtonville: 8 P. M.

The Boston Conservatory Chorus under the direction of Aurelio Gresalin gives a concert at the Conservatory auditorium, Hemenway Street. The program will include "The Chorale Prize Song" from "The Mastersingers" by Richard [illegible].

A Christmas concert will be sung by the massed choirs of the First Baptist Church of Medford, [illegible] voices, piano, cello, soloists, and organ: 7 P. M.

TOMORROW

Boston University Festival of Music in Jordan Hall. The Bradley Quartet and other assisting artists will play. Program: Sextet for Woodwinds and harpsichord; Hill Sonatina for violin and harpsichord; Piston: Two Rhapsodies for Oboe and Piano, Loeffler: String Quartet by Porter. The concert free: 8:30 P. M.

Distinguished pianist, in his fourth of the season at Harvard Memorial Church. The program: Magnificat, Buxtehude; Chromatic study, Theme of Bach, Piston; Toccata in C, Bach; Christmas Carol, Preludes from the "Orgelbuchlein," Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach: 8:30 P. M.

Welles Society of Malden in a free concert at Gay Auditorium, Malden High School. The program: Poet and Peasant Overture, von Suppe; Symphony in E minor, [illegible] movement, Dvorak; Violin [illegible] with orchestra, Mendelssohn; [illegible] March, Coates; Violets Waltz, [illegible]; Variations on a theme of Corelli, Kreisler; Malaguena, de Sarasate; Russian Dances, Bartok, South Pacific [illegible]: 8:15 P. M.

TUESDAY

Christmas Convocation, Boston University, Dr. James R. Houghton, conductor, Trinity Church, Copley Square: Noon.

Chamber music ensemble of the Cambridge Center Adult Education in a free concert. The program: Christmas Concerto, Corelli; Concerto in D Minor, Bach; the chorus will sing such choral familiars, carols and songs from other lands. At 42 Brattle street, Cambridge: 8:30 P. M.

Musical portraits, a unique musical entertainment featuring opera scenes in English acted out on stage with fundamental properties. New England Mutual Hall: 8:30 P. M.

Teresa McGovern, soprano, sings at Jordan Hall. The program: Ah, mio cor, Handel; Se Florindo e fedele, Scarlatti; Se tu m'a ami, Pergolesi; Stizzoso mio Stizzoso, Pergolesi; Ritorna Vincitor from "Aida," Verdi; Der Doppelganger, Schubert; Wohin, Schubert; Der Leirmann, Schubert; Aufenthalt, Schubert; O nuit, deese du mystere, Piccinni; Dansons la gigue, Poldowski; Paris Angelicus, Franck; The time is long, Mavourneen, and three Irish airs: 8:30 P. M.

Wheelock College Glee Club gives a candlelight service at the Second Church of Boston: 4 P. M.

WEDNESDAY—Camille Crouard, baritone, sings at Recital Hall, Gainsborough street at Huntington avenue. The program: Three songs by Handel; Il Neige, Semberg; Traume, Krah; Song of the Flea, Mousorgsky; This Day Is Mine, Ware; Credo, Verdi; Gloucester Fisherman's Prayer, Cunningham; On a Fair Sunday Morning, O'Carolan; Sweet Little Jesus Boy, MacGimsey; Little Jack Horner, Black; Air from "Prince Igor," Borodin, and four popular songs: 8:30 P. M.

Annual Christmas Concert of the Longy School of Music will be held in the School building at 8:30 P. M. A cappella music and carols will be sung by the chorus, under the direction of Paul Matthen.

Friends of Chamber Music, Inc., in its second season of a series of three programs by the Zimbler Sinfonietta will present its opening concert at Jordan Hall. Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Joseph de Pasquale are the soloists. The program:

Symphony for Strings No. 6 ..... William Boyce
Bach violin concerto in E and sonata for unaccompanied violin
Music of Mourning ..... Hindemith
Rispettie Strombotti ..... Malpiero
8:30 P. M.

Bach's Christmas Oratorio. Soloists, Nancy Marsh, Charlotte Zimmer, Richard McLoon, Dean Bouzianis, John Hancock Hall (Tickets $1.00, tax included): 8:15 P. M.

THURSDAY—The Conservatory Chorus in a special Christmas concert at Jordan Hall. The program: Third Mass in C Minor, Haydn; Carols from Canada, Latin America; Spirituals and carols from the southern Appalachians: 8:15 P. M.

FRIDAY—Piano Recital by Katherine Southworth of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music. Friday, Dec. 15, in Recital Hall at the evening, Dec. 15, in Recital Hall at the Conservatory at 8:15 P. M. There will be selections by Handy Scarlatti, Haydn, Beethoven, Chopin, Tcherepnine and Debussy. The public is cordially invited to attend; no tickets required.

This Clipping From
SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
EVENING TELEGRAM
DEC 10 1950

CONCERT MUSIC

NEW YORK (UP) — Charles Munch, conducting Brahm's Fourth symphony with the Boston Symphony orchestra, makes the chords come at you top-sides fore-frost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms (RCA Victor; 12-inch LP.)

Josef Krips, in his new recording of the Fourth with the London Symphony, places the center of gravity just below center and the chords come tumbling end-over-end at you, spilling and splashing (London; 12-inch LP.)

That is the essential difference between these rivals—transparency and sublime order by Munch and a surcharged turbulence, which is not unaffecting, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is it a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants tamasha and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

BULL WHIP MENGELBERG

The former conception is that of Willem Hengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip was his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine — he commands it (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still Beethoven is entirely human in Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch LP.)

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart. Kleiber's is new, with superlative ffrr quality, whereas Mengelberg's is prewar and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among twentieth century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony. The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece. (Concert Hall; 12-inch LP.)

—Delos Smith.

LANSING, MICH
STATE JOURNAL
12/10/50

Dec 10

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's triumphant return to Symphony Hall, which brought him in six concerts before all four subscription audiences, might be called guest-conducting in reverse. Even after a full season of the latters, five weeks in the present one, it is Koussevitzky, not Munch, who is the familiar figure. As familiar as our own daily surroundings is the uniquely sumptuous and resplendent sound he obtains from an orchestra, particularly the one with which he was so long identified. In the main he gave us as well works in which he has been repeatedly heard here: the Second and Fifth Symphonies of Sibelius, Brahms' Third and his perennial First. A little off the beaten track were the former composer's "Pohjola's Daughter," played here only five times and not since 1937, and the latter's Tragic Overture, that went unperformed at the Hall between '33 and '49. Wholly new and arguably not quite worth the amount of time consumed in preparing and performing it, though it has its points, was Barraud's oratorio, "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents." I would still say far better that sincere and expert, if not particularly original or compelling music, than one more performance of the Brahms First, that needs a rest if anything ever did.

* * *

Ordinarily, it is to the guest-conductor that we look for the welcome change from routine, the unfamiliar piece or the fresh approach to the old standby. That, with the exceptions noted, Koussevitzky on the one hand did not and on the other hand could not provide us. Anyway, it was good to see him again, and from a musical point of view his fortnight of guesting was far from profitless. I, for one, would not have missed for a good deal the Brahms Third, set forth so eloquently, and there were at least portions of the other things on which I look back with pleasure. Also, I am glad that Munch is returning, with the stimulating program he has planned for this week.

Whatever its merits, the Barraud was a step in the right direction. And Koussevitzky had good reason for giving us some Sibelius: the somber Finn turned 85 last Friday. True to his word, Mr. Munch neglected him last season and has not declared his intention of playing him in this one. The Latins do not fancy his music, steeped in northern grays and heavy with northern repressions. Charles Martin Loeffler compared it to cod liver oil. And I still recall the beloved Georges Longy's comments on the Fifth Symphony. Said that great oboist to me after the local premiere under Monteux, who didn't like it either: "Zere is nossing zere; no melody, no harmony, no counterpoint, no form, no orchestration: nossing!"

* * *

Even if his appeal is largely limited to certain countries: his own, the Scandinavian ones, England and America, and even to certain people in those countries, Sibelius is not a figure to be lightly brushed aside. No man can be ignored who has created a style and idiom so distinctive as his. The trouble is that that idiom was both his long suit and his greatest liability. Fascinating at first it has not worn well—and I do not speak for myself alone. Critical coolness toward his music is now far commoner than critical enthusiasm for it.

* * *

It is possible that the most ardent supporters of Sibelius have proved his worst enemies. Instead of accepting him as a tone poet with a message that was part racial, part personal, the musical interpreter, like Norway's Grieg and Bohemia's Smetana before him, of a land that had not previously had fitting musical representation, critics like Cecil Gray hailed him, not merely as an important symphonist, but as the greatest since Beethoven.

* * *

It is a sign of a flaw somewhere that Sibelius has not composed anything in 25 years. The great creators who have lived beyond 60 years have gone on creating, giving us in some cases their very best music. It has been reported that Sibelius has an Eighth Symphony worked out in his head but has not committed it to paper. Unlike Strauss, who lived three months past his 85th birthday and died, so to speak, with his pen in hand, Sibelius was perhaps loath to write music that would not enhance his reputation. But at least you respect Strauss for trying; and the music of his last quarter century is by no means wholly negligible.

Koussevitzky's recent homage to Sibelius was accordingly much to the point. But why did he have to play the Second and Fifth, that he had so conspicuously run into the ground hereabouts? He admitted the other day to finding the Seventh the greatest. For him the Fourth, unheard here in a decade, is "experimental," but your true Sibelian holds it highest of all. There is charming matter in the Third, that Koussevitzky brought out after both Muck and Monteux had pronounced it valueless. My own favorite is the less characteristic First. And it may be that the less pretentious suites and tone poems will outlast them all.

* * *

The Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, will make his Boston debut at this week's symphony concerts, playing the Tchaikovsky First Concerto. Mr. Munch will revive Haydn's "Drumroll" Symphony, the Frist Suite from Ravel's "Daphis and Chloe" and his Spanish Rhapsody.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER
DEC 10 1950

AUTHOR OF THE WEEK—John N. Burk, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven". Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston symphony.

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
DEC 10 1950

Last Book

JOHN BURK

Collectors of music biographies will be interested in Mr. Burk's last book. He divides his time between study and studio, and is a combination editor-author for the "Letters of Richard Wagner." He has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
DEC 10 1950

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," whict he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
N. TONAWONDA, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 11 1950

3 Guest Soloists To Appear Friday With Philharmonic

Richard Bain, harmonic concert soloist; Rita De Marchi, pianist; and Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, will be the guest artists performing with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in Kleinhans Music Hall at the Friday evening Pop Concert on December 15th.

The nation's youngest harmonica concert soloist, Richard Bain, is rapidly becoming one of the most popular artists in his field. He has guest-starred repeatedly with Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians over NBC and has gained for himself the distinction of having been the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—an honor shared with only one other harmonica virtuoso.

For her appearance with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, Rita De Marchi, pianist, who is a first year student at the Fredonia State Teachers College, will perform Dohnanyi's Rhapsody in C Major. Miss De Marchi, who is a member of the Intermediate Chromatic Class, gave her own recital in Kleinhans Music Hall when she was 16, and has appeared several times at the Buffalo Museum Twilight Hours.

Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, also is an undergraduate member of Fredonia State Teachers College. She was a member of the Buffalo Oratorio Society and appeared last season in the chorus of the concert version of "Otello" presented by the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

A change in policy on the part of the Philharmonic Management brings Gus Farrell's Orchestra of ten pieces for dancing following the concert. This popular orchestra is expected to attract a large number of newcomers to the Pops.

Henry Aaron, Assistant Conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, has programmed Wagner's March from Tannhauser, excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen Suite." Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and Roses from the South Waltz by Strauss. Concert time is 8:30 p.m.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 12 1950

Some Victor singles (45 rpms) to be added here are Haydn "Toy" symphony, Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony, "American Patrol" and "Knightsbridge" marches from Boston "Pops" under Fiedler. Another Fiedler disk offers two Leroy Anderson bits of humor, "The Syncopated Clock" and "Classical Jukebox."

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 10 1950

Pooled resources may conquer music group's production woes

By IRVING KOLODIN

An idea which has been gathering subsurface momentum in various parts of the country broke water almost simultaneously recently in Hartford and New York. Concerned with the increasing cost of producing music and the threat to the continued existence of both local and national institutions, the Hartford idea of a "Music Council" to bring all of its local activities under a single fund-gathering agency was echoed, by Virgil Thomson in the New York Herald Tribune a day later, with the proposal that the Philharmonic-Symphony, and the Metropolitan Opera put their administrative problems in the care of the Port of New York Authority, which, he said, "seems to have a real knack for public service."

Both trends of thought are related to the procedure followed in such a place as Louisville, Ky., where an Arts Fund, raised by an annual campaign, is divided among various cultural enterprises in proportion to need, public service, etc. Even further they resemble the means by which such English enterprises as Covent Garden, the Sadler's Wells Ballet, and various orchestras (not including the Royal Philharmonic, which is privately supported) are assisted by the Arts Council in Great Britain. The difference is that the American plans provide for fund-raising efforts directed at the public, with all interested parties making their appeals simultaneously. Thus what we have is another version of the Community Chest program or the United Jewish Appeal, which have established beyond question that more money can be raised in one big drive than in a scattering of small ones.

* * *

THE URGENT NEED FOR a fresh approach to the whole problem of maintaining the symphony orchestras and the one permanent opera of this country on something like a going basis is underscored by the precarious condition in which most of those ventures now find themselves. Even the Boston Symphony, with its supposedly rock-ribbed financial structure created under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky, is rapidly exhausting capital funds; the Philadelphia Orchestra would be in straits without municipal participation, and others from coast to coast have to steer a narrow course to elude financial shoals. Hope of the tax relief which would give a whiff of oxygen to the moribund prospects of the organizations seems dimmer now than previously, unless there is a revision of attitude in Washington on a subject far from most legislative minds.

* * *

WHAT SEEMS TO BE REQUIRED is an interior Marshall Plan to preserve for our own citizens what we are so concerned about overseas. In a way we are robbing our own Pauls to benefit the Pierres of France, which is well enough while we can afford it. The irony would be for tax monies which could be well used by an American orchestra or the Metropolitan to find their way, directly or indirectly, to the support of Covent Garden or the Vienna Opera. Such an illusion was made, half humorously a year ago by Edward Johnson at a ceremonial lunch for Sadler's Wells Ballet people; but it becomes less and less humorous as time passes and the conditions at home harden.

This Clipping From SEVENTEEN
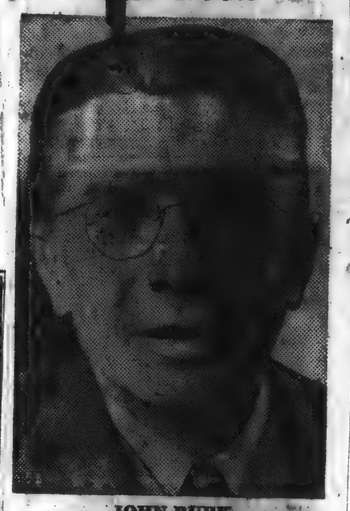
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC - 195

Peter and the Wolf by Prokofieff is a folk tale with music, narrator and a beguiling gaiety. Every youngster we ever watched listen to it was enchanted. So were the grown-ups. RCA Victor has recorded it with Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (at Tanglewood last summer), and had the happy inspiration to present Eleanor Roosevelt as the narrator. Her warmth and greatness more than compensate for any dramatic shortcomings.

[191]

LANSING, MICH
STATE JOURNAL
12/10/50

Last Book



JOHN BURK

Collectors of music biographies will be interested in Mr. Burk's last book. He divides his time between study and studio, and is a combination editor-author for the "Letters of Richard Wagner." He has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
DEC 1950

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," whict he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
N. TONAWONDA, N. Y.
NEWS
DEC 1950

3 Guest Soloists To Appear Friday With Philharmonic

Richard Bain, harmonic concert soloist; Rita De Marchi, pianist; and Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, will be the guest artists performing with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in Kleinhans Music Hall at the Friday evening Pop Concert on December 15th.

The nation's youngest harmonica concert soloist, Richard Bain, is rapidly becoming one of the most popular artists in his field. He has guest-starred repeatedly with Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians over NBC and has gained for himself the distinction of having been the guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—an honor shared with only one other harmonica virtuoso.

For her appearance with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, Rita De Marchi, pianist, who is a first year student at the Fredonia State Teachers College, will perform Dohnanyi's Rhapsody in C Major. Miss De Marchi, who is a member of the Intermediate Chromatic Club, gave her own recital in Kleinhans Music Hall when she was 16, and has appeared several times at the Buffalo Museum Twilight Hours.

Rebecca Darmanjian, soprano, also is an undergraduate member of Fredonia State Teachers College. She was a member of the Buffalo Oratorio Society and appeared last season in the chorus of the concert version of "Otello" presented by the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

A change in policy on the part of the Philharmonic Management brings Gus Farrell's Orchestra of ten pieces for dancing following the concert. This popular orchestra is expected to attract a large number of newcomers to the Pops.

Henry Aaron, Assistant Conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, has programmed Wagner's March from Tannhauser, excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen Suite," Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and Roses from the South Waltz by Strauss. Concert time is 8:30 p.m.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's triumphant return to Symphony Hall, which brought him in six concerts before all four subscription audiences, might be called guest-conducting in reverse. Even after a full season of the latters, five weeks in the present one, it is Koussevitzky, not Munch, who is the familiar figure. As familiar as our own daily surroundings is the uniquely sumptuous and resplendent sound he obtains from an orchestra, particularly the one with which he was so long identified. In the main he gave us as well works in which he has been repeatedly heard here: the Second and Fifth Symphonies of Sibelius, Brahms' Third and his perennial First. A little off the beaten track were the former composer's "Pohjola's Daughter," played here only five times and not since 1937, and the latter's Tragic Overture, that went unperformed at the Hall between '33 and '49. Wholly new and arguably not quite worth the amount of time consumed in preparing and performing it, though it has its points, was Barraud's oratorio, "The Mystery of the Holy Innocents." I would still say far better that sincere and expert, if not particularly original or compelling music, than one more performance of the Brahms First, that needs a rest if anything ever did.

* * *

Ordinarily, it is to the guest-conductor that we look for the welcome change from routine, the unfamiliar piece or the fresh approach to the old standby. That, with the exceptions noted, Koussevitzky on the one hand did not and on the other hand could not provide us. Anyway, it was good to see him again, and from a musical point of view his fortnight of guesting was far from profitless. I, for one, would not have missed for a good deal the Brahms Third, set forth so eloquently, and there were at least portions of the other things on which I look back with pleasure. Also, I am glad that Munch is returning, with the stimulating program he has planned for this week.

Whatever its merits, the Barraud was a step in the right direction. And Koussevitzky had good reason for giving us some Sibelius: the somber Finn turned 85 last Friday. True to his word, Mr. Munch neglected him last season and has not declared his intention of playing him in this one. The Latins do not fancy his music, steeped in northern grays and heavy with northern repressions. Charles Martin Loeffler compared it to cod liver oil. And I still recall the beloved Georges Longy's comments on the Fifth Symphony. Said that great oboist to me after the local premiere under Monteux, who didn't like it either: "Zere is nossing zere; no melody, no harmony, no counterpoint, no form, no orchestration: nossing!"

* * *

Even if his appeal is largely limited to certain countries: his own, the Scandinavian ones, England and America, and even to certain people in those countries, Sibelius is not a figure to be lightly brushed aside. No man can be ignored who has created a style and idiom so distinctive as his. The trouble is that that idiom was both his long suit and his greatest liability. Fascinating at first it has not worn well—and I do not speak for myself alone. Critical coolness toward his music is now far commoner than critical enthusiasm for it.

* * *

It is possible that the most ardent supporters of Sibelius have proved his worst enemies. Instead of accepting him as a tone poet with a message that was part racial, part personal; the musical interpreter, like Norway's Grieg and Bohemia's Smetana before him, of a land that had not previously had fitting musical representation, critics like Cecil Gray hailed him, not merely as an important symphonist, but as the greatest since Beethoven.

* * *

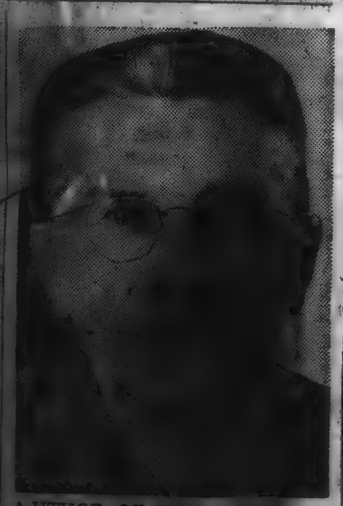
It is a sign of a flaw somewhere that Sibelius has not composed anything in 25 years. The great creators who have lived beyond 60 years have gone on creating, giving us in some cases their very best music. It has been reported that Sibelius has an Eighth Symphony worked out in his head but has not committed it to paper. Unlike Strauss, who lived three months past his 85th birthday and died, so to speak, with his pen in hand, Sibelius was perhaps loath to write music that would not enhance his reputation. But at least you respect Strauss for trying; and the music of his last quarter century is by no means wholly negligible.

Koussevitzky's recent homage to Sibelius was accordingly much to the point. But why did he have to play the Second and Fifth, that he had so conspicuously run into the ground hereabouts? He admitted the other day to finding the Seventh the greatest. For him the Fourth, unheard here in a decade, is "experimental," but your true Sibelian holds it highest of all. There is charming matter in the Third, that Koussevitzky brought out after both Muck and Monteux had pronounced it valueless. My own favorite is the less characteristic First. And it may be that the less pretentious suites and tone poems will outlast them all.

* * *

The Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, will make his Boston debut at this week's symphony concerts, playing the Tchaikovsky First Concerto. Mr. Munch will revive Haydn's "Drumroll" Symphony, the Frist Suite from Ravel's "Daphis and Chloe" and his Spanish Rhapsody.

This Clipping From
CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER
DEC 10 1950



AUTHOR OF THE WEEK—John N. Burk, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven". Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston symphony.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 1950

Some Victor singles (45 rpms) to be added here are Haydn "Toy" symphony, Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony, "American Patrol" and "Knightsbridge" marches from Boston "Pops" under Fiedler. Another Fiedler disk offers two Leroy Anderson bits of humor, "The Syncopated Clock" and "Classical Juke box."

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 1950

Pooled resources may conquer music group's production woes

By IRVING KOLODIN

An idea which has been gathering subsurface momentum in various parts of the country broke water almost simultaneously recently in Hartford and New York. Concerned with the increasing cost of producing music and the threat to the continued existence of both local and national institutions, the Hartford idea of a "Music Council" to bring all of its local activities under a single fund-gathering agency was echoed, by Virgil Thomson in the New York Herald Tribune a day later, with the proposal that the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Metropolitan Opera put their administrative problems in the care of the Port of New York Authority, which, he said, "seems to have a real knack for public service."

Both trends of thought are related to the procedure followed in such a place as Louisville, Ky., where an Arts Fund, raised by an annual campaign, is divided among various cultural enterprises in proportion to need, public service, etc. Even further they resemble the means by which such English enterprises as Covent Garden, the Sadler's Wells Ballet, and various orchestras (not including the Royal Philharmonic, which is privately supported) are assisted by the Arts Council in Great Britain. The difference is that the American plans provide for fund-raising efforts directed at the public, with all interested parties making their appeals simultaneously. Thus what we have is another version of the Community Chest program or the United Jewish Appeal, which have established beyond question that more money can be raised in one big drive than in a scattering of small ones.

THE URGENT NEED FOR a fresh approach to the whole problem of maintaining the symphony orchestras and the one permanent opera of this country on something like a going basis is underscored by the precarious condition in which most of those ventures now find themselves. Even the Boston Symphony, with its supposedly rock-ribbed financial structure created under the guidance of Serge Koussevitzky, is rapidly exhausting capital funds; the Philadelphia Orchestra would be in straits without municipal participation, and others from coast to coast have to steer a narrow course to elude financial shoals. Hope of the tax relief which would give a whiff of oxygen to the moribund prospects of the organizations seems dimmer now than previously, unless there is a revision of attitude in Washington on a subject far from most legislative minds.

* * *

WHAT SEEMS TO BE REQUIRED is an interior Marshall Plan to preserve for our own citizens what we are so concerned about overseas. In a way we are robbing our own Pauls to benefit the Pierres of France, which is well enough while we can afford it. The irony would be for tax monies which could be well used by an American orchestra or the Metropolitan to find their way, directly or indirectly, to the support of Covent Garden or the Vienna Opera. Such an illusion was made, half humorously a year ago by Edward Johnson at a ceremonial lunch for Sadler's Wells Ballet people; but it becomes less and less humorous as time passes and the conditions at home harden.

This Clipping From SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC - 1950

Peter and the Wolf by Prokofieff is a folk tale with music, narrator and a beguiling gaiety. Every youngster we ever watched listen to it was enchanted. So were the grown-ups. RCA Victor has recorded it with Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (at Tanglewood last summer), and had the happy inspiration to present Eleanor Roosevelt as the narrator. Her warmth and greatness more than compensate for any dramatic shortcomings.

[191]

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 11 1950

AS IT SOUNDS

To Bruno Ussher

Platter Talk: From New York City comes word that Tommy Dorsey's band will "take a vacation" as of today. When the bandleader again lifts his baton for recordings fans may discover changes. Reason: Different personnel. Jerry Gray orchestra enthusiasts are waiting for a movie short with Beryl Davis making a comeback as vocalist. Frank DeVol's new band is said to have taken a leaf out of Ken Stanton's progressive jazz primer.

At the Ken: Collectors owning the Werner Janssen Symphony recording of the D-minor Toccata and Fugue will be interested in "seeing it" currently at the Ken Theater, where the music is supplemented by Utah mountain scenes. Combination of sound and sight results in some striking effects. Apropos film-music, there are some charming background music episodes in the feature-film, "The Well Digger's Daughter," an all-time classic of droll humor, featuring Raimu and Fernandel.

A Lucky Day: It is not often that one session of testing new recordings for this column brings four which I put unhesitatingly in the "must" category. Of these, two bear the Capitol stamp: German Lieder" (Schubert-Brahms-Wolf). Karl Schmitt-Walter, baritone. Ferdinand Leitner, pianist. To be specific, this is a Capitol-Telefunken, 12-inch LP, some of the vocally and poetically best singing fom the Vaterland. Except for one or two minor wilful dynamic changes, this is model lieder-singing-playing. Excellent recording.

On a 10-inch capitol LP: Schoenberg's "Varklaerte Nacht" (Radiant Night). Exquisite and intensive playing and so recorded by the Hollywood String Quartet (Felix Slatkin, Paul Shure, Paul Robyn, Eleanor Aller, augmented by Alvin Dinkin, viola, Kurt Reher, cello.) Recording is supervised by the composer who also supplied program notes with musical examples.

The Next Must: This is the Boston Symphony's new Schubert Symphony No. 2 in B-flat major, played with a firm lightness, lyric song and humor that does great honor to conductor Charles Muench. I admire the fine precision of his Brahms (No. 4 in E-minor) but I think it is not emotionally expansive but on the French side, where "esprit" takes the place of the heart. Here in the Schubert, is Schubert of Vienna, precise, never Frenchified. (Very good disk sound of 10-inch LP.)

Fourth (And Not Least) "Must": Rossini's "Cenerentola" or "Cinderella," made in Rome by Cetra-Soria and here is Rossini, the master of grand-opera comique as one wants him. This is an abbreviated edition, but as "La Cenerentola" is not a major opus, although an always entertaining one, two 12-inch disk LP, vividly recorded are enough of music that resembles moods and manner of "The Barber of Seville." Mario Rossi is the conductor. (Fine pressing, story synopsis and Italian-English texts.) Rossi needs no recommendation for those familiar with the Cetra-Soria "Falstaff." Outstanding artists in the cast are Cesare Valletti, tenor, Giulietta Simionata in the tile-role and Saturno Meletti, baritone.

A Note on Brahms: The Trio Opus 40 by Johannes Brahms (piano, violin and French horn in E-flat) is something for chamber music specialists. Mercury has isued a 10-inch LP played by Annie d'Arco, George Ales and Jean Devemy. They are fine players but, in comparison, the Victor recording is considerably superior. To make the French horn blend with the two other instruments is a great task even for a performance without microphone, a device that makes any unbalance noticeable. The Victor, I believe, is made in England, because it includes Aubrey Brain, one of the best French horn players of the day. (Serkin at the piano, Busch as violinist.)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 1 1950

Programs This Week At Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will give the eighth pair of concerts in the Friday and Saturday series in Symphony Hall this week and the second concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater tomorrow.

Mr. Munch will open his Boston program with Haydn's Symphony No. 103, known as the "Drum Roll," and not performed at these concerts for many years. The soloist will be Aldo Ciccolini, the young Italian pianist, who recently made his American debut in New York, following a brilliant career in Europe since the war, and a tour of South America. He will appear with the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto. Mr. Munch will end the program with two works by Maurice Ravel, the less familiar First Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Rapsodie Espagnole.

For his Cambridge program, Mr. Munch will present Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and Schumann's "Spring" Symphony No. 1.

Next week the third concert of the Tuesday evening series will be given in Symphony Hall on Dec. 19. Mr. Munch will present Haydn's Symphony No. 103 and Schumann's First Symphony. As soloist, Ania Dorfman will be heard in Beethoven's First Piano Concerto.

This Clipping From TIFFIN, OHIO
ADVERTISER-TRIBUNE
DEC 11 1950

RECORD REVIEW

Concert Music

NEW YORK — Charles Munch, who is conducting Brahms Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the chords come at you top-sides foremost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms (RCA Victor; 12-inch LP.)

Josef Krips, in his new recording of the Fourth with the London Symphony, places the center of gravity just below center and the chords come tumbling end-over-end at you, spilling and splashing (London; 12-inch LP.)

That is the essential difference between these rivals — transparency and sublime order by Munch and a supercharged turbulence, which is not unaffecting, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

Bull Whip Mengelberg

The former conception is that of Willem Mengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth Symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip was his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine—he commands it (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German, maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amstendam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch LP.)

The two recordings are at least 15 years apart. Kleiber's is done with superlative quality, whereas Mengelberg's is pre-war and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among 20th century conductors.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 1 1950

Sailboat Fan Heads Boston Chamber

HAVE YOU HEARD

By Bill Schofield

That murmuring undertone you've been hearing from the direction of Federal street recently is actually the sound of the membership list of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, rapidly expanding in all directions.

And in the chamber's executive offices, they'll tell you the man most responsible for this growth is Don H. Waterhouse, the Beacon Hill sailing boat enthusiast. They've just made him chairman of the membership committee in recognition of the fact that he has produced somethin like 800 new members since the days of last spring's Boston Jubilee.

That brings the total membership up to 3000, the highest it's been in 21 years. And never in the organization's history have the applications arrived with the speed and volume they're hitting today.

A glance at the record of the Waterhouse business life makes you wonder how he gets time to do all this, for in the life insurance field he's one of the country's top salesmen. In the company for which he works, he is a life member of a group known as National Associates—which is another way of saying that he has produced enough business to rank with the organization's 25 top men for three consecutive years. In a much broader field, he is a member of the Million Dollar Round Table of the National Association of life Underwriters and is shooting for a life membership — which means qualifying three years in a row or four years out of five. For the past 10 years, he has concentrated on estate planning.

WATERHOUSE IS a home-grown product of Greater Boston, having originally been listed as a vital statistic in Dedham on Sept. 3, 1908.

He finished the Brookline public schools in 1926. For his first fulltime job, he went to work for Harry J. Blake, who is currently occupying the president's chair at the chamber.

"My intention was to learn the wool business," Waterhouse says today, "but fortunately for Harry and the industry as a whole, I decided I'd be better off as a life insurance salesman."

In view of his record for 24 years, the life insurance business has no complaints to offer.

When it came time for confetti, Waterhouse married Carlotta Zerrahn of Boston, whose great grandfather Carl Zerrahn was a long-time director of the Handel & Hayden Society and was also instrumental with Henry L. Higginson in the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Today there is an 11-year-old daughter, Abigail, who attends the Brimmer & May School.

SALT WATER SAILING was always an enthusiasm with Waterhouse, particularly during a stretch of years when he lived in Marblehead. In 1947 he changed his residence to Boston and now gets his mail at 14 Pinckney street but keeps a summer place at Marblehead and a membership in the Corinthian Yacht Club.

Ask him for biographical notes, and inevitably he comes up with sea talk. For instance:

"I lost a small sailing sloop last September durihg the hurricane he adds.

at Marblehead and I recently purchased a Swedish boat—a double-ended mahogany sloop. It was shipped over here three months ago.

"The interesting thing about the boat is the rig, which is patented by a Dr. Lungstroen. The mast is unsupported by any stays and is set in ball bearings and rotated by a sheet. In going before the wind, the sail will extend on either side of the mast, port or starboard, hence a spinnaker.

"THERE IS NO BOOM, the sail being loose-footed. When you tack the boat, you just swing the sail around the mast. You do the same thing in jibing."

Getting him back to the business of chamber membership, he says he's out to reach Harry Blake's objective of listing 3500 names on the roster.

"Also, I hope to make it 'fashionable' to belong to the Boston Chamber of Commerce," he adds.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

★ ★ ★

MOZART: "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and HAYDN: Symphony No. 92 (Oxford) in G; played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. (RCA Victor, one 33⅓ RPM.)

Koussevitzky misses the point several times in both Mozart and Haydn in that passages that need a flexible grace are flooded with tonal brilliance. The Minuet of the "Nachtmusik" is choppy; the finale too fast. The orchestra has great beauty of tone as usual and the recording is up to Victor's high standards.

★ ★ ★

SONGS AT CHRISTMASTIDE: Sung by the Ilford Girls' Choir, conducted by Eric Brown. (London, one 12-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

A good recording for the Christmas season. Most of the old favorites—"Silent Night," "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," etc.—are included along with others not heard so often. The English girls have exactly the right, unsensual vocal coloring for devotional music. Some of the arrangements, however, are too fancy. An excellent reproduction.

★ ★ ★

BACH: PRADES FESTIVAL SERIES No. 5, Sonata No. 1 in G and Sonata No. 2 in D, for 'Cello and Piano; played by Pablo Casals and Paul Baumgartner, pianist. (Columbia, one 33⅓ RPM.)

Last summer's festival at Prades, a village in the French Pyrenees where Pablo Casals now lives, was both a tribute to the character and genius of Casals and a Bach celebration. Columbia Records has issued a set of recordings covering the whole program and they will be reviewed as a whole in this column at a later date. The two sonatas listed above reveal clearly enough that Casals has lost nothing of his deep musical insight and little or nothing of his instrumental virtuosity as a result of his retirement from the platform. Emphasis and tonal gradations within the phrase and a fine purity of line are the same as ever.

★ ★ ★

SAINT-SAENS: "Carnival of the Animals," with new verses by Ogden Nash spoken by Noel Coward, and RAVEL: "Mother Goose Suite"; played by Andre Kostelanetz and his Orchestra; Leonid Hambro and Jascha Zayde, pianists. (Columbia, one 33⅓ RPM.)

Columbia has made a feature production of the Saint-Saens opus by enlisting the services of Messrs. Nash and Coward in bringing it up to date. The orchestra plays it expertly and Noel Coward points up the dry wit of Nash's verses with a succinct, dead-pan delivery. An excellent recording.

★ ★ ★

BRAHMS: Trio in E Flat for Piano, Violin and French Horn, played respectively by Annie d'Arco, George Ales and Jean Devemy. (Mercury, one 10-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

The old German waldhorn is used in this recording and though it is never in tune and has a rough, shaky sound, one gets used to it. The performance of this lyrical work as a whole is not first-rank playing except on the part of the pianist but it agreeable by virtue of its emotional honesty.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 12 1950

Danton Walker

BROADWAY

NEW YORK, Dec. 12—Major music publishers are dusting off the songs that were popular in World War II for possible revival.

Official statistics indicate that despite a 20,000,000 increase in the country's population since 1940, there are 2,300,000 fewer teen-agers now than there were 10 years ago, and it is this age bracket that produces a sizable percentage of the combat troops in time of war.

Latest Washington laugh is over the pink covers for the State Department's phone directories.

A Florida resort hotel's prospectus for the season promises a crew of "Wake-up Girls" to arouse the guests, in lieu of the usual morning telephone call.

The Lombardy, a Miami Beach hotel, opening late this month, offers $100-a-day housekeeping apartments with a private grocery store for guests.

Dorothea Wilcken, local publicist, discovers there is a citizen in Chicago named Christmas Hurts.

Mrs. Roosevelt's rendition of "Peter and the Wolf" reading, to the accompaniment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of RCA-Victor's Christmas come-ons.

"Castor Oil Shortage Looms" is the good Yuletide news for the kids that the New York Journal of Commerce brings.

Nite clubs and bars stocking up on hard liquor because of an anticipated shortage as well as a sharp price rise after Jan. 1.

"Alice in Wonderland" will be the pre-Christmas special of the Ford Theater TV show Dec. 18, with costumes and sets patterned after the original Tenniel drawings (and no tampering with Carroll's immortal lines by studio script writers).

More than a hundred kids will take part in "Babes in Toyland," NBC's Christmas Day TV offering.

The David Marcus Theater, named for the World War II hero, will be dedicated Dec. 14 at 8:30 P. M. The theater, part of the Skouras chain, is located at Jerome avenue near Gunhill road, Bronx.

The New York City Ballet, which heaped new honors on itself at its City Center run, will be back in February for a month before heading for a grand tour of Europe.

Edna Best will be flanked by a company of 35 male actors in "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," which occupies City Center starting Dec. 27.

Richard Whorf, brother of one of New England's most famous painters, and a talented amateur in his own right, will hold a one-man show at the New Gallery this spring.

Sid Skolsky, who wrote and launched "The Jolson Story," has spent a year gathering material on Eddie Cantor's history, for filming next year.

Harpo Marx and operatic soprano Christina Carroll, who have been touring the South in concerts, will record their programs for Remington Records.

Gene Autry will give England a gander at a real rodeo show soon.

Django Rheinhart, famed jazz guitarist and leader of the Hot Club of France, very ill in Paris.

EDNA BEST

Two of 1950's biggest international royalty gatherers are poets —T. S. Eliot and Christopher Fry —according to Dick Maney, who should know.

Frank Fay lost a pile of his "Harvey" earnings on a West Coast musical which he produced and starred in.

Next month the Brooklyn Parkway Theater will offer a Yiddish version of "Death of a Salesman," featuring Joseph Buloff (best-remembered from "Oklahoma!")

Dwight Taylor, co-author of the book for "Out of This World," won't be here for the Dec. 21 opening. He'll be out in California where a fourth addition to the family is expected any day.

Friends are asking what goes with the Frank Kingdons since Marcella and the baby departed for a long visit to England.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 13 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist, who will appear at the "open rehearsal" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday, and at the Friday and Saturday concerts.

TORONTO, CANADA
SATURDAY NIGHT
DEC 12 1950

LA VALSE—Ravel. Boston Symphony, Munch conducting, perform this bland choreographic poem for orchestra with suitable blandness. Recording: excellent. (Victor—45—49-1213-A.)

SONATA NO. 4 IN F SHARP—Scriabin. A crisp, scintillating performance by brilliant pianist William Schatkamet. Recording catches all facets of the thoughtful interpretation. (Victor—45—49-0700-A.)

SYMPHONY NO. 100 IN G-MAJOR. SYMPHONY NO. 94 IN G-MAJOR—Hadyn. Hugo Rignold conducts the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra through a crisp, spirited version of the "Military"; Sir Malcolm Sargent conducts the same orchestra in a tenderly precise treatment of the delightful "Surprise." Recording: excellent. (Columbia—33—ML4276)

BACH — A GERMAN ORGAN MASS (Third Part of the Klavierubung). Fritz Heitman at the Charlottenburg Palace Organ presents a collector's item. Transfer from the Telefunken matrices have brought out the bass response missing in their pressings. For specialists, a must. The organ is a superb Baroque and is given full dimensions. Capitol—33—P8029)

CONCERTO GROSSO IN G-MINOR—Vivaldi. CONCERTO GROSSO IN F-MINOR —Scarlatti. In the Vivaldi, Antonio Guarnieri conducts the Orchestra of the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino to produce a rather gummy version of a sprightly work. Edmund Weyns and the Wiesbaden Collegium Musicum, repressed from German Telefunken, give an expert performance of a not very interesting Scarlatti work. Recording: good. (Capitol—33—L8035)

SYMPHONY NO. 4 IN F-MINOR—Tchaikovsky. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give us a fine new version of the work, exceeding the earlier Kleiber, Sargent, Ormandy versions. Unfortunately a gratuitous cut of the scherzo mars an unreserved recommendation. Recording: excellent. (Victor—33—LM1008)

SYMPHONY NO. 4 IN A, OPUS 90 ("Italian") — Mendelssohn. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] score for LP. Fine, but don't relinquish the version by the conductor and the orchestra made in the mid-thirties for LP advances. Has the sweet brilliance of the early version but the enthusiasm seems fled. Recording: good. (Victor — 33 — LM20)

This Clipping From
UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER-DISPATCH
DEC 13 1950

FLORENCE KOPLEFF

3 Soloists For Oratorio

Three out-of-town vocalists will be soloists in the presentation of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" which will be given at 4 p. m. Sunday by the Utica Oratorio Society in the Hamilton College gymnasium. Admission is free.

They are Florence Kopleff, contralto; William Moonan, tenor, and Richard Griffith, bass. Mrs. Maurice Lane, Utica, president of the society, will be the soprano soloist.

With Prof. Berrian R. Shute conducting, the oratorio will be sung by a chorus of 140 voices, consisting of the society and the Hamilton College Choir.

Miss Kopleff was born in New York and studied under Paul Althouse. For two seasons she was a scholarship pupil at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass. She has become a leading soloist with the famed Robert Shaw Chorale.

She has appeared at the Piedmont Festival at Winston-Salem, N. C., and in Carnegie Hall presentations of Vaughn Williams' "Magnificat" and Vivaldi's "Gloria Mass." Recently she was soloist in the "St. John Passion" with the Mendelssohn Choir in Pittsburgh.

William Moonan, a native of Boonville, is one of the soloists with the Shaw Collegiate Chorale.

Richard Griffith is a Utican who is a graduate of Hamilton College with the class of 1940.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
DEC 13 1950

Music Lovers To Be Given Unusual Treat

NEWARK — Local music lovers are in for a "big surprise" when the Israel Philharmonic Orcestra from the new Israeli capital of Tel-Aviv visits Newark during its first American tour next month. This is the well-considered opinion of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who last week conducted that orchestra in an all-Brahms program at the Mosque Theater, Newark.

Speaking of the standard of musicianship achieved by the Israeli orchestra since its formation as a national orchestra by Bronislaw Huberman in 1936, Dr. Koussevitzky, who recently returned to this country after conducting it in 14 concerts, said he believed American audiences will be delighted with its performance.

"Before I left for Israel," he said, "I was aware that the American public does not know what to expect of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. And this is where I think they are going to be surprised.

"I am sure that when they hear it they will forget that it comes from a small new country. They will find not only a great orchestra, but one which combines the greatest enthusiasm with a profound love and devotion to the art of music."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 14 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist now making his first American tour, will appear this week with the Boston Symphony at tonight's "open rehearsal" and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 14 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist now making his first American tour, will appear this week with the Boston Symphony at tonight's "open rehearsal" and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NEW 2-YEAR PACT FOR MITROPOULOS

Conductor of the Philharmonic Is Named Musical Director for Next Two Seasons

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who is halfway through his first season as regular conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed musical director for two more years. The announcement was made yesterday following a meeting of the board of directors at the orchestra's offices on Wednesday.

Mr. Mitropoulos became regular conductor of the Philharmonic last spring and conducted its concerts this fall. He is now in Cleveland for four guest appearances with the Cleveland Symphony and will conduct the San Francisco Symphony eight times in January and the Buffalo Philharmonic twice in February. He will return here on March 1.

Fourteen years ago the Greek-born conductor came to this country for a guest appearance with the Boston Symphony and made an immediate impression. The next year he became musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony, a position he held until last season.

He came to the Philharmonic first as guest conductor for four weeks in 1940, and appeared at the orchestra's centennial concerts during the next two seasons. In 1947 he conducted part of the Philharmonic's spring tour; in 1947-48 he led the orchestra for four weeks, in 1948-49 for eight and last season he shared the post of principal conductor with Leopold Stokowski.

[193]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 12 1950

Danton Walker

BROADWAY

NEW YORK, Dec. 12—Major music publishers are dusting off the songs that were popular in World War II for possible revival.

Official statistics indicate that despite a 20,000,000 increase in the country's population since 1940, there are 2,200,000 fewer teen-agers now than there were 10 years ago, and it is this age bracket that produces a sizable percentage of the combat troops in time of war.

Latest Washington laugh is over the pink covers for the State Department's phone directories.

A Florida resort hotel's prospectus for the season promises a crew of "Wake-up Girls" to arouse the guests, in lieu of the usual morning telephone call.

The Lombardy, a Miami Beach hotel, opening late this month, offers $100-a-day housekeeping apartments with a private grocery store for guests.

Dorothea Wilcken, local publicist, discovers there is a citizen in Chicago named Christmas Hurts.

Mrs. Roosevelt's rendition of "Peter and the Wolf" reading, to the accompaniment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of RCA-Victor's Christmas come-ons.

"Castor Oil Shortage Looms" is the good Yuletide news for the kids that the New York Journal of Commerce brings.

Nite clubs and bars stocking up on hard liquor because of an anticipated shortage as well as a sharp price rise after Jan. 1.

"Alice in Wonderland" will be the pre-Christmas special of the Ford Theater TV show Dec. 16 with costumes and sets patterned after the original Tenniel drawings (and no tampering with Carroll's immortal lines by studio script writers).

More than a hundred kids will take part in "Babes in Toyland," NBC's Christmas Day TV offering.

The David Marcus Theater, named for the World War II hero, will be dedicated Dec. 14 at 8:30 P. M. The theater, part of the Skouras chain, is located at Jerome avenue near Gunhill road, Bronx.

The New York City Ballet, which heaped new honors on itself at its City Center run, will be back in February for a month before heading for a grand tour of Europe.

Edna Best will be flanked by a company of 35 male actors in "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," which occupies City Center starting Dec. 27.

Richard Whorf, brother of one of New England's most famous painters, and a talented amateur in his own right, will hold a one-man show at the New Gallery this spring.

Sid Skolsky, who wrote and launched "The Jolson Story," has spent a year gathering material on Eddie Cantor's history, for filming next year.

Harpo Marx and operatic soprano Christina Carroll, who have been touring the South in concerts, will record their programs for Remington Records.

Gene Autry will give England a gander at a real rodeo show soon.

Django Rheinhart, famed jazz

EDNA BEST

guitarist and leader of the Hot Club of France, very ill in Paris.

Two of 1950's biggest international royalty gatherers are poets—T. S. Eliot and Christopher Fry—according to Dick Maney, who should know.

Frank Fay lost a pile of his "Harvey" earnings on a West Coast musical which he produced and starred in.

Next month the Brooklyn Parkway Theater will offer a Yiddish version of "Death of a Salesman," featuring Joseph Buloff (best-remembered for "Oklahoma!").

Dwight Taylor, co-author of the book for "Out of This World," won't be here for the Dec. 21 opening. He'll be out in California where a fourth addition to the family is expected any day.

Friends are asking what goes with the Frank Kingdons since Marcella and the baby departed for a long visit to England.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 13 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist, who will appear at the "open rehearsal" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday, and of the Friday and Saturday concerts.

TORONTO, CANADA
SATURDAY NIGHT
DEC 16 1950

This Clipping From
UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER-DISPATCH
DEC 13 1950

FLORENCE KOPLEFF

3 Soloists For Oratorio

Three out-of-town vocalists will be soloists in the presentation of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" which will be given at 4 p. m. Sunday by the Utica Oratorio Society in the Hamilton College gymnasium. Admission is free.

They are Florence Kopleff, contralto; William Moonan, tenor, and Richard Griffith, bass. Mrs. Maurice Lane, Utica, president of the society, will be the soprano soloist.

With Prof. Berrian R. Shute conducting, the oratorio will be sung by a chorus of 140 voices, consisting of the society and the Hamilton College Choir.

Miss Kopleff was born in New York and studied under Paul Althouse. For two seasons she was a scholarship pupil at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass. She has become a leading soloist with the famed Robert Shaw Chorale.

She has appeared at the Piedmont Festival at Winston-Salem, N. C., and in Carnegie Hall presentations of Vaughn Williams' "Magnificat" and Vivaldi's "Gloria Mass." Recently she was soloist in the "St. John Passion" with the Mendelssohn Choir in Pittsburgh.

William Moonan, a native of Boonville, is one of the soloists with the Shaw Collegiate Chorale.

Richard Griffith is a Utican who is a graduate of Hamilton College with the class of 1940.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
DEC 13 1950

Music Lovers To Be Given Unusual Treat

NEWARK — Local music lovers are in for a "big surprise" when the Israel Philharmonic Orcestra from the new Israeli capital of Tel-Aviv visits Newark during its first American tour next month. This is the well-considered opinion of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who last week conducted that orchestra in an all-Brahms program at the Mosque Theater, Newark.

Speaking of the standard of musicianship achieved by the Israeli orchestra since its formation as a national orchestra by Bronislaw Huberman in 1936, Dr. Koussevitsky, who recently returned to this country after conducting it in 14 concerts, said he believed American audiences will be delighted with its performance.

"Before I left for Israel," he said, "I was aware that the American public does not know what to expect of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. And this is where I think they are going to be surprised.

"I am sure that when they hear it they will forget that it comes from a small new country. They will find not only a great orchestra, but one which combines the greatest enthusiasm with a profound love and devotion to the art of music."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 14 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist now making his first American tour, will appear this week with the Boston Symphony at tonight's "open rehearsal" and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 14 1950

ALDO CICCOLINI, young Italian pianist now making his first American tour, will appear this week with the Boston Symphony at tonight's "open rehearsal" and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

"Military"; Sir Malcolm Sargent conducts the same orchestra in a tenderly precise treatment of the delightful "Surprise." Recording: excellent. (Columbia—33—ML4276)

BACH—A German Organ Mass (Third Part of the Klavierubung). Fritz Heitman at the Charlottenburg Palace Organ presents a collector's item. Transfer from the Telefunken matrices have brought out the bass response missing in their pressings. For specialists, a must. The organ is a superb Baroque and is given full dimensions. Capitol—33—P8029)

CONCERTO GROSSO IN G-MINOR—Vivaldi. CONCERTO GROSSO IN F-MINOR—Scarlatti. In the Vivaldi, Antonio Guarnieri conducts the Orchestra of the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino to produce a rather gummy version of a sprightly work. Edmund Weyns and the Wiesbaden Collegium Musicum, represented from German Telefunken, give an expert performance of a not very interesting Scarlatti work. Recording: good. (Capitol—33—L8035)

SYMPHONY No. 4 IN F-MINOR—Tchaikovsky. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give us a fine new version of the work, exceeding the earlier Kleiber, Sargent, Ormandy versions. Unfortunately a gratuitous cut of the scherzo mars an unreserved recommendation. Recording: excellent. (Victor—33—LM1008)

LA VALSE—Ravel. Boston Symphony, Munch conducting, perform this bland choreographic poem for orchestra with suitable blandness. Recording: excellent. (Victor—45—49-1213-A.)

SONATA No. 4 IN F SHARP—Scriabin. A crisp, scintillating performance by brilliant pianist William Schatkamp. Recording catches all facets of the thoughtful interpretation. (Victor—45—49-0700-A)

SYMPHONY No. 100 IN G-MAJOR. SYMPHONY No. 94 IN G-MAJOR—Hadyn. Hugo Rignold conducts the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra through a crisp, spirited version of the

SYMPHONY No. 4 IN A, OPUS 90 ("Italian")—Mendelssohn. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] on LP. Fine, but don't relinquish the version by the conductor and the orchestra made in the mid-thirties for LP advances. Has the sweet brilliance of the early version but the enthusiasm seems fled. Recording: good. (Victor—33—LM20)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 15 1950

NEW 2-YEAR PACT FOR MITROPOULOS

Conductor of the Philharmonic Is Named Musical Director for Next Two Seasons

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who is halfway through his first season as regular conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed musical director for two more years. The announcement was made yesterday following a meeting of the board of directors at the orchestra's offices on Wednesday.

Mr. Mitropoulos became regular conductor of the Philharmonic last spring and conducted its concerts this fall. He is now in Cleveland for four guest appearances with the Cleveland Symphony and will conduct the San Francisco Symphony eight times in January and the Buffalo Philharmonic twice in February. He will return here on March 1.

Fourteen years ago the Greek-born conductor came to this country for a guest appearance with the Boston Symphony and made an immediate impression. The next year he became musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony, a position he held until last season.

He came to the Philharmonic first as guest conductor for four weeks in 1940, and appeared at the orchestra's centennial concerts during the next two seasons. In 1947 he conducted part of the Philharmonic's spring tour; in 1947-48 he led the orchestra for four weeks, in 1948-49 for eight and last season he shared the post of principal conductor with Leopold Stokowski.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES

RECORDS

Smaller Firms Record Little Heard Masterpieces

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.)

By Felix Borowski

IT IS somewhat remarkable that the large record companies are leaving to smaller firms the providing of little heard but important music. Allegro, for instance, has issued on a 10-inch LP disk some of the chamber music of the 18th century Loeillet family, noted flutists and composers.

[illegible] harpsichord, [illegible] for flute [illegible] collector [illegible] of the charm [illegible] Kaplan plays [illegible] Holmes the [illegible] the harpsi- [illegible] recording [illegible].

[illegible] collector's atten- [illegible] Haydn Society [illegible] the Mozartsaal of [illegible] Haus last January [illegible] Festival Orchestra and the [illegible] Chorus of Vienna. The [illegible] noble it seems re- [illegible] works are re- [illegible] societies in this country [illegible] of a hackneyed repertory that has been heard in our concert rooms for a century or more. Lucky the music loving public that masterpieces like the 'Coronation' Mass are available on records. The Viennese performance is admirable.

* * *

SOUND Chicago has issued 12-inch LP discs containing the lectures presented at Aspen, Colo., in connection with the International Goethe Convocation. Dr. Schweitzer's lecture on Goethe and Thornton Wilder's on "World Literature and the Modern Mind" are notable example of [illegible] scholarship and good records.

Readers of this column probably seldom have heard Schubert's Second Symphony, which he composed at 18. It is the hackneyed masterpieces that most often are heard from American symphony orchestras as well as from American choral societies. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, offers a work that is remarkable indeed, coming as it did from a youth just out of school. RCA Victor records this Schubert symphony on one 10-inch disk.

* * *

This Clipping From
CELINA, OHIO
DAILY STANDARD
DEC 14 1950

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL
DEC 15 1950

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wanger," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

World Of Music

NEW YORK, (UP)—The Westminster Choir College has embarked on a $12,000,000 expansion program, it has been announced by its president, Dr. John Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the 98-acre former Lambert estate in Princeton, N. J., into a campus containing a chapel seating 1,200, a large concert auditorium for 3,500, a smaller auditorium for 1,000 and an open-air amphitheater to seat 15,000. There also would be an education building, dormitories, dining halls, gymnasium, playing fields and parking space for automobiles.

The building program will enable the college to extend its music training facilities to about 500 undergraduate and 100 graduate students. Dr. Williamson and Arthur Judson, chairman of the building committee, said they hoped the college would become a unique music center where the public may gather to hear the greatest orchestras, choruses and world-famed artists. Judson is manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon as enough funds are made available, although it is not planned to solicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. and Mrs. Williamson to provide trained church musicians. While that still remains the college's primary goal, the new building program is expected to make the campus a public cultural center second to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented by the foundation this season.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous Orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown opened to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely-subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CAL.
PRESS
DEC 1950

Record Reviews

[illegible] Music

[illegible]ch, conducting [illegible] Symphony with [illegible]hony Orchestra, [illegible] you top- [illegible] hear their [illegible] way through [illegible] Victor; 12- [illegible]

[illegible] in his new record- [illegible] with the London [illegible]ces the center of [illegible] new center and the [illegible]bling end-over- [illegible]ling and slashing [illegible] LP.)

[illegible] Recording

[illegible]ential difference [illegible]tals—transpar- [illegible]ler by Munch [illegible] turbulence, [illegible] by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

Bull Whip Mengelberg

The former conception is that of Willem Mengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth Symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip were his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine—he commands it (Capital-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch LP.)

Over Decade Apart

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart; Kleiber's is new, with superlative fire quality, whereas Mengelberg's is pre-war and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among 20th century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

Schubert's Fifth

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony.

The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece. (Concert Hall; 12-inch LP.)

—Delos Smith.

This Clipping From
La Jolla, Calif.
Light
DEC 14 1950

MUSICAL NOTES

By Charles H. Marsh

Word comes from New York that Bohuslav Martinu, internationally known composer, heard for the first time his composition "Sinfonietta La Jolla," commissioned for the La Jolla Musical Arts orchestra and premiered last August, when he listened to the new Alco recording made by the Musical Arts orchestra under Nikolai Sokoloff. Martinu expressed great delight with the orchestra's fine playing, the conductor's interpretation, and the excellence of the recording. At the close of the number, the composer's wife threw her arms around his neck and fervently kissed him. Martinu's Third Piano Concerto was given its first New York performance last month with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch and with Rudolf Firkusny, soloist, at the piano. At the close the Carnegie Hall audience gave composer, conductor and soloist an ovation. Firkusny will be heard here at Russ auditorium in a piano recital, Jan. 16.

Dmitri Mitropoulos has announced that he will conduct Dello Joio's "New York Profiles" this winter on one of the New York Philharmonic programs. "New York Profiles" was the first composition commissioned by Mr. Augustus L. Searle for the Musical Arts orchestra (1949). This work also was receorded under Dr. Sokoloff's direction by Alco Records.

Jeanne Mitchell, who opened the Musical Arts series last summer as violin soloist with the orchestra under Dr. Sokoloff, gave a Carnegie Hall recital late in November that drew a paean of praise from the New York critics. They wrote glowingly of her remarkable technique, flawless style, sensitive musicianship and beautiful tone. Included in her program was a composition by Noel Sokoloff, son of Dr. Sokoloff.

Grant Johannesen, brilliant young pianist who played here twice last summer has been booked for 45 appearance in this country before leaving for Europe in June.

RECOMMENDED RECORDS

OPUS AMERICANUM No. 2, "MOSES" (Milhaud).
French National Radiodiffusion Orchestra conducted by the composer.
Capitol Classics, No. P-8114, one 12-inch LP disc (33⅓).

One of the most prominent and most prolific among living French composers is Darius Milhaud who for the past ten years has been on the faculty of Mills college, Oakland.

Opus Americanum, No. 2 (so named because it was the second work composed in America by Milhaud) is a symphonic ballet based on the life of [illegible]. Commissioned by the Ballet Theatre, it received its first performance in concert form in 1940 [illegible] the San Francisco Symphony under Pierre Monteux. This recording was made in France last year by France's finest orchestra under the composer's direction.

The work consists of nine episodes played without interruption. Alfred Frankenstein, eminent critic of the S. F. Chronicle calls it "one of Milhaud's most serious, weighty and dramatic creations. It has depth, thrust and dignity. Its textures and rhythms are strong, tense and vital. It is a big and an important piece of music."

Like all of Milhaud's writing it is brilliant in its orchestration and based on melodic conceptions. One of the composer's tenets is that melody is the only living element in music; but his amazing ability to clothe his melodies in fascinating and often startlingly original harmonic and rhythmic patterns adds much to the attractiveness of his enormous output.

The Capitol recording is of the same satisfying standard of quality that this progressive company has made synonomous with their name. Very highly recommended.

GERMAN LIEDER (Schubert, Brahms, Wolf).
Karl Schmitt-Walter, baritone.
Capitol-Telefunken, No. P-8123, one 12-inch LP disc (33⅓).

This fine disc contains 12 great German Lieder, six by Schubert and three each by Brahms and Hugo Wolf. The six Schubert songs are taken from the cycle "Winter Journey." The Brahms are among his best known songs: Minelied, Serenade and In Summer Fields. The Wolf songs while less well known are in every way worthy to be classed with Schubert and Brahams. In fact some authorities claim Wolf carried the Lied form to its highest development.

Karl Schmitt-Walter sings these beautiful songs with a decided flair, with excellent tone quality and exquisite phrasing. His sensitive and authoritative interpretation is a joy to hear and for those who love lieder this record is a must. The smooth, resonant recording is in every way worthy of the fine performance. Very highly recommended.

OPERATIC ARIAS.
Erna Sack, soprano.
Capitol-Telefunken, No. L-8119, one 10-inch LP disc (33⅓).

This group of well-known and well-loved arias give Erna Sack an opportunity to display her amazing coloratura voice and artistry. The four arias are from von Flotow's "Martha," Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix" and the complete, uncut "Mad Scene" from Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Miss Sack's voice which soars to stratospheric heights with apparent ease, is one of the phenomena of the vocal world. She delivers these arias with musical understanding, immaculate intonation and tonal beauty.

The recording is excellent, as is usual with Capitol's releases. If you like vocal pyrotechnics, this is your meat. Highly recommended.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES

RECORDS

Smaller Firms Record Little Heard Masterpieces

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.)

By Felix Borowski

IT IS somewhat remarkable that the large record companies are leaving to smaller firms the providing of little heard but important music. Allegro, for instance, has issued on a 10-inch LP disk some of the chamber music of the 18th century Loeillet family, noted flutists and composers.

Sonatas for flute and harpsichord, for two flutes, and one for flute and oboe will surprise any collector not previously aware of the charm of such music. Philip Kaplan plays the first flute, John Holmes the oboe and Erwin Bodky the harpsichord. Performance and recording are excellent.

A work worth a collector's attention is the "Coronation" Mass by Mozart, issued by the Haydn Society and recorded in the Mozartsaal of Vienna's Konzert Haus last January by the Mozart Festival Orchestra and the Akademic Chorus of Vienna.

The music is so noble it seems regrettable that such works are neglected by choral societies in this country in favor of a hackneyed repertory that has been heard in our concert rooms for a century or more. Lucky is the music loving public that masterpieces like the "Coronation" Mass are available on records. The Viennese performance is admirable.

* * *

SOUND Chicago has issued 12-inch LP disks containing the lectures presented at Aspen, Colo., in connection with the International Goethe Convocation. Dr. Schweitzer's lecture on Goethe and Thornton Wilder's on "World Literature and the Modern Mind" are notable examples of fine scholarship and good recording.

Readers of this column probably seldom have heard Schubert's Second Symphony, which he composed at 18. It is the hackneyed masterpieces that most often are heard from American symphony orchestras as well as from American choral societies. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, offers a work that is remarkable indeed, coming as it did from a youth just out of school. RCA Victor records this Schubert symphony on one 10-inch disk.

* * *

This Clipping From
CELINA, OHIO
DAILY STANDARD
DEC 14 1950

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL
DEC 15 1950

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wanger," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

World Of Music

NEW YORK, (UP)—The Westminster Choir College has embarked on a $12,000,000 expansion program, it has been announced by its president, Dr. John Finley Williamson.

The college plans to convert the 98-acre former Lambert estate in Princeton, N. J., into a campus containing a chapel seating 1,200, a large concert auditorium for 3,500, a smaller auditorium for 1,000 and an open-air amphitheater to seat 15,000. There also would be an education building, dormitories, dining halls, gymnasium, playing fields and parking space for automobiles.

The building program will enable the college to extend its music training facilities to about 500 undergraduate and 100 graduate students. Dr. Williamson and Arthur Judson, chairman of the building committee, said they hoped the college would become a unique music center where the public may gather to hear the greatest orchestras, choruses and world-famed artists. Judson is manager of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Construction will begin as soon as enough funds are made available, although it is not planned to solicit public donations.

Westminster Choir College was established 25 years ago by Dr. and Mrs. Williamson to provide trained church musicians. While that still remains the college's primary goal, the new building program is expected to make the campus a public cultural center second to none.

Margaret Barthel, pianist, who makes her New York debut in Town Hall on Dec. 13 as a winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation award, is the fourth artist to be presented by the foundation this season.

Born in Deford, Mich., Miss Barthel began piano studies at the age of three. By the time she was fourteen, she had given recitals in Detroit's famous Orchestra Hall and appeared as soloist with the Association Symphony Orchestra.

Now a resident of Allentown, Pa., Miss Barthel is on the faculty of Lebanon Valley College at Annville.

An experiment was tried by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, when certain rehearsals were thrown opened to students of all colleges and advanced schools.

The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's Orchestra, because of a completely-subscribed season.

The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. Those rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony.

These "open" rehearsals for students are listed for five Thursday evenings in the course of the season from 7:30 to 10:00. The receipts will be devoted to the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

This Clipping From
La Jolla, Calif.
Light
DEC 14 1950

MUSICAL NOTES

By Charles H. Marsh

Word comes from New York that Bohuslav Martinu, internationally known composer, heard for the first time his competition "Sinfonietta La Jolla," commissioned for the La Jolla Musical Arts orchestra and premiered last August, when he listened to the new Alco recording made by the Musical Arts orchestra under Nikolai Sokoloff. Martinu expressed great delight with the orchestra's fine playing, the conductor's interpretation and the excellence of the recording. At the close of the number, the composer's wife threw her arms around his neck and fervently kissed him. Martinu's Third Piano Concerto was given its first New York performance last month with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch and with Rudolf Firkusny, soloist, at the piano. At the close the Carnegie Hall audience gave composer, conductor and soloist an ovation. Firkusny will be heard here at Russ auditorium in a piano recital, Jan. 16.

Dmitri Mitropoulos has announced that he will conduct Dello Joio's "New York Profiles" this winter on one of the New York Philharmonic programs. "New York Profiles" was the first composition commissioned by Mr. Augustus L. Searle for the Musical Arts orchestra (1949). This work also was recorded under Dr. Sokoloff's direction by Alco Records.

Jeanne Mitchell, who opened the Musical Arts series last summer as violin soloist with the orchestra under Dr. Sokoloff, gave a Carnegie Hall recital late in November that drew a paean of praise from the New York critics. They wrote glowingly of her remarkable technique, flawless style, sensitive musicianship and beautiful tone. Included in her program was a composition by Noel Sokoloff, son of Dr. Sokoloff.

Grant Johannesen, brilliant young pianist who played here twice last summer has been booked for 45 appearance in this country before leaving for Europe in June.

RECOMMENDED RECORDS

OPUS AMERICANUM No. 2, "MOSES" (Milhaud).
French National Radiodiffusion Orchestra conducted by the composer.
Capitol Classics, No. P-8114, one 12-inch LP disc (33⅓).

One of the most prominent and most prolific among living French composers is Darius Milhaud who for the past ten years has been on the faculty of Mills college, Oakland.

Opus Americanum, No. 2 (so named because it was the second work composed in America by Milhaud) is a symphonic ballet based on the life of Moses. Commissioned by the Ballet Theatre, it received its first performance in concert form by the San Francisco Symphony under Pierre Monteux. This recording was made in France last year by France's finest orchestra under the composer's direction.

The work consists of nine episodes played without interruption. Alfred Frankenstein, eminent critic of the S. F. Chronicle calls it "one of Milhaud's most serious, weighty and dramatic creations. It has depth, thrust and dignity. Its textures and rhythms are strong, tense and vital. It is a big and an important piece of music."

Like all of Milhaud's writing it is brilliant in its orchestration and based on melodic conceptions. One of the composer's tenets is that melody is the only living element in music; but his amazing ability to clothe his melodies in fascinating and often startlingly original harmonic and rhythmic patterns adds much to the attractiveness of his enormous output.

The Capitol recording is of the same satisfying standard of quality that this progressive company has made synonomous with their name. Very highly recommended.

GERMAN LIEDER (Schubert, Brahms, Wolf).
Karl Schmitt-Walter, baritone.
Capitol-Telefunken, No. P-8123, one 12-inch LP disc (33⅓).

This fine disc contains 12 great German Lieder, six by Schubert and three each by Brahms and Hugo Wolf. The six Schubert songs are taken from the cycle "Winter Journey." The Brahms are among his best known songs: Minelied, Serenade and In Summer Fields. The Wolf songs while less well known are in every way worthy to be classed with Schubert and Brahams. In fact some authorities claim Wolf carried the Lied form to its highest development.

Karl Schmitt-Walter sings these beautiful songs with a decided flair, with excellent tone quality and exquisite phrasing. His sensitive and authoritative interpretation is a joy to hear and for those who love lieder this record is a must. The smooth, resonant recording is in every way worthy of the fine performance. Very highly recommended.

OPERATIC ARIAS.
Erna Sack, soprano.
Capitol-Telefunken, No. L-8119, one 10-inch LP disc (33⅓).

This group of well-known and well-loved arias give Erna Sack an opportunity to display her amazing coloratura voice and artistry. The four arias are from von Flotow's "Martha," Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix" and the complete, uncut "Mad Scene" from Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."

Miss Sack's voice which soars to stratospheric heights with apparent ease, is one of the phenomena of the vocal world. She delivers these arias with musical understanding, immaculate intonation and tonal beauty.

The recording is excellent, as is usual with Capitol's releases. If you like vocal pyrotechnics, this is your meat. Highly recommended.

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CAL.
PRESS
DEC 1950

Record Reviews

Concert Music

Charles Munch, conducting Boston Symphony with Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the Beethoven Fifth Symphony come at you top-speed and you hear their [illegible] all the way through [illegible] (RCA Victor; 12-inch LP.)

Munch in his new record, with the London Philharmonic with the London [illegible] places the center of [illegible] below center and the [illegible] tumbling end-over-end, spilling and slashing [illegible] inch LP.)

Excellent Recording

[illegible] essential difference [illegible] rivals—transparency, [illegible] one order by Munch [illegible] charged turbulence, [illegible] directing, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

Bull Whip Mengelberg

The former conception is that of Willem Mengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth Symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip were his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine—he commands it (Capital-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch LP.)

Over Decade Apart

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart; Kleiber's is new, with superlative fire quality, whereas Mengelberg's is pre-war and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among 20th century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch LP.)

Schubert's Fifth

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony.

The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece. (Concert Hall; 12-inch LP.)

—Delos Smith.

This Clipping From
LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL-COURIER
DEC 16 1950

BY W. G. ROGERS

LETTERS OF RICHARD WAGNER: THE BURRELL COLLECTION, edited by John N. Burk (MacMillan; $10.50).

Mary Burrell, an English woman who was a great admirer of Wagner's. . .an admirer, unlike many others, from a most respectable distance. . .decided rightly that much of the biographical information printed about her hero was inaccurate. She began to collect Wagneriana, and had started a "Life" when she died, in 1898. Her researches were widespread, she had money to spend, and her success was spectacular. Her finds included mainly a copy of Wagner's suppressed autobiography, and correspondence still in the possession of Natalie, daughter of Wagner's first wife Minna. Everyone who has written about the composer has tried in vain to get at the Burrell material; it was catalogued 20 years ago, and soon after bought by Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist and presented to the Curtis Institute of Music.

More than 800 items here see the light of day for the first time, and their publication is of extraordinary importance for students of music and letters, and for anyone interested just generally in man. Wagner's character was rich, complex and challenging. His affairs with women, his fierce struggles to get his works produced, the formidable "birth pangs" which accompanied his creation of a new music, have engaged the attention of scholars and biographers who must always write with the dismaying prospect that the Burrell letters would upset their conclusions.

They can now rest easy, thanks to this book so informatively edited by Burk. Curiously enough, the best of them, like Ernest Newman, can be proud they came so close to the truth. Newman's own monumental work, for instance, doesn't seem to need revision in any major respect. Young Wagner's love for Minna, and for Jessie Laussot, too, may have been more impassioned than was supposed; Luettichau had a reason for being hostile, though the hostility was realized; Cosima really did censor the autobiography; and, as a minor note, Wagner didn't tell the whole unsavory truth about the carriage accident on the flight from Riga. This book serves on the whole, however, to confirm generally accepted views.

Author of the Week

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 16 1950

Paul Paray Will Conduct Philadelphia Orchestra

Paul Paray, conductor of the Concerts Colonne in Paris, will replace Eduard van Beinum as guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the winter vacation of its regular leader, Eugene Ormandy, next month. The French conductor will direct the Philadelphians here Jan. 16 in Carnegie Hall; in three concerts in Philadelphia, and one each in Washington and Baltimore. Mr. Van Beinum, who is the conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, has had to cancel his Philadelphia engagement because of illness.

Mr. Paray made his American debut July 24, 1939, in a French concert at the Lewisohn Stadium during the World's Fair. He was a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1945, and has been a guest leader of the Cincinnati Symphony and of the Pittsburgh Symphony for the last three seasons. Mr. Van Beinum was also scheduled to conduct his Amsterdam orchestra in an American tour this season, but the tour was canceled because of disagreement over the schedule. Two other Philadelphia dates planned by Mr. Van Beinum will be taken over by the orchestra's associate conductor, Alexander Hilsberg.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
DEC 16 1950

Symphony Soloist

Ania Dorfman, who is to appear in Beethoven's First Concerto in C Major, will be the soloist for next Tuesday night's Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 16 1950

MUSIC

Munch Returns to Symphony; Pianist Ciccolini in Debut

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. He brought with him a remarkable young Italian pianist, Aldo Ciccolini, who made a great triumph in the Tchaikovsky B-flat minor Concerto. The program began with Haydn's "Drum Roll" Symphony and included two works of Ravel: the "Tombeau de Couperin" Suite and the Spanish Rhapsody.

Ciccolini, short, dark and slender, is a Neapolitan, 25 years old, with an amazing finger technique and, apparently, an innate gift of music-making. I have never heard anyone play the Tchaikovsky Concerto as he did, which is to say, with no pounding whatever, and with a style so clear, exact and lyrical that it put the work in a new light. Yet those frequent bold octaves, which go at terrific speed, were just as impressive as if they had been thundered out—which usually they are.

Now such a reading might have seemed small calibre with an orchestral accompaniment that roared and thundered. But Mr. Munch's idea of the work is identical with that of Mr. Ciccolini, and accordingly orchestra and solo instrument were blended into a just-about perfect whole. As a result you heard much more orchestral detail than you usually do; there was no sense of rush, no sense of strain. Instead this work, which is not among the finest piano concertos, became glowing, poetical, singing, and what oftentimes is judged to be trite and obvious had a new guise of tenderness and magic.

Mr. Ciccolini, now on his first visit to the United States and who made his Boston debut yesterday, was called back to the stage again and again. We must hear more of him, both with orchestra and in a solo concert.

Just how great a conductor we have in Mr. Munch was evident from the subdued Haydn drum roll at the beginning of the concert, to the intoxicating orgiastic last pages of the Spanish Rhapsody. Haydn had correct style, and it also had sparkle and vivacity. The playing was yet easeful and relaxed, as it was later in the "Tombeau de Couperin," and so keen was the balance among the various sections that you heard everything in the way of nuances and subtle rhythms.

Those shadowy half-tones, so important in the palette of Ravel, both as to color and rhythm, were beautifully brought out, and at the same time the essential backbone, the long line, of symphony, suite and rhapsody was always perceptible. It takes a truly great conductor to accomplish that. The audience knew it, too. You could tell by the sustained applause and cheers which followed the final chord of the Spanish Rhapsody.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 16 1950

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Admiration of Charles Munch's conducting at Symphony yesterday was mingled with praise of Mme. Munch's cooking. For many at the concert had attended the monthly pre-Symphony luncheon at the French Center on Arlington street, where a moka au cafe made by Mme. Munch, completed a well-chosen menu. Consomme de hoeuf started the luncheon, which also included paupiette de veau—cooked in white wine—a tossed green salad and crusty French bread.

* * *

The promise of Jean Chauvel, French Ambassador to the United Nations, to appear on the Center's intriguing program of lectures during the winter, has just been received by Andre Morize, who was discussing plans yesterday with Mildred Bixby and Russell Codman, Jr. The latter, new president of the Center, gave an extraneous speech in French. His mother and wife, were there, too.

* * *

Col. and Mrs. Ronald V. C. Bodley also dropped in for the luncheon prepared by Mrs. Ferdinand Brigham and Mrs. William Ray Kitchel. Workers in the French Center's many projects, ranging from a lending library to instruction in French, who were helping at the luncheon yesterday, included Mrs. John Spalding, Mme. Albert Chambon and Mme. Louis Speyer. Others were Mrs. William Davies Sohier, Mrs. Donald Moffat, Mrs. Horace Binney and Mrs. John A. Sargent. Since the luncheons are served with dispatch, many busy men take advantage of them and yesterday they included George Lott and Lorenzo Paolozzi.

* * *

Bostonians will be interested to hear of the engagement of Sarah Spofford Beadle and Frederick A. Wolff of Wilmington, Del. Sally is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Beadle (Christine Spofford) of Wilmington and a granddaughter of Charles M. Spofford of Marlboro street. She was graduated from the Germantown Friends School and Vassar College and is a member of the Junior League of Wilmington. Her fiance, son of the Frederick W. Wolffs of Wilmington, is a graduate of the Tower Hill School, Princeton University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

* * *

Anne Tyler, sub-deb daughter of the Hayden R. Tylers of Newton Center, will be the guest of honor at a dinner party to be given tonight at The Copley Plaza by her grandparents, the Richard A. Magees of Boston and Truro. The girls at the dinner will include Anne's older sister, Jane, and seven classmates at the Beaver Country Day School—Anne Miller, Elizabeth Lucas, Nancy Shuman, Pamela Wicks, Hope Robb, Jean Hunter and Georgia Corbiere. Of course, they'll each have a male escort.

* * *

There are many parties planned before the wedding of Barbara Hall and Francis Austin, which will take place Thursday afternoon, at St. Andrew's Church, Wellesley. On Monday, the future bridegroom will give the ushers' dinner at the Dedham Country and Polo Club. On Tuesday, Mrs. Worthing L. West of Newton Center will give the bridesmaids' luncheon, and the Roger Lelands of Wellesley Hills will entertain at a cocktail party. Mr. and Mrs. William F. Furbush of Wellesley Hills will give a dinner party at The Meadows, Tuesday evening.

* * *

Still more festivities are planned for Wednesday when Mr. and Mrs. William M. Austin will entertain at dinner at the Dedham Country and Polo Club before the wedding rehearsal. On the day of the wedding, Dr. and Mrs. George C. Prather of Wellesley Hills, parents of Marianne Prather, one of the bridesmaids, will give a luncheon for the bridal party and out-of-town relatives.

* * *

Christmas holidays are beginning for many of the younger set. Sally Ferguson, daughter of the George B. Ferguson, and Carol Pyne, whose parents are the Charles C. Pynes, arrived in Marblehead yesterday to spend the vacation with their parents. They are students at the Mary C. Wheeler School in Providence. August S. Torres, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. August S. Torres of Framingham Center, who is a member of the class of 1952 at Graham-Eckes School in Palm Beach, will spend the holidays there with his parents.

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER
DEC 16 1950

* * *

CROCKER-Y——

The Boston Symphony, staid backbone of classical music, will perform the jazz "Trombone Concerto" written by Phil Moore. They've requested the music.

William Friml, composer son of Composer Rudolf Friml, and Eddie Bracken will co-produce a Broadway musical, "Happy Dollar," next season. Eddie will star and Friml will do the book and the music. The fast rising career of the young composer bids fair to match his father's success soon.

Corrine Calvet and John Bromfield were recent dinner hosts at the Fox and Hounds in Santa Monica.

Andy and Della Russell have been signed for guest appearances on three television shows —the "Kay Kyser Show," "Hold That Camera" and the "[illegible] Murray Show."

Louis Armstrong and his all-star band opened last night at the Oasis.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 16 1950

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony concerts are notable in several respects. They mark the return of Charles Munch, who had been temporarily replaced by the guesting Koussevitzky,, and they are introducing to Boston a young Italian pianist of conspicuous gifts, the 25-year-old Aldo Ciccolini, now making his first visit to this country. Mr. Ciccolini's vehicle is the Tchaikovsky First Concerto, which received its first performance anywhere in Boston's Music Hall 75 years ago last October. And Maurice Ravel, whose music fills the second half of the program, would have celebrated his 75th birthday this year.

Not since 1943, when Alexander Brailowsky did it, had anyone played—or had the nerve to play—the Tchaikovsky B-flat minor at a Boston Symphony concert. The piece was beginning to fade before the juke boxes got hold of it, and for some they delivered the coup de grace. However, audiences still go for it, and Mr. Ciccolini had a big success yesterday. He played musically, when that was called for, and with great brilliance and a digital dexterity that could be remarked upon even today. Nor did he bang, force his tone or belabor the instrument. The orchestral support was admirable.

In the program book are excerpts from the reviews of the Concerto's premiere at the hands of Hans von Buelow, to whom Tchaikovsky dedicated the work after Nicholas Rubinstein had turned it down. The critics were neither greatly pleased nor displeased by the new piece, and not one of the four had the faintest inkling of the overwhelming popularity that lay in store for it. We of today would probably prove no wiser.

Mr. Munch was warmly greeted when he appeared yesterday and he opened proceedings with a fine performance of Haydn's splendid "Drum Roll" Symphony, that had gone unheard at Symphony Hall for two decades. The opening, with its drum roll, repeated just before the coda, strikes a solemn note. The rest is on the gay side. Apparently there are too many good Haydn symphonies for the conductors to keep up with them.

To get back to Ravel, he was represented yesterday by the Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the "Rapsodie Espagnole." Mr. Munch did a neat job with the former but in the case of the Forlane, I prefer Koussevitzky's slower tempo and more seductive approach. Prelude, Minuet and Rigaudon went well. The Spanish Rhapsody was given a properly atmospheric and rhythmic treatment and a sonorous finish that brought down the house. The biggest applause of the afternoon had, of course, fallen to Mr. Ciccolini. No conductor can compete with a soloist.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 15 1950

Mitropoulos Ag[ain] PhilharmonicHe[ad]

Will Direct N. Y. Orchestr[a] for Two More Years

Dimitri Mitropoulos, now in his first season as musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed to this position for two more years, through the season of 1952-'53.

The appointment, announced yesterday by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, was approved at a meeting of its board of directors on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Mitropoulos shared the orchestra's conductorship with Leopold Stokowski last season, and became its artistic head last spring.

The Greek conductor, who made his American debut in a guest engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936, was musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra from 1937 to 1949. He first appeared with the Philharmonic-Symphony in a four-week guest engagement opening Dec. 19, 1940. He also conducted the New York musicians in the next two seasons, in the 1947 spring tour, and later for four weeks in 1947-'48, eight weeks in 1948-'49 and ten weeks in 1949-'50. He completes a guest engagement

[195]

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 16 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, the eighth concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon. The soloist was Aldo Ciccolini. The program:

Symphony No. 1 in E flat.....Haydn
Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor.....Tchaikovsky
Op. 23
Prelude to Act I of "La Taverne de Bagdad"
Pavane pour une Infante Defunte.....Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

This was a singularly attractive concert, flawlessly designed, flawlessly conceived by Charles Munch back again after his vacation and seemingly as glad to be back as we are to have him), and flawlessly played by the orchestra in the top of its form. There was a fine new pianist, too, to do that champion war horse of all piano concerts, the Tchaikovsky No. 1 in B-flat minor.

As it happens, Tchaikovsky's concerto received its first performance anywhere in Boston exactly 75 years ago last October with Hans Von Bulow, to whom the work was dedicated, as the soloist. At that time the finale made such a success it had to be repeated, and the repetition was so enthusiastically received they played the whole concerto all over again then and there. The news so excited the composer when he heard of it from Von Bulow he spent all the money he had on hand answering the wire. "Nothing like this ever happens in our country," he later wrote of the event.

Truly Splendid

Nothing like that ever happens in this country any more: a brand new work by Copland, Piston, Barber or even Stravinsky being encored by popular demand? Heavens, it is usually hard enough for them to inspire enough applause to get the composer (if he is present) in for a second bow. I may be terribly wrong in the matter, but either the audiences of 1875 were far and away more perceptive than today's audience (which I seriously doubt), or today's composer's are writing music for posterity and don't really give a hang whether anybody likes their music or not here and now.

Be that as it may, the Concerto was given a truly splendid performance yesterday afternoon by Aldo Ciccolini, a brilliant young (25) Italian pianist who, if he didn't always bring off every technical roman candle, brought a most musical and poetical point of view to the work. I found his clarity of articulation in the lighter, more scintillating passages extremely good to hear, and I found his feeling for rhythm, for phrasing and for dynamic shading within, so to speak, an established dynamic level, most unusually good.

As I have had occasion to say many times before, Mr. Munch is perfection as an accompanist. The result was that pianist, conductor and orchestra made this a musical event rather than the virtuoso sporting event it usually is, in which the pianist endeavors to show us how many notes he can hit per second at ten fortges of volume.

Little Miracles

It is almost 20 years since Haydn's next-to-last symphony, the "Drum Roll" Symphony, has been given at these concerts, yet what a perfect gem it is! It has remained for the Haydn Society in its recent vast output of records to give us the truth about this incredible man Haydn, and now, happily enough, we have a significant Haydn champion in Mr. Munch. The "Drum Roll" symphony (it begins with a long roll on the tympani) is filled with little miracles—the violin solo of the andante, to name but one—and the way the conductor sought them out, never obviously, was to me as much a delight as the music itself. I hope Mr. Munch will give us the pleasure of teaching us all, as he did in this, how prodigious a giant Haydn really was, by programing more and more of these neglected masterpieces.

I find it impossible to express how sensitively and how exotically conductor and orchestra set forth the two Ravel works that brought the program to a close. While the final "Feria" of the Rapsodie Espagnole elicited spontaneous cheers from the second balcony (God bless it!), the magic was in everything, including the oboe playing of Mr. Ralph Gomberg. This was, in short, an occasion of great musical reward from beginning to end. And to note that next week's concert will be given over to Bach's Christmas Oratorio is to know that it will be an equally rewarding occasion.

This Clipping From
RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS & OBSERVER
DEC 17 1950

Recent RCA Victor 45 releases include: "Use Your Imagination" and "I Am Loved," both from "Out of This World," with Vaughn Monroe and the Moonmaids; and "Say That You Love Me" and a polka, "I know and You Know," both by Johnny Vadnal and his orchestra.

RCA Victor picked Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator for its new 45 album of Prokofieff's "Peter and The Wolf," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The music, to put it mildly, is all that could be expected. So is the technical end of the business, the record itself.

To this reviewer, it seems that another and probably less famous narrator could have done a more fitting job. Mrs. Roosevelt's job as a speaker is done perfectly, so far as being able to understand what she says is concerned. But, it is hard to imagine that here is some grandmother telling this appealing story to a group of eager little children. Her narration doesn't seem to have the gaiety and spontaniety you'd expect to hear from a grandmother having a whale of a time with her own grandchildren.

If you don't mind the stiffness of the narration, the music is well worth hearing.

Another new RCA Victor 45 album which can't miss is "All Time Favorites." The album is just what its title indicates, both as to numbers and artists.

There is, of course, Marian Anderson. Her contribution is that favorite of favorites, "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny." As is her custom, Miss Anderson's presentation of the song is nothing less than superb. It's a truly heart-warming experience to hear her in this number.

Other numbers in the album are: Enrico Caruso in Verdi's La Donna Mobile; Jeannette MacDonald in Victor Herbert's Italian Street Song; Boston Pops Orchestra with Gade's Jalousie; First Piano Quartet with Liszt's Liebestraum; Jan Peerce with Harmati's Bluebird of Happiness; Allan Jones with Jerome Kern's Make Believe; and Leopold Stokowski conducting Strauss' The Blue Danube.

Another RCA Victor 45 album just released presents Marian Anderson at her usual best. It is her four-sided recording of Frauenliebe and Leben by Schumann. The text tells the story of a woman's fulfillment in marriage and motherhood.

Miss Anderson is accompanied by Franz Rupp, pianist, whose accompaniments in themselves are good enough to make the recordings well worth while. With her voice and his accompaniments, the result is almost unbelievably good.

Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra combine to present a charming program of light music in another RCA Victor 45 album. It is billed as "Toscanini Conducts Light Music," and it should be a popular offering. The chief feature is Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Toscanini and his musicians must have enjoyed doing that one. The result of their labors is perfect, and it sounds as if they enjoyed doing it as much as the listener enjoys the recording.

Columbia has just released a 10-inch LP recording, "Hymns by The Mariners." The record presents the popular male quartet at its best, and includes hymns which the Mariners have sung over the Arthur Godfrey program. The Mariners sang together as Coast Guardsmen during the war, and have stuck together as civilians since that time. Titles in the record include Lead Kindly Light, Blest Be the Tie That Binds, I Am Thine, O Lord, Close to Thee, O God of Love, In The Garden, O Master, Let Me Walk With Thee, Abide With Me, Morning Prayer, and Now The Day Is Over.

Another appealing Columbia LP recently released is "Songs We Love," with Nelson Eddy. The 12-inch record includes such favorites as Trees, A Perfect Day, Berceuse from Jocelyn, The Sweetest Story Ever Told, Sylvia, I Love You Truly, and the Rosary. It's wonderful for folks who want to think back to other days, and Nelson Eddy does a grand job with the music.

Columbia also has released a 12-inch LP record of a novelty appeal, Allen Funt's "The Candid Microphone." It is a collection of off-guard conversations secretly recorded, and is good for a lot of fun. Conversation include the wrestler takes advice, the lost shoe, veterans' views, the heckled pitchman, etc. Bernard Green arranged good background music.

This Clipping From JACKSON, MISS.
CLARION LEDGER
DEC 17 1950

chords and records

By JAY BEE

A tone poem by Tchaikowsky that is nearly as effective in its way as the much better known, "Romeo and Juliet," is the symphonic fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." Taken from a story in Dante's Inferno, its first and last sections are meant to portray the wandering of lost souls in Hell. The romantic middle portion is concerned with the narrative of the lovers, Francesca and Paolo. The performance of this work by the Orchestra of the Paris Conservatory under Eugene Jorda is vigorous and forceful.

On the same London LP record, the same orchestra, conducted this time by Charles Munch, plays Provkfiev's familiar Classical Symphony. This high spirited modern work, cast in a graceful and melodic eighteenth century style, receives an interpretation second only to the best of all - that by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky.

An interesting collection of slight music is the Columbia LP disc of "Modern Music for Strings." Sylvan Shulman leads the Stuyvesant Sinfonietta in well played, well recorded versions of Two Pieces for String Octet by Shostakovitch, which are rather melodic and romantic in the vein of his first symphony; Roumanian Folk Dances by Bartok (previously recorded in a solo violin version by Szigeti); a simple, lyric, early Serenade, by Rachmaninoff; an impressionistic Nocturne for Strings, by Alan Shulman; and Hindemith's Pieces for String Choir, more technical than ingratiating.

Gold and Fizdale, as good a two-piano team as may be found on records anywhere, may be heard on a Columbia LP in "Carnival in New Orleans" commissioned by them from the contemporary French composer, Darius Milhaud. It is a sparkling reading of a gay and witty work, somewhat suggesting the same composer's, "Scaramouche." On the same record is light and lively music from the same composer's ballet, "Les Songes," (Dreams.)

Less consequential is the Concerto for Two Pianos, Winds, and Percussion by the versatile Paul Bowles. This too was commissioned by Gold and Fizdale, who play the piano parts, accompanied by wind and percussion instrumentalists led by Daniel Saidenberg, on the same Columbia record.

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL
DEC 17 1950

MUSIC

Here Is Platter Variety

By OSCAR SMITH

The record companies have been getting ready for Christmas and not all of their offerings, of course, deal with the holiday season.

Plenty of big names are represented. For instance there is a delightful recording of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" by Eleanor Roosevelt, narrator, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. It's a long-playing platter. (RCA Victor LM-45.)

Eleanor Steber, soprano, does "Dramatic Scenes from Verdi Operas," with Fausto Cleva conducting the Metropolitan Opera Association Orchestra. Miss Steber not only meets the dramatic needs of the set; her singing is first rate in well-known arias from "Ernani," "Otello," "La Traviata," "Don Carlos" and "La Forza del Destino." (Columbia ML-2157.)

Another recommended vocal set has Marian Anderson, contralto, singing Schumann's "Frauenliebe und Leben," with Ranz Rupp at the piano. (RCA Victor WDM-1458.) This song cycle is on 45 r. p. m. discs.

This Clipping From
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 17 1950

On the Serious Side— —Platter Chatter

Columbia LPs Show Intelligent Grouping

By THE DISC EDITOR

COLUMBIA Records turn up once again with a happy combination of shorter works on a single LP surface — a facility which other disc makers have found useful to imitate.

The 10-inch LP in question contains on the one hand Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune," and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." These are the product of the Philadelphia Orchestra and Eugene Ormandy. On the other side is Honeggar's Concertino with Oscar Levant and orchestra under Frit Reiner. This is all music of recent but not modern stamp. The popular Debussy and Dukas will ultimately help the deserving Honeggar score to more recognition.

* * *

OPERA STARS PERFORM

FOR the same release is another 10-incher grouping seven of the best-loved songs from Italy and sung by the rising Met star tenor, Richard Tucker. "Torna a Surriento" and "O Sole Mio" should give a clue to the content. Mr. Tucker is accompanied by the Columbia Concert Orchestra under Alfredo Antonini.

Better known to most opera fans than Mr. Tucker, is the Brazilian soprano, Bidu Sayao. A Columbia LP groups four Mozart arias on one surface of the latest Sayao disc and leaves the second side for a French recital. It is altogether delightful, musically and technically.

Still another operatic contribution and possibly the best singing of all, is a group of scenes from Verdi operas sung by Eleanor Steber. Miss Steber's expressive powers have matured in the past few years to the point that she is at the pinnacle of success. Of superlative caliber is her "Salce, Salce," Desdemona's pre-death scene from "Othello."

* * *

TWO BRAHMS SYMPHONIES

CHARLES MUNCH, conducting the [illegible] Orchestra in Brahms' Fourth makes the chords come at you-top-sides foremost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms.

A companion offering by RCA Victor is the Brahms' First Symphony recorded by Leopold Stokowski and the Hollywood Bowl Symphony. The Boston musicians make their well known superiority evident for the record; but Mr. Stokowski shows that even with players not regularly his charge, he competes at the conductor's level with the best in the business.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
DEC 17 1950

Recordings

RCA VICTOR'S December Red Seal feature list comprises a variety of albums and singles, including an album of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," marking the record debut of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the recordings made in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., last summer.

AN ALBUM of eight all-time best sellers released by RCA Victor, contains records tops through several decades. The eight artists: Marian Anderson, the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, Enrico Caruso, the First Piano Quartet, Allan Jones, Jeannette MacDonald, Jan Peerce and Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony Orchestra, are represented in this unique album, with selections from "La Donna e Mobile" to "Liebestraum" and "The Blue Danube." Gladys Swarthout, mezzo soprano, is among these featuring singles and in Red Seal features albums Maestro Toscanini directs Light Music, including the Skaters Waltz, and Virtuoso Vladimir Horowitz plays seven of Chopin's most popular Mazurkas, five of which he never before recorded for Victor. Marian Anderson, American contralto sings the melodic Schumann song cycle "Frauenliebe und Leben" for the first time on Red Seal records.

* * *

NELSON EDDY, popular baritone of concert, radio and the cinema has recorded for "Columbia, "Songs We Love," including "The Sweetest Story Ever Told," "Slyvia," "The Rosary," "A Perfect Day," "I Love You Truly" and several others. Leon Arnaud conducts the orchestra; Theodore Paxson is at the piano for Eddy.

This Clipping From
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD
DEC 17 1950

Author of the Week

John N. Burk, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner." But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography," and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

PENSACOLA, FLA
JOURNAL
12/17/50

Author of the Week

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

Cir. (D 116,020) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 17 1950

Housewives and Factory Workers Have Fun Singing "Heavy" Music

ARTHUR FIEDLER, with a distinct flair for the theatre, brings his choristers over a difficult reading of Bach.

By ALFRED BORELLI

Singing "heavy" music is fun for the 130-odd students, housewives, business men, factory workers and social registerites who comprise the Arthur Fiedler Chorus.

This chorus was formed to supply the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a choral component, and last year it received critical acclaim for its performance of Honegger's "Joan d'Arc au Boucher." This year, under Mr. Fiedler, the chorus is preparing Bach's monumental "Christmas Oratorio," and at this stage of preparation it looks as though the performance will repeat the triumph of last season when Mr. Munch conducts the group with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 22 and 23, at Symphony Hall.

Membership in the chorus is exclusive. That is, it excludes anyone who cannot read music. A great voice is no assurance of membership, and conversely an average voice does not betoken "thumbs-down." Of course one must sing reasonably in tune, but the deciding factor is one's ability to read music fluently and accurately. This is an important basic pre-requisite. One must also possess a normally pleasant voice with good pitch and average range with a "blendability" quality.

Wednesday night is rehearsal night, and this means 2½ hours of intensive drill, repetition, more repetition, more drill, and still more repetition. Difficult passages are exhaustively ironed, hammered, stretched, pulled, twisted and smoothed until the correct pronunciation and intonation bring a nod of approval from Mr. Fiedler.

The success and "esprit-de-corps" of the chorus is due largely to the semi-fanatic devotion to its director. Mr. Fiedler possesses a distinct flair for the theatre, a fleck of a Rabelaisian humor. He can be a mimic with a wit perfectly timed as he

Often the tension of concentration is relieved by a good belly laugh at a predictable mimicric work and fun to each with a time of its own.

After one and a half gruelling work, doughnuts and coffee are a welcome [illegible] when Mr. Fiedler inclines to "pour on the coal."

Stravinsky's incredibly difficult "Les Noces" is next on the agenda with its performance scheduled tentatively for the latter part of March, 1951.

Everyone seems to have fun, hard work notwithstanding. As one member of the bass section says, "This is Bach as it should be done," and that apparently explains the whole thing.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
DEC 17 1950

* * *

"THE AGE of Anxiety," by Leonard Bernstein, brilliant young composer-pianist conductor, is recorded for Columbia by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York, Leonard Bernstein conducting and Lukas Foss at the piano. Musicians and music lovers from this area also have come to know both Bernstein and Foss through attendance at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood. "The Age of Anxiety" is Bernstein's Second Symphony.

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York have waxed for Columbia Masterworks a repertoire of nearly 250 recordings, providing one of the largest symphonic libraries available on discs. Both orchestras record exclusively for Columbia Records, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony having signed in 1940 and the Philadelphia group in 1943. The recorded repertoire of these orchestras ranges from the traditional Bach, Beethoven and Brahms to Stravinsky, Schoenberg and Shostakovich, including works by American composers: Roger Sessions, Aaron Copland and George Gershwin.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
DEC 17 1950

AUTHOR Of the Week

By W. G. ROGERS

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
DEC 17 1950

A former first lady, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, joins with Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for an enchanting presentation of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (LM 45). In recent years this delightful orchestral fairy tale has been interpreted by almost every personage who could read lines, from Sterling Holloway to Basil Rathbone. Mrs. Roosevelt, who somehow or other overlooked professional acting in her wide variety of pursuits, holds her own as a narrator. It's a most enjoyable performance.

This Clipping From
AMARILLO, TEXAS
GLOBE
DEC 17 1950

IN THE GROOVE
Red Seal Release Features Albums for Christmas

A variety of albums and single [illegible] been released by RCA Victor on the Red Seal features this month designed for the Christmas season.

Outstanding is an album of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which marks the record debut of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator. The new reading features the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. It was recorded at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., last summer. It has a broad appeal to all ages of disk lovers.

* * *

Music lovers who have been awaiting release of the second album in Wanda Landowska's monumental recording of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier" will be able to obtain it in time for the Yule season.

* * *

Cir. (D 151,302) (S 381,517)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 20 1950

MUSIC

Ania Dorfman Plays Beethoven Concerto With Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ania Dorfmann, the Russian-born Paris-trained pianist, was soloist last night in the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series at Symphony Hall. She played the Concerto No. 1. in C major, a work of Beethoven which is seldom heard at concerts today.

It was a good, fleet, skilled performance—apart from a slight accident in the violins at the very beginning. Miss Dorfmann plays it lightly but not anemically, which is the way it should go, for the piece is early Beethoven and remembers Haydn and Mozart. Mr. Munch guided the orchestral portion with his usual skill and taste. But of exceptional sparkle, either in orchestra or solo instrument, there was little. All the same, it was a satisfying interlude, and Miss Dorfmann several times was recalled to the stage.

The remainder of the program brought Sir Hamilton Harty's Suite drawn from Handel's "Water Music," and two scores heard recently in the Friday-Saturday series: the Schumann "Spring" Symphony and the Spanish Rhapsody by Ravel.

Mr. Munch seemed to whip up the Schumann work more than he did a few weeks ago, not to the point of exaggeration, but giving it all the tension it properly should stand. As for the Spanish Rhapsody, that is a tour de force of Mr. Munch's art, and once again it was gorgeous and passionate.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
DEC 17 1950

Hub Symphony In 3 Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Charles Munch, will present the third program of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall Tuesday, and the ninth program of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, Dec. 22 and 23.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Munch will introduce Bach's Christmas Oratorio which has never been performed at these concerts. Of the six parts intended to be performed on six Christmas holidays, the first three and excerpts from the fourth and sixth will be performed. The Christmas Oratorio presents in narrative form, with added choruses, solo airs and chorales, the story of the Nativity. The chorus has been prepared by Arthur Fiedler.

This Clipping From
LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 17 1950

Granted to Students

The Boston symphony has made five dress rehearsals available to students from 14 educational institutions of Boston. Too many students were unable to obtain subscriptions.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
DEC 17 19[illegible]

On the Record

The classic symphonies are receiving a thorough presentation on RCA-Victor's 33 1/3 long-play recordings. Recent releases on long play include works of Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms and Haydn.

The always magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra performs three of these symphonies, with Pierre Monteux and the San Francisco Symphony (no second-rate musical organization itself) contributing one. Charles Munch conducts the Boston group in Schubert's Second Symphony (RCA Victor LM 41) and in Brahms Fourth (LM 1086). Serge Koussevitsky is conductor for a presentation of Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony (No. 92), and also for some nonsymphonic Mozart—Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (LM 1102).

There may be sound merchandising reasons for use of 10-inch long play discs for the recording of one symphony (as is done here with the Beethoven and Schubert), but esthetically it would seem better to avoid the necessary turnover of the record in the middle of the work, and utilize one 12-inch disc with a complete symphony on each side. Maybe the Beethoven people wouldn't have Schubert, and vice versa.

This Clipping From
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
DEC 20 1950

AT BOSTON THE music of the month for this family was the second in a series of five rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra. These [illegible] open to students and others for a moderate charge. Except for the presence of a large, attentive audience which occasionally bursts into applause, the rehearsal is routine. Director Charles Munch wears a sport jacket and the players wear tweeds, sweaters or even appear in shirtsleeves. They work at their playing, as the director leads and urges, using his whole body as well as hands and arms. He sings and shouts, stops the music and explains what he wants, has passages repeated. But for the most part the music flows forth in bright beauty and melodious magnificence . . . fortissimi climaxes.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 18 1950

This Week's Programs At Symphony Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Charles Munch, will present the third program of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall tomorrow and the ninth program of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, Dec. 22 and 23.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Munch will introduce Bach's Christmas Oratorio, which has never been performed at these concerts. Of the six parts intended to be performed on six Christmas holidays, the first three and excerpts from the Fourth and Sixth will be performed. The Christmas Oratorio presents in narrative form, with added choruses, solo airs and chorales, the story of the Nativity. The chorus has been prepared by Arthur Fiedler.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 20 1950

MARGUERITE WILLAUER, Boston singer, will be one of the soloists when Charles Munch conducts Bach's Christmas Oratorio at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Friday and Saturday.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
DEC 22 1950

First by Symphony

At the tenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall a week from this afternoon and tomorrow night, Charles Munch will be heard in the music of Bruckner and for the first time in this country he will be conducting the Seventh Symphony.

He will also introduce at this pair of concerts the Second Piano Concerto by Alexander Tcherepnin, in which the composer will appear as soloist. The Concerto is in one movement.

[197]

This Clipping From
LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL
DEC 20 1950

Paganini Sounds Good on Wax, Too

NICCOLO PAGANINI, tall and gaunt, played the violin with such flamboyant dexterity that a few people of his time (the early 19th Century) professed to believe that the devil himself directed his bony fingers. His playing was such that Rossini wept and Berlioz was moved to rapturous praise. Of the music he wrote, little is heard today, perhaps because much of it is more than ordinarily difficult.

But his Concerto No. 1 in D Major still is played, and one lush theme from it has been borrowed by more than one composer. A new recording of the concerto has been made by Zino Francescatti, with the Philadelphia Orchestra directed by Eugene Ormandy. It is a dazzling, melodic work filled with tricky passages which Francescatti, a dextrous man himself with fiddle and bow, appears to take in stride.

On the second side of this Columbia 12-inch LP is Saint-Saens' Concerto No. 3 in B Minor. In this, Francescatti is supported by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York and Dimitri Mitropoulos.

•

Two Unusual Works

THE SALZBURG Mozarteum Orchestra, directed by Zoltan Fekete, has recorded two rare works for Mercury. One of these is a suite arranged from the music of Handel's oratorio Jephta. The second is a three-movement symphony in C major ascribed to Haydn. The manuscript, bearing the name of Haydn, was uncovered about 10 years ago, and was played for the first time (at least in our era) in 1946 in New York. It is a brilliant work; and even if it wasn't actually written by Haydn, the style is so similar that anyone could be pardoned for thinking it was.

•

ARTURO TOSCANINI has descended a couple of steps from his throne to conduct the N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra in a series of three pieces for an album which Victor almost apologetically calls Toscanini Conducts Light Music. Included are Dukas' The Sorcerer's Apprentice, Waldteufel's The Skaters Waltz and the overture to Kabalevsky's Colas Breugnon. The Apprentice is beautifully done; the others seemed to me not particularly unusual in performance.

•

VICTOR also has released recently three Red Seal singles of widely varying subject matter. On one of these, Gladys Swarthout sings — and well — Hahn's Les Cygnes and Masse net's apparently immortal Elegi. On another, Serge Koussevitzk and the Boston Symphony pla Haydn's Toy Symphony, a chee ful and sedately noisy piece music. The third record contai Leroy Anderson's Syncopat Clock and something called Cl sical Juke Box, which is Andr son's arrangement of a wh series of themes including the recent pop tune Music, Music, Music.

•

A RECENT musical movie having considerable success was Tea for Two, in which Doris Day sang well and danced badly and Gene Nelson danced well and sang, happily, almost not at all. Eight of the tunes from that picture are sung by Miss Day, Nelson and the Ken Lane Singers to the accompaniment of an orchestra directed by Axel Stordahl on a new Columbia 10-inch LP. The songs include Crazy Rhythm, Here in My Arms, I Know That You Know, I Want to Be Happy, Do Do Do, I Only Have Eyes for You, Oh Me! Oh My! and Tea for Two.

•

THE BEST of the new pop tunes:

COLUMBIA—Jo Stafford, with Paul Weston and his orchestra, does a good job on You Don't Remind Me, one of the songs from Cole Porter's new show, Out of This World. Doris Day sings two more numbers from that show, I Am Loved, which may well be a real hit, and From This Moment On.

VICTOR — Walking With the Blues is a wonderful piece of jazz the way Gene Krupa and his boys do it. Fran Warren sings a couple of pleasant old ones: My Silent Love and Look to the Rainbow. Tommy Dorsey's version of Lullaby In Boogie is something different.

MERCURY — Alfred Newman and the Hollywood Symphony Orchestra (I hope they don't mind being put among the pops) have entertaining arrangements of Jamaica Rhumba and Vienna Beauties. Herb Jeffries and his orchestra do These Foolish Things and Duke Ellington's fine old Solitude.

ARTURO TOSCANINI
Unbends to record pops

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
DEC 20 1950

The Roving Reporter

RPI Field House Upstate Madison Square Garden

By TIP ROSEBERRY

Folks up that way are speaking of the R. P. I. Field House as "the best thing that ever happened to Troy." Well, that may be a slight hyperbole. After all, R. P. I. itself isn't exactly a black eye to the community.

However that may be, the statement may be legitimately broadened to say that the field house is one of the doggondest phenomena that has popped up in the Albany Metropolitan Area since the time those two whales swam up the river and foundered on the rocks off the place where Troy is—and that was 300 years ago.

THE ONLY OTHER SEMBLANCE THE field house bears to a whale is in enormousness. There is nothing like it in this corner of the geography for taking care of a crowd and for giving said crowd something to come for. It is by way of becoming the upstate Madison Square Garden.

Lately the field house pulled in nearly 6,000 cash customers for the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and that's about as many as the same outfit is able to seat on its home grounds at Tanglewood. The field house has a total seating capacity of 8,000. Incidentally, the stage is a replica of the acoustically famous music-shell at Tanglewood. They went over to Tangewood and measured it inch-for-inch.

BOB HOPE AND HORACE HEIDT RECENTLY aired their radio programs from there. The Polytechnic Chorus of Finland sang, and a couple of international ice revues have been run. Coming up are the Don Cossacks and Gene Autry (separately, to be sure). Biggest feather in its cap to date, from a sports angle, is the selection of the field house for the Eastern sectional championships of the U. S. Figure Skating association (Jan. 12-13-14).

While Albany sat on its fat Dutch traditions, mumbling about the need for a nice public auditorium, Troy grabbed the ball. Rather, R. P. I. grabbed it for Troy. In so doing, that establishment of higher learning has come out from behind those ivy-clad walls and set a mark for other colleges to shoot at in the way of spreading their light out to the communities in which they keep shop. No more cloistered halls. . . .

KEY FIGURE IN BRINGING IT ABOUT WAS Dr. Livingston W. Houston, R. P. I.'s prexy since 1944. Himself a skating enthusiast and one-time hockey player, he long since (while a Troy industrialist) saw the need for a big-scale place of public assemblage in this metropolitan vicinity. The post-war expediencies gave him a chance to do something about it.

The Federal government extended a helping hand to colleges whose walls were bursting with GI veterans. Specifically, the Army and Navy had a lot of left-over buildings which came under the heading of war surplus. R. P. I. found out about this huge metal-frame Navy warehouse at Davisville, R. I., and got it. The U. S. moved it and set it up at Troy. The college redesigned it and installed all the internal improvements, including concrete tiers for seats and the elaborate floor in which are coiled almost 10 miles of brine pipes for freezing the ice-rink.

THE LOCATION IS HIGH ON THE HILL IN THE "city" of student emergency housing which the government slapped up during the war, and for which R. P. I. revived the historic name of Rensselaerwyck. The ice-wise manager is H. L. "Jack" Garren, imported from Lake Placid where he was long in charge of the Olympic Games facilities and constructed the ski-jump and bob-sled run.

Between R. P. I. and Uncle Sam, the investment in the field house is close to a million. Its debut as a public facility was in connection with R. P. I.'s 125th anniversary celebration a little over a year ago. Commencement was first held there last June, when it was so hot that they turned on the ice-machine.

PRESIDENT HOUSTON STICKS TO HIS AIM for the field house as being an "educational, cultural and recreational" center for the whole area. It isn't a money-making deal. R. P. I. will be lucky if it can break even, with a $100,000 annual overhead. "We aren't in the amusement business," says he. "This is no professional sports arena, and it won't be commercialized."

Cir. (D 11,610)
This Clipping From
CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER
DEC 19 1950

LIBRARY NOTES

Our Record Collection

With the Christmas season upon us, music is in the air. At this time of year we are surrounded by song, and when we walked into the library the other day, we took special notice of the music shelves, filled with all kinds of song and melody.

As we ran our eyes over the albums, we found symphonies, and tone poems, sonatas, and concertos, selections from operas and operettas, played by Toscanini, Koussevitsky, Ormandy, Mitropoulis, to name a few.

In keeping with the Christmas season, we found an album recorded by the Victor Chorale (Robert Shaw directing) containing "Christmas Hymns and Carols." There were the old familiar ones, and there a selection of folk carols and French and German Yuletide songs.

Symphonic Music

Any time you want to listen to an evening of symphonic music, the library can fill almost any desire. The day we looked there were five symphonies by Beethoven on the shelves.

What would you like? The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky can give the 3rd (Eroica); or if you prefer, Bruno Walter conducts the 6th in F Major (Pastorale) or the 5th in C Minor with the New York Philharmonic. The New York Philharmonic, this time with Arturo Toscanini conducting, offers the 7th in A, while Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony are on hand with the 9th in D Minor with the Berkshire Festival Chorus under Robert Shaw doing the choral portion.

And if Beethoven does not seem to fit your mood, Toscanini and the NBC Symphony offer you Brahms' 1st in C minor. Or Brahms' 4th in E Minor can be had with Felix Weingartner conducting the London Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor is what you're looking for. Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic will be glad to oblige.

Or would [illegible] gay Haydn symph[illegible] Koussevitsky and [illegible] Symphony will delight you [illegible] the 94th in G (Surprise).

If your mood is variable, it could be that the album "The Heart of the Symphony" is what you'd find sat[illegible] Charles O'Connell and [illegible] Symphony Orches[illegible] the principal melody content of eight famous symphonies and recorded them in a single volume.

Then you may want to hear the whole of Scheherazade, and Pierre Monteux is conducting the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra in a concert especially for you.

Or Dmitri Mitropoulis and the Minneapolis Symphony will play Gustav Mahler's 1st Symphony in D Major at your request.

An all Tchaikovsky program can also be arranged for your living room pleasure. Eugene Ormandy directs the Philadelphia Orchestra in the 6th Symphony and then gives a performance of the "Nutcracker Suite." Following, the Boston Symphony presents the "Romeo and Juliet Overture" with Koussevitsky conducting.

Music from Broadway

But perhaps you'd rather visit Broadway and take in a musical. Mary Martin and Ezio Pinza will run through the Rodgers-Hammerstein score of "South Pacific" for you, assisted by the rest of the Broadway cast; or the members of the New York production will bring you music and dialogue from "Lost in the Stars," words by Maxwell Anderson and music by Kurt Weill.

Again from Broadway, music in words can be found in the LP recording of T. S. Eliot's "The Cocktail Party," with the original cast.

This Clipping From
BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
DEC 21 1950

Author Of The Week

By W. G. ROGERS

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
Bristol R. I.
Phoenix
DEC 22 1950

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its first concert of the new year in Providence, giving the third of the series in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium on Tuesday evening, Jan. 2.

Mr. Munch will conduct the following program: Haydn's Symphony No. 103, "The Drum Roll," Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite and the same composer's Rapsodie Espagnole.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES
DEC 21 1950

RECORDS

Bach Festival Music Features Top Artists

By Felix Borowski

ONE of the great recordings of the year just has been released by Columbia—the music of the great Bach festival at Prades, France, conducted by the famous violoncellist, Pablo Casals. It was held last June to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the Leipzig master's death.

Columbia has enshrined the greater part of the music played during the weeks of the festival in the Cathedral of St. Pierre. Some of the most noted musicians in the world took part.

The 10 12-inch LP records include the six Brandenburg concertos; two orchestral suites; three sonatas for violoncello and clavier (with the incomparable Casals as violoncellist); the Italian Concerto and Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue played by Rudolf Serkin; the D minor Concerto for violin (Joseph Szigeti); the D minor Concerto for two violins (Szigeti and Alexander Schneider), and the A minor Violin Concerto (Isaac Stern).

They also set forth such miscellaneous works as the Concerto for violin and oboe, that for piano, violin and flute, and the Concerto in F minor for piano. The recording of all pieces is exceptionally good. No admirer of Bach's music can afford to overlook this notable collection.

* * *

PROKOFIEFF'S orchestral fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf," is music of a different kind. Serge Koussevitzky made one recording of this piece for children, with Richard Hale as narrator. Now he has released another with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt reading the descriptive matter.

If Mrs. Roosevelt scarcely suggests the trained and professional narrator, she reads her lines so distinctly that not one is lost. The piece is heard on two sides of a 10-inch disk.

* * *

MERCURY CLASSICS issues an interesting group of pieces for a woodwind instrument in "A Flute Recital" played by Jean-Pierre Rampal, who, is a highly skilled performer.

The recital opens with a sonata by Bach for flute alone—a work discovered early in this century—and an early sonata for flute and piano by Beethoven. The modern pieces comprise Honegger's "Danse de la Chevre" (again for flute alone); Roussel's Andante and Scherzo for flute and piano; Paul Dukas' "La Plainte au Loin du Faune," and a sonata for two instruments by Hindemith. The playing and recording are admirable.

* * *

ON A 10-inch LP record the Haydn Society releases two sonatas for piano by Haydn—the 20th, in C minor, and the 50th, in C major—played by Virginia Pleasants, an American artist who recorded the works in Vienna. The performance is acceptable, though not very imaginative. The recording is excellent.

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 22 1950

Milwaukee Choir Offers Fine Music of Christmas

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

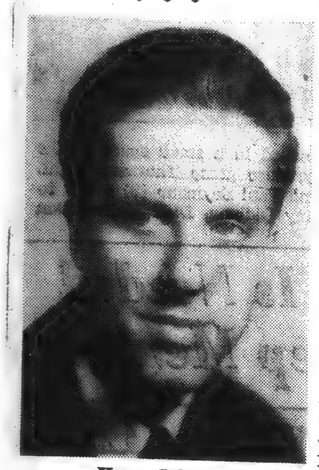
The Lutheran A Cappella Choir of Milwaukee has just issued an exceptionally fine album of Christmas recordings — recordings from which you will derive much pleasure and edification.

There are two reasons why I recommend these discs with wholehearted enthusiasm. In the first place, the music sung by the choir is beautiful, ennobling and uplifting; in the second place, the quality of the singing reflects deepfelt reverence as well as sterling artistry.

Hugo Gehrke directs the choir. His leadership is deft, precise and to the point; his readings breathe sincerity and understanding. Mr. Gehrke never resorts to cheap, tawdry and meretricious devices and effects. He goes with sharp and pertinent directness to the heart of the music. It is apparent at once that his conducting is founded on painstaking study. Mr. Gehrke focuses the attention of the listener on the music—not on Mr. Gehrke. I have respect and admiration for his ability.

UNDER MR. GEHRKE'S direction the Lutheran A Cappella Choir of Milwaukee sings "While Sherherds Watched Their Flocks by Night," set by Arthur Warrell, a contemporary British composer, to a traditional Yorkshire melody; "From Heaven Above," as arranged with consummate mastery by Johann Eccard; "Lay Down Your Staffs," an old French carol arranged by Franz Wasner, director of the Trapp Family Choir; three chorales from Johann Sebastian Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" ("Break Forth, O Beauteous, Heavenly Light" — "Beside Thy Cradle Here I Stand" —"Rejoice and Sing"); "The Shepherd's Carol," by William Billings, an American composer of colonial times; "The Shepherds Had an Angel," a movingly beautiful composition for solo soprano, viola and eight-part choir by Maurice Besly, a contemporary English composer; Father Wasner's tender and touching "Kindersegen" ("Children's Blessing"); and "On Christmas Eve," a medley of well-known Christmas hymns and carols arranged with fine skill by Mr. Gehrke.

* * *



Hugo Gehrke

THE RECORDING is excellent. Now and then the choir wanders slightly astray in the matter of pitch, but have you ever seen or heard a group of singers who consistently achieve perfect intonation at all times and in all places?

The album—78 rpm—is titled "Christmas Choral Music." (E. D. Nunn, 803 East Spooner Road, Milkaukee 11, Wis.).

GROWN-UPS as well as children will enjoy Joseph Haydn's "Toy Symphony" as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (RCA Victor 49-3013). The recording was made at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Haydn filled his "Toy Symphony" to the brim with fun.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 23 1950

MUSIC

Charles Munch Presents Most of Bach Christmas Oratorio With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

This year, thanks to conductor Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Christmas are appropriate to the season. They are devoted to the greater part of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, a work which at best is little known here. There is a chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler, and the soloists are Marguerite Willauer, soprano; Janice Moudry, contralto; William Hess, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The harpsichordist is Daniel Pinkham, and the organist E. Power Biggs.

Bach prepared the Christmas Oratorio for the Leipsic Christmas of 1734. It is not properly an oratorio at all, but a sequence of six cantatas intended to be performed, one to a day, on various days between Dec. 25 and Twelfth Night, or Epiphany, which is Jan. 6.

The text tells the story of Jesus' birth, as it is found in certain chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke. The arrangement of the music consists of choruses, chorales and arias, interspersed with tenor recitatives of The Evangelist. The whole of the Christmas Oratorio is too long for one concert, so Mr. Munch gives us the first three cantatas, and parts of the fourth and sixth, leaving out the fifth altogether. Elsewhere there are cuts.

Albert Schweitzer, the great Bach scholar, in explaining the origin of some of the Christmas Oratorio movements in a variety of secular cantatas that Bach had composed previously, was much disturbed by the artificial joining of secular music and sacred words in certain parts of the Christmas Oratorio, notably the arias.

That need not upset the non-academic listener, for somehow music is a house of many mansions, and the whole spirit of the Christmas Oratorio is one of alternate jubilation and tenderness. There is enormous variety, especially in the choral writing, and the work confronts you with a treasury of Bach at his richest and most inventive. When the chorus and orchestra are sounding, supported by organ and topped with the piercing high trumpet, there is the feeling that in this music is something of the power and the glory, forever and ever.

Orchestrally and chorally, yesterday's performance was a continuing joy, although the basses in the chorus were not numerous or loud enough. Over it all lay the ardent and devoted conducting of Mr. Munch, who somehow brings to Bach a compelling authority that not all conductors can muster. Of the soloists, only Mr. Pease sang with sufficient beauty of tone, and the freedom of execution and correctness of style which the music demands.

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
TRIBUNE-SUN
DEC 22 1950

My own preference goes to Berlioz' "Beatrice and Benedict" overture, done with brilliant lightness by the Boston Symphony under Charles Muench. "Beatrice" is Berlioz' only "opera comique," really nothing but a caprice in two acts. Bernard Shaw referred to Berlioz as a combination of "brains and brimstone." Here he brains bravura and brightness, a master of sheer note-spinning.

BUTTER, LAMB COSTS RISE

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 23 1950

MUSIC

Charles Munch Presents Most of Bach Christmas Oratorio With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

This year, thanks to conductor Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Christmas are appropriate to the season. They are devoted to the greater part of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, a work which at best is little known here. There is a chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler, and the soloists are Marguerite Willauer, soprano; Janice Moudry, contralto; William Hess, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The harpsichordist is Daniel Pinkham, and the organist E. Power Biggs.

Bach prepared the Christmas Oratorio for the Leipsic Christmas of 1734. It is not properly an oratorio at all, but a sequence of six cantatas intended to be performed, one to a day, on various days between Dec. 25 and Twelfth Night, or Epiphany, which is Jan. 6.

The text tells the story of Jesus' birth, as it is found in certain chapters of St. Matthew and St. Luke. The arrangement of the music consists of choruses, chorales and arias, interspersed with tenor recitatives of The Evangelist. The whole of the Christmas Oratorio is too long for one concert, so Mr. Munch gives us the first three cantatas, and parts of the fourth and sixth, leaving out the fifth altogether. Elsewhere there are cuts.

Albert Schweitzer, the great Bach scholar, in explaining the origin of some of the Christmas Oratorio movements in a variety of secular cantatas that Bach had composed previously, was much disturbed by the artificial joining of secular music and sacred words in certain parts of the Christmas Oratorio, notably the arias.

That need not upset the non-academic listener, for somehow music is a house of many mansions, and the whole spirit of the Christmas Oratorio is one of alternate jubilation and tenderness. There is enormous variety, especially in the choral writing, and the work confronts you with a treasury of Bach at his richest and most inventive. When the chorus and orchestra are sounding, supported by organ and topped with the piercing high trumpet, there is the feeling that in this music is something of the power and the glory, forever and ever.

Orchestrally and chorally, yesterday's performance was a continuing joy, although the basses in the chorus were not numerous or loud enough. Over it all lay the ardent and devoted conducting of Mr. Munch, who somehow brings to Bach a compelling authority that not all conductors can muster. Of the soloists, only Mr. Pease sang with sufficient beauty of tone, and the freedom of execution and correctness of style which the music demands.

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
BANNER
DEC 22 1950

Reviews Of Records

By JAMES PALMER WADE

ONE OF THIS COLUMN'S major woes is that it never gets records for Christmas. Or rather, has got them only twice. Once long ago, one of those forerunners of today's miniature records entitled "Rock Them Bones," a reference whose meaning escaped us for years. The other time, it was a dainty morsel by Josephine Baker in which she asked, in French, of course, if one desired any sugar cane. Very nice, but this year this column's heart is set on the Haydn Society's recording of "The Creation" or else on Vox's complete waxing of the opera "Electra."

Records being what they are, always available and always welcome, what could be better than a few last minute suggestions on what to give. You will find them also excellent suggestions as to what to buy for onesself!

✦ ✦ ✦

Anyone interested in operettas or musical comedy would be delighted with "Call Me Madam" as purveyed by Ethel Merman on Decca or by Dinah Shore with the original cast on Victor. Or if you can find them for they are very new, "The Firefly" in which Allen Jones revives Victor Herbert (on Victor), or either or both "Anything Goes" and "The Bandwagon," revived condensations of famous older musical comedies which have been recorded by Mary Martin for Columbia.

✦ ✦ ✦

The orchestra lover should be delighted with the set called "Toscanini Conducts Light Music," (Victor) if only for the fact that it shows that the Maestro has finally learned that "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (included with the "Skater's Waltz" and the overture to "Colas Breugnon"), is not to be hurried. Or try some of the brief discs which Alfred Newman and the Hollywood Symphony Orchestra have cut for the Mercury label: "Jamaican Rhumba" and the "Can Can" from "Gaite Parisienne" are some of the titles. If you have someone with more sophisticated taste in mind, try Roger Sessions' Symphony, beautifully recorded on Columbia. Or for the classic-minded collector who has everything, the perfect gift is Haydn's "Toy Symphony" in its first modern (and only third) recording, which is by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Victor).

✦ ✦ ✦

Columbia offers the two star new vocal collections. In one Bidu Sayao sings very sweetly through some of the sweetest of Mozart's lovely operatic arias. On the other, Eleanor Steber ranges through the vast extent of Verdi's taste in writing for the soprano voice. Whether called upon to be brilliant or dramatic, the gorgeous Steber organ holds its own. If it is songs that your giftee likes, Victor provides the answer in Marion Anderson's charming version of the Schumann song cyle "A Woman's Life and Love."

✦ ✦ ✦

Since most children are well provided with un-educational records anyhow, the task here is easier. Get the little varmint either Mrs. Roosevelt's waxing of "Peter and the Wolf" she reads it for Victor with the assistance of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra or else Columbia's vivid album called "The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra"—and dont' let that prissy title deceive you. It is an enchanting experience to hear and good music too. If neither of these appeal to you, snap up copies of Patti Page's "Tennessee Waltz" or of Dinah Shore's "Nobody Chasing Me" (Dinah sings for Victor now and please the parents as well as their chicks.

✦ ✦ ✦

Even for the chamber music enthusiast, it is simple. Just wrap up the new reading of Brahms' Piano Quintet recorded for Columbia by the Budapest Quartet.

✦ ✦ ✦

For that final fabulous suggestion: the entire set of Prades Bach Festival recordings all 10 12-inch LPs on Columbia. Marvelous and unendingly valuable. And so a Merry Merry Christmas to you all.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

Spins and Needles

By THOMAS ARCHER

JOSE AND AMPARO ITURBI: Debussy's En Blanc et Noir and Manuel Infante's Andalusian Dances Nos. 1 and 2. RCA-Victor, one long-play record.

This is the age of performance, possibly the most efficient in the history of music. And when two prodigies of the status of Jose and his sister, Amparo, make a team, the team makes news.

They have already recorded re-cently for RCA-Victor but this one bears them out as probably the team which will challenge all the others. Iturbi is among the most successful artists in what is, at the moment, the most competitive branch of executive music today. His sister, who gave a recital in Montreal some two years ago, is a ranking virtuoso.

Debussy composed the suite, En Blanc et Noir, which is typically representative of his genius, at the very end of his career. It is a charming piece of music beautifully written for the medium she was herself a pianist. The Iturbis do a magnificently co-ordinated job with it.

On the reverse side are two dances by Manuel Infante, the Spanish composer whom Iturbi brought to international attention as long ago as 1921 when the pianist introduced his compositions in Paris. The dances are fine examples of Spanish music made familiar chiefly through ballet. They are, of course, played with complete authority.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI: Siegfried's Rhine Journey and the Funeral Music from Wagner's Goetterdaemmerung and Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasy. The Philharmonic-Symphony of New York conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Columbia, one long-play record.

The recording is a tribute to Leopold Stokowski who, it will be remembered, was the first conductor and executive musician to give his time to recording and radio broadcasting in a truly professional way. It may be said that it was Stokowski who discovered how to engineer mechanical tone.

The two items are pretty well hackneyed. But they come out wonderfully well under the old maestro's direction. He makes great play with the Wagnerian instrumentation. The coloring is opulent, brass parts are brilliantly done. The orchestra is really dramatized.

There is drama too in the Tchaikovsky piece, if you like it. This is a richly balanced performance which gives the overture-fantasy its full rights. But it still contains much sound and fury until the Great Love Theme comes in.

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67. The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. RCA-Victor, one long-play record.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony must be the terror of all those responsible for its performance. It very rarely appears on symphony programs.

George Grove was right in saying it is the keystone of the symphony. As in his Violin Concerto Beethoven follows the classic rules of concentrated simplicity. The best thing to do is to follow Beethoven in his miraculous development of intense drama and classical form, and achievement, it may be safely said, without parallel.

What Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra do in this recording can only be left to the judgment of the individual listener. This reviewer has in his library a recording of the Fifth Symphony made in 1927 (one of the first electrical ones) by Felix Weingartner and the London Philharmonic Orchestra. The Koussevitzky and Weingartner recordings are fair game to compare. They are as different in pace living as the years which have elapsed during the 23 years between them have elapsed.

By ORPHEAN
DECCA

Ethel Merman has been called the First Lady of Musical Comedy and her latest album of songs from the hit Call Me Madam finds her at her lustiest, liveliest best. Irving Berlin's music, as usual, is superb. The collection includes The Best Thing for You—Marrying for Love — You're Just in Love — It's a Lovely Day Today — Ocarina and others. Dick Haymes, Eileen Wilson and the Gordon Jenkins orchestra and chorus share honors with Ethel.

Louis Jordan's new slow blues number finds him looking for a chick that only drinks Lemonade. We hope he finds her, but he seems doubtful. The reverse side is a foxtrot where he again has woman trouble. This time his baby has dyed her hair Chartreuse.

I See a Million People is another old timer making a comeback. It is backed by If I were a Blackbird, a sad little ballad of a maid deserted by her sailor boy. Gloria de Haven does the lyrics.

Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians have come up with two catchy little tunes from the picture The West Point Story. Both are in foxtrot rhythm and Kenny Gardner supplies the vocals for It's Raining Sundrops, while Bill Flanagan takes care of Long Before I Knew You.

The incomparable Bing is back with two songs from his picture Mr. Music—Wouldn't It be Funny and Once More the Blue and White. No matter what the tune, it is always a pleasure to hear Crosby.

R.C.A. VICTOR

Two French releases deserve honorable mention this week. C'est Noel and Reel de St. Nicholas, recorded by la Famille Soucy—and Il est ne le Divine Enfant backed by La Vierge a la Creche, with vocals by Jean Lumiere, are timed for Christmas listening.

Again the songs from Call Me Madam, this time by Hugo Winterhalter's orchestra. Once Upon a Time Today—a fairy tale romance of a princess and just a guy, backed by Something to Dance About. Nice contrast here—one side slow and dreamy, the other peppy and danceable.

Cole Porter music is usually Out of This World and these two tunes from the musical as done by Vaughn Munro leave little to be desired. Vocals for both Use Your Imagination and I Am Loved are sung by Vaughn himself.

Our Lady Of Fatima has started a new trend. The latest, It Is No Secret, is a semi-religious song telling of the wonders which God can perform. On the under side is To Think You've Chosen Me—both by the Three Suns and very, very nice listening.

Somebody's Crying sung by Tommy Furtado is a sad little ditty hardly in keeping with the gay Christmas season, but he manages to revive his spirits with Get Happy a peppy number from out of the past.

You Love Me and When You Kiss A Stranger by Hugo Winterhalter's orchestra and both featuring Eddie Fisher, one of our favorite vocalists.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 23 1950

Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony had to reach its 70th season before any of its conductors had the bright idea of performing at the concerts nearest to Christmas the Christmas Oratorio of Bach. Dr. Koussevitzky used to favor seasonal music of some sort in connection with both Christmas and Easter, and then got quite out of the habit.

Anyway, Mr. Munch gave us the Christmas Oratorio yesterday and it will, of course, be repeated tonight. The entire work could not be performed within the time proper to a symphony concert and the fifth of its six parts was omitted and some cuts were made besides. The chorus, like that for last season's performance of Honegger's "Joan of Arc at the Stake," is one especially trained by Arthur Fiedler, a volunteer group consisting of both professional and amateur singers, designed to assist the orchestra on occasions such as this.

Yesterday, as before, it proved itself an admirable body. Mr. Fiedler had prepared it well and in performance it was fully responsive to Mr. Munch's wishes. The orchestra has an important part to play in this work, quite fully scored for Bach and its contribution was a noble one. I would like to say as much for the soloists, but taken as a whole, they did not measure up to the other participants. James Pease has a fine voice, which was heard to good advantage in the airs and recitatives for bass. William Hess, the tenor, found the tessitura of the Evangalist's recitatives uncomfortably high and often resorted to something resembling a falsetto. Marguerite Willauer, the soprano, and Janice Moudry, the contralto, sang pleasingly but hardly impressively.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a realist, his successor a traditionalist. In works such as this and the St. John Passion, of last spring, Mr. Munch prefers the original German, and where Dr. Koussevitzky omits the repetition of part one in the da capo arias, Mr. Munch insists that everything be sung. Had he followed Koussevitzky's example, more of the work could have been heard.

And now for the music itself, which is little known in these parts. Much of it is glorious, though the prevailing mood, as might be expected from Bach, is one of tenderness. In the choral portion are many fine accompanied chorales, one of which, "Break forth, O beauteous heavenly light," is well known; and the pastoral Sinfonia is sometimes heard. As in the Passions, there is a narrating Evangalist singing the Biblical text and Scriptural passages are occasionally allotted to the other singers and to the chorus, but most of the text was furnished by Bach's librettist, Henrici. In the arias we find again the somewhat unvocal writing and the figurated accompaniment, often with instrumental obbligato, that is prized by devotees of Bach but might fall strangely on unaccustomed ears. Finally, for bringing us what was possible of the work, and in such generally eloquent performance, we are greatly in Mr. Munch's debt.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 24 1950

Tcherepnin to Play His Second Piano Concerto at Symphony

Alexander Tcherepnin, the pianist and composer, will be soloist in the first Boston performances of his own Second Piano Concerto at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall, Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30. The work is in one movement.

At these concerts, conductor Charles Munch will present music by Anton Bruckner, the first by this composer that Mr. Munch will have conducted in this country. The work is the Seventh Symphony. Mr. Munch will open the program with Gluck's Overture to "Alceste."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 1950

Symphony Plays New Tcherepnin, Bruckner

At the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 29 and 30, Charles Munch will be heard in the music of Bruckner for the first time in this country, conducting the Seventh Symphony. He will also introduce at this pair of concerts the Second Piano Concerto by Alexander Tcherepnin in which the composer will appear as soloist. The Concerto is in one movement. The program will open with Gluck's Overture to "Alceste."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 23 1950

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was given over the Bach's Christmas Oratorio. The soloists were Marguerite Willauer, soprano; Janie Moudry, contralto; William Hess, tenor and James Pease, bass.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The more I hear Charles Munch do Bach the more certain I am that he ranks with the greatest Bach players of our times.

As a matter of fact he is more than a player of Bach; he is a true interpreter in the best sense of the word. For he reveals, he extends, he touches and projects the depthless reservoir that is Bach with infinite devotion. He hears things and finds things and unfolds things in Bach as few others do, seeking out and setting forth the voice leading of the polyphony, finding andd focussing the drama of Bach's matchless welding of the meaning of words with associative musical values, and endowing the whole with drama, with force, and with passion. It is, in short, in contrast to the four-square beat, the merely motorical drive and the dryness of the conventional conception, an act of interpretation that is at once as warm, as human and as infinitely personal as Bach's own creativity.

EXTENT OF ART

Though he does the massive choral fugues, the accompanied arias and the four part chorales with all the qualities mentioned above, the extent of his art is most easily perceived in his way with the recitatives. In the usual course of events, these recitatives are things to be got over as inconspicuously as possible, as moments of dead air necessary only to the plot. With Munch these recitatives achieve a radiance of expression of matchless musical beauty combined with narrative impact. Despite their conventional modulations, Bach gave them astounding variety and freshness, using two flutes or two oboes or the string quartet or perhaps merely a commentary in the cellos, to embroider or enhance the effect of the declamatory vocal line. And it is in presenting these that Munch's true depths as a Bach interpreter may be most readily seen.

Yesterday, in the recitatives, he was very happily assisted by the splendid recitative style—and the extraordinary ennunciation — of William Hess, whose voice, though perhaps not quite as large as the circumstances might indicate, well conveyed the narrative awe of the Evangelist. In his solo arias he was often covered, as was Marguerite Willauer (a young soprano with a voice of great purity and lovely quality) whose middle and low voice was not sufficiently projected for the size of the hall.

Janice Moudry, with a contralto voice notable for the differing qualities of it almost from note to note, had somewhat more success in scaling her singing to the circumstances, and achieved an interpretative quality of spirit and vitalness moreover. It was left, however, to James Pease to bring both the proper bigness of voice and of musical conception to the scene; I found his singing most nearly suited to Munch's demands, which are as exacting as the music itself.

CHORUS EXCELLENT

Once again Arthur Fiedler's chorus (or should we call it the Symphony Chorale?), a group gathered together and trained by Mr. Fiedler, demonstrated its eminence as a choral group. It produces, in all voices, at tone that is extremely musical, light and very fluent but capable of dynamic climax. It is smart in its attack, it doesn't pant for breath nor heave bosoms or shoulders, and it is balanced, too. It was, in short, well trained, and it was able to follow every subtlety of Munch's demands.

As for the Oratorio itself, it might be said that although it does not have the overwhelming devotional quality of the St. Matthew Passion or the overall impact of the B minor Mass, it does have moments of extraordinary beauty and tenderness, and in Munch's compression of the score (he omits one cantata and perhaps a dozen or more numbers form the other five), it offers a truly enthralling musical experience of deep seasonal significance.

A special word for Mr. Burgin's violin obbligato, for the horn playing (in a frightful register) of Messrs. Stagliano and Shapiro, for the harpsichord continuo of Daniel Pinkham, for the high trumpet playing of Roger Voisin, and for the exquisite orchestral realization of the pastoral symphony, and to next week's program: Gluck's Overture to "Alceste," Tcherepnin's Second Piano Concerto (the composer as soloist) and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

This Clipping From AMARILLO, TEXAS
GLOBE
DEC 24 1950

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are represented on the Red Seal single list with a new recording of Haydn's beloved "Toy" Symphony. It is the first release of the delightful little composition on a 45 RPM disk.

This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD ADVERTISER
DEC 24 1950

The Music Box

BY BILL BELANGER

People don't like to admit their prejudices if indeed they do. One we freely admit is that anything by Tschaikovsky ought to be good. Our favorite in the prejudice line is the Violin Concerto in D. This month a brilliant new recording of it has been made by RCA Victor on 45 and 33 1-3. Jascha Heifetz performs with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Walter Susskind conducting. Recorded in England, the Heifetz reading is unsurpassed for tonal splendor. The soaring lyricism of the Tschaikovsky melodies comes to its climax under the skillful fingers of Heifetz.

For the piano lovers Horowitz has done an album of seven Chopin mazurks. The Horowitz technique is flawless and does full justice to three in C Sharp Minor, two in F sharp and one in D flat.

Of the seven, two were previously recorded by Horowitz — the Mazurka in C-Sharp Minor, Op. 50, No. 3, still available on special order, and the Mazurka in C-Sharp Minor, Op. 30, No. 4. Horowitz recorded the other five mazurkas in this new album for the first time. These are: Mazurkas in F-Sharp Minor, Op. 59, No. 3; C-Sharp Minor, Op. 41, No. 1; F-Minor, Op. 63, No. 2; D-Flat, op. 30, No. 3; and C-Sharp Minor, Op. 63, No. 3. The release of the new Chopin album makes this group of seven mazurkas available for the first time on 45 and 33-1-3 rpm discs.

RCA Victor's Yuletide collection of Red Seal albums and singles does not slight the old masters. There are six new albums on the December release list: Cladimir Horowitz does an outstanding reading of the Schubert "Kinderscenen;" the Boston Symphony Orchestra is featured in three new recordings—Schubert's 2nd Symphony, under the baton of Charles Munch, Mozart's beloved "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Haydn's Symphony No. 92 ("Oxford"), both directed by Serge Koussevitzky. Beethoven addicts will find particular delight in a new and discerning reading of the Symphony No. 5, played by Pierre Monteux and the San Francisco Orchestra.

[200]

RECORDS: TWO VERSIONS OF 'FLEDERMAUS'

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

WITH Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus in the news these days, it is pertinent to speak of new recordings of the work. The Metropolitan Opera's version of the opera will be recorded in good season. In the meantime, here are releases by Victor and London.

Victor has confined itself to highlights from "Fledermaus." Its cast includes a number of the Metropolitan Opera singers, who have appeared or will appear in the revival of the piece—Patrice Munsel, Regina Resnik, Risë Stevens, Robert Merrill, Jan Peerce, and Hugh Thompson. Fritz Reiner is the conductor and the chorus is drawn from the Robert Shaw Chorale. The orchestra is the first-rate ensemble of men from the leading symphonies in town which goes under the name of R. C. A. Victor Orchestra.

It is a lively performance. Mr. Reiner's conducting has the precision and elasticity needed for Strauss, and the singers do their jobs with spirit. The English translation by Ruth and Thomas Martin, while not quite so sprightly as the Garson Kanin-Howard Dietz version current at the Metropolitan, is fairly apt.

The London recording is an official production of the Vienna Opera. Where the Victor version requires only one twelve-inch disk, London uses two. London, in short, is offering all the musical numbers. It is also offering a thoroughly integrated production which has grace, lightness and effervescence. If it were not for the fact that the London version is sung in German, one would have no reservations about this recording.

The cast includes Julius Patzak, Hilde Gueden, Anton Dermota, Alfred Poell, Wilma Lipp, Kurt Preger, Sieglinde Wagner and August Jaresch. Clemens Krauss conducts the work with affection and understanding.

To one who has heard these recordings as well as the Metropolitan production in the same week, "Fledermaus" has not lost its savor. In its genre it is imperishable.

Regina Resnik. Abresch

Jan Peerce.

Vivaldi

The significance and mastery of Vivaldi are earning new appreciation in our day. His music is being recorded increasingly. One of the most ambitious releases comes from Concert Hall Society — Il Cimento dell'Armonia e dell'Invenzione, Op. 8. This opus, which includes twelve concertos for violin and orchestra, is a mine of musical ideas and ingenuity of treatment.

The first four concertos, known as "The Seasons," were recorded separately by Concert Hall Society. Here are the remaining eight in an album of two twelve-inch disks, with Louis Kaufman as the violinist and Clemens Dahinden as the conductor. The performances are vital and illuminating.

Another delightful collection called The Vivaldi Concerto, including five works in the concerto style, is contributed by Period Records on a twelve-inch disk. The performers include Vienna and Paris groups, with Carroll Glenn, American violinist, as soloist in some of the works. The playing is straightforward and serious.

OTHER REVIEWS

An unusual, but peculiarly seasonal atmosphere is created on The Christmas Music Box (Sounds of Our Times, ten-inch). Twenty selections, played on six separate masterpieces of the automatic-music craft, are reproduced with astonishing fidelity. They include a number of the familiar carols plus such works as Prayer from William Tell, Rossini's Stabat Mater and the Skaters' Waltz, played on what sounds like bells of all sizes.

They range from rich, sedate bass to trembling little embellishments of molten silver. The boxes are from the collection of George and Madeleine Brown.

The original version of Schoenberg's early Verklaerte Nacht is played with understanding by the Hollywood Quartet—Felix Slatkin, Paul Shure, Paul Robyn, Eleanor Aller, plus Alvin Dinkin, viola, and Kurt Reher, 'cello (Capitol, ten-inch). It is a sensitive and yielding work in this form.

Kodaly's extraordinary Sonata for unaccompanied 'cello (1915) is played with virtuoso technique and intensity of effect by Janos Starker (Period, twelve-inch). The extended work makes use of Hungarian folk-themes, is imaginatively conceived and derives additional richness from special tuning of the instrument. Worth your attention.

Twelve songs by American composers are collected on Rose Bampton Sings for You, issued with miniature scores as part of a new kind of promotional campaign by the Presser Company of Philadelphia (twelve-inch). Miss Bampton sings with beauty and color, and the surface is practically noiseless, but the songs ("for every occasion") are uniformly sentimental and predictable. C. H.

Beethoven's Eighth

Ever since it began making records turning at 33 1/3 r. p. m. last spring, RCA Victor has been engaged in the process of getting the standard classics into its long-playing catalogue. In three of its latest transfers it has made particularly happy choices of the artists to record the works.

Who, for instance, is better suited to conduct one of Beethoven's most joyous works, the Eighth Symphony, than Pierre Monteux? On a ten-inch disk he leads the San Francisco Symphony in an utterly winning performance of the symphony—one that catches its charm with precision, delicacy and dancing vivacity.

Serge Koussevitzky, too, was an excellent choice for Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik and Haydn's Oxford Symphony. And these works are paired on opposite sides of a twelve-inch disk. The fine performances were recorded while the Boston Symphony was at Tanglewood last summer.

Another charming item picked up at Tanglewood—also played by the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Koussevitzky—is Haydn's Toy Symphony. Being brief, it has been done on one of the small 45 r. p. m. disks on which it fits nicely.

Timed for the Christmas season RCA Victor has issued a set of 45 r. p. m. holiday records sung by the Mitchell Boychoir, a group that appeared in the film, "Going My Way." Bob Mitchell, its founder, is the conductor-organist and the renditions are unpretentious and pleasing though not especially finished. R. P.

Schubert

EMS Records have started an integral series of the Schubert piano sonatas as played by Webster Aitken. The first to be released, numbered Vol. 10, is the posthumous C minor Sonata—a wonderful work, formally rather disarranged and repetitious (like most of Schubert's late sonatas), but packed full of unforgettable melody. Mr. Aitken's playing sets the projected series off to a good start. His performance is severe—some might consider it angular—and he is less interested in color than content. Real musical probity is always present, and the honesty of the performance tends to make the sonata a more cohesive unit than usually is encountered.

In a two-disk Lyrichord set, Erno Balogh presents a Bach recital consisting of all the Two Part Inventions, the Three Part Inventions, the Four Duets and the Eighteen Little Preludes. An interesting departure offered by this recording company is an arrangement they have made with the publishers of the above music, whereby the purchaser of the records is entitled to a copy of either the Inventions, Duets or Preludes. Mr. Balogh's playing, precise and not overly imaginative, is able enough to meet the basic requirements of the music.

One of the month's novelties is a Westminster coupling of Rimsky-Korsakoff's B flat Quintet for Piano and Winds and Glinka's Trio Pathétique, scored for clarinet, bassoon and piano. A group of Viennese musicians are the participants, with Paul Badura-Skoda the pianist in the Glinka and Roland Raupenstrauch the pianist in the companion work.

In both of these compositions there is a certain historical charm, and Westminster is to be congratulated for its enterprise in releasing them. One cannot pretend, though, that the musical content is exactly exhilarating. Rimsky's long work is a rather static example of Russian academism, with some folkish themes occasionally penetrating the Westernized, rather Mendelssohnian treatment. H. C. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 24 1950

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 24 1950

Mrs. Roosevelt Makes Debut:— RCA Victor's December Red Seal list marks the recording debut of one of the most distinguished American citizens—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt — in Prokofieff's perennially popular "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Made at Tanglewood, Mass., during the 1950 Berkshire Festival. The recording is a permanent memento of the public performance given the work by Mrs. Roosevelt with the Boston Symphony orchestra which drew high praise from the musical press assembled for the occasion. The records are being released simultaneously on all three speeds, replacing an earlier Boston Symphony version which featured Richard Hale as narrator.

To record "Peter and the Wolf" the former First Lady flew to Tanglewood from her Hyde Park home on August 11. After a morning rehearsal she went before RCA Victor microphones with all the calmness of a veteran. Wrote New York Times music critic Howard Taubman of the recording session: "Mrs. Roosevelt spoke her part simply and charmingly. She sounded like a grandmother reading a pleasant little story to her grandchildren . . . . Mrs. Roosevelt turned over half of the honorarium paid to her by RCA Victor for her share in the recording to the Berkshire Music Center and donated the other half to the Wiltwyck School for Boys." (A charitable institution for under privileged children of which she is a founder and board member).

There are few musical compositions—with such wide appeal to all ages of music lovers as "Peter and the Wolf." Its naivete and delightful humor provide this magnetism and with such an adept raconteur as Eleanor Roosevelt, this December album is one of the most unusual debuts in the company's long association with distinguished performers.—BOB PITTS & BOB PAGE.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER
DEC 24 1950

Records in Review

By J. ALBERT FRACHT

BACH: "CANTATA NO. 131 AUS DER TIEFE". The Robert Shaw Chorale with the RCA Victor orchestra. Robert Shaw, conductor. Paul Mathen, bass. William Hess, tenor. Robert Bloom, oboe. Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord. Bernard Greenhouse, cello. RCA-Victor album DM-1425. Three 12-inch records. Also WDM-1425. Three 7-inch 45 rpm records. Also Lp record LM 1100. Other side BACH: "WACHET AUF, RUFT, UNS DER TIEFI (CANTATA NO. 131)".

If Shaw could do as well with his orchestra as he does with his Chorale, this Bach would be something to rave about. His soloists are all excellent, and the performance is on the whole, reverent and deeply affecting. Recording good.

ROSSINI: "CENERENTOLA (CINDERELLA)" Abridged version of the opera. Recorded in Italy. Cesare Valletti, tenor. Saturno Meletti, baritone. Cristiano Dalamangas, bass. Guilietta Simionato, mezzo-soprano. Miti Truccato Pace, mezzo-soprano. Ornella Rovero, soprano. Vito Susco, bass. Conductor Mario Rossi. Orchestra and chorus of Radio Italiana. Director of chorus, Bruno Erminero. Cetra-Soria Album 1208. Two twelve inch LP records.

Conductor Mario Rossi, knows his business, and the result is a wonderful heart warming production. Cetra-Soria deserves more than gratitude for this release.

"CINDERELLA" is a story familiar to all of us. Unfortunately the opera is not, and it is to be hoped that this exciting recording will help to create a demand for it's production at the Metropolitan so that we may enjoy the privilege of witnessing a living performance.

We would like to recommend, that this cast of soloists, chorus and conductor would be ideal. The recording quality is amazingly lifelike.

"MUSIC FOR THE FLUTE". William Kincaid, flute. With Vladimir Sokoloff, piano. Benedetto Marcello: "SONATA in "F" Paul Hindemith: "SONATA 1936" Saint-Saens: "AIRS DE BALIET" Andre Caplet: "REVERIE: PETITE VALSE" Debussy: "SYRINX. Henry Duetillex: "SONATINE" Columbia LP record ML 4339.

An interesting and delightful collection. No less fascinating is the artistry of William Kincaid. Recording excellent.

PROKOFIEFF: "PETER AND THE WOLF, OP. 67". Eleanor Roosevelt, narrator. with the Boston symphony. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. RCA-Victor album DM-1437. Also WDM-1437. Also LP record LM-45.

PETER AND THE WOLF, is an old favorite with the Boston symphony and is always a stimulating experience to the audience when Koussevitsky conducts it. Both orchestra and conductor add laurels to their glory this time.

Mrs. Roosevelt does not try to be cute. She is obviously sincere and really works herself into an excited pitch. After a few hearings, the listener should be able to detach himself from the thought that the voice belongs to Eleanor Roosevelt, and that it is a good story, well told. Recording excellent.

HEART OF THE VIOLIN CONCERTO". Mischa Mischakoff, violinist. The RCA Victor orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. RCA Victor album DM-1428. Four 78 rpm records. Also WDM-1428. Four 7-inch 45 rpm records. Also LP record LMX-1101.

Selected movements from violin concertos by Mozart, Tchaikowsky, Beethoven, Bruch, Lalo, Mendelssohn, Weinawski, and Brahms.

Mischakoff, has been the concert master of the NBC Symphony orchestra since it was organized. He is considered by many, to be the greatest concertmaster in the world today.

If any proof were needed to show that he deserves his enviable reputation, here it is. His Stradivarious, sounds like one. (Very often they are made to sound like a most inferior instrument). He displays in each of the various movements, the same good taste and the ability to adapt himself to the demands and style of the different composers. It is a relief to listen to a musician of such sterling qualities and penetrating understanding.

Footloose Rhythms highly recommended:

Bob Dewey: "NARCISSUS-SMILE, SMILE, SMILE" RCA Victor record 47-3981.

Frankie Carle: "POWDER BLUE-I'M AFRAID TO LOVE YOU". RCA Victor 47-3980.

Six Fat Dutchmen: "BARNYARD POLKA—SLIP HORN" RCA Victor 51-1181.

Ray Anthony: "MY HEART IS OUT OF TOWN—HARLEM NOCTURNE". Capital 1249.

Billy Eckstine: "I GUESS I'LL HAVE TO DREAM THE REST—I'M SO CRAZY FOR LOVE". MGM record 10865.

Johnny Desmond: "YOU'RE THE ONLY ONE FOR ME—C'EST LA VIE". Capitol 10850.

[20]

This Clipping From MIDDLETOWN, OHIO
JOURNAL
DEC 24 1950

Record Reviews

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt Makes Record Debut With RCA Victor

RCA Victor's December Red Seal list marks the recording debut of a distinguished American citizen — Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt — in Prokofieff's perennially popular "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Made at Tanglewood, Mass. during the 1950 Berkshire Festival, the recording is a permanent memento of the public performance given by Mrs. Roosevelt which drew high praise from the musical press. The records are being released simultaneously on all three speeds, replacing an earlier Boston Symphony version which featured Richard Hale as narrator.

To record "Peter and the Wolf" the former First Lady flew to Tanglewood from her Hyde Park home on August 11th. After a morning rehearsal she went before RCA Victor microphones with all the calmness of a veteran. Wrote New York Times music critic Howard Taubman of the recording session: "Mrs. Roosevelt spoke her part simply and charmingly. She sounded like a grandmother reading a pleasant little story to her grandchildren...Mrs. Roosevelt turned over half of the honorarium paid to her by RCA Victor for her share in the recording to the Berkshire Music Center and donated the other half to the Wiltwyck School for Boys." (Wiltwyck is a charitable institution for underprivileged children of which she is a founder and board member).

That evening Mrs. Roosevelt gave a "live" performance of "Peter and the Wolf" with Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which elicited further praise from Mr. Taubman.

There are few musical compositions with such wide appeal to all ages of music lovers as "Peter and the Wolf." Its naivete and delightful humor provide this magnetism, and with such an adept raconteur as Eleanor Roosevelt, this December album is one of the most unusual debuts in the company's long association with distinguished performers.

* * *

THE MUSICAL ALLIANCE of Leroy Anderson and Arthur Fiedler is a happy one, as evidenced by the popularity of their recent collaborations, among them "Irish Suite." This month as a Red Seal single, Fiedler leads the Boston Pops Orchestra in an Anderson arrangement of the famous "(Put Another Nickel In) Music! Music! Music!" for symphony orchestra, as played on an imagnery "classical" juke box.

Both the "Classical Juke Box" and the other side, "Syncopated Clock," are new, two-speed additions to the Red Seal catalog. Both are rhythmic and lighthearted, and with the Fiedler touch emerge as musical entertainment that will enhance any music-collector's library of recordings.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
DEC 4 1950

MUSIC

Choral Groups And Musicians Bring Christmas To Shut-ins

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

For the youngsters, there is only one Santa Claus—he will really be a busy man this evening. But for us older ones, there are many St. Nicks, a happy fact which would be joyfully substantiated in particular by the inmates of our various church homes, institutions, and hospitals. At this time of year, many of our various choral groups and musicians take their "musical packs" on their backs and bring cheer through programs given to really appreciative audiences throughout this vicinity.

Most of us just can't realize how much these Christmas programs mean to people who seldom see performers in the flesh. The writer happened to be present at one of these musical programs recently and can personally attest to the enthusiasm shown by the audience, many of whom shook the performers' hands and expressed their heartfelt appreciation when the program was over. Surely, the many programs provided by considerate groups for our less fortunate brethren are an expression of the true Christmas spirit!

Music Club Federation Announces Scholarships

An organization which is doing a wonderful job of furthering interest in music in America is the National Federation of Music Clubs. Through scholarships and other awards made throughout the year, this group of national scope is notable for its outstanding efforts towards the realization of a "musical America."

Through the courtesy of Mrs. George J. Kuhn, local publicity chairman, this department has been advised of an impressive new scholarship program instituted by the organization and also of a contest open to all native composers.

Included in the new program are a three year scholarship in strings at the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore and several scholarships next Summer at Pennsylvania College for women.

The Peabody scholarship was inspired in part by the current shortage of string players as well as by the desire to encourage the study of stringed instruments. This award, valued at $600 per year (a total of $1,500) covers all four categories—violin, viola, 'cello, and double bass—and also includes a solo appearance with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Reginald Stewart, director of the Peabody Conservatory. Auditions for this scholarship are scheduled for March 18 to April 22 of next year.

The Pennsylvania scholarships cover a six-week summer course opening June 19 and continuing through July 29, and are valued at $275 each. Auditions are to be conducted in the 48 states with a winner selected in every state. Information regarding the Peabody and Pennsylvania College for women scholarships is obtainable from Mrs. Hazel Post Gillette, 900 Southland Avenue, Fort Worth, Texas or from the National Federation of Music Clubs, 455 West 23d Street, New York 11, N. Y.

Another scholarship offered by Mr. A. J. Fletcher of Raleigh, N. C. the national chairman of opera, covers an eight-week course in stage directing at the famous Seagle Colony at Schroon Lake, New York. This is valued at $450 and covers room, board and tuition. Instruction embraces voice training, English, French, and Italian diction and the usual work incident to an operatic course also stage direction. For information write A. J. Fletcher, P. O. Box 1406, Raleigh, N. C.

Young Composers' Contest Held For Ninth Year

Terms of the ninth annual Young Composers Contest of the National Federation of Music Clubs are jointly announced by Dr. Francis J. Pyle of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, national chairman of these events and Mrs. Royden J. Keith of Chicago, national president.

This year the contest has a single category instead of the customary three, and a larger monetary award for the first prize winner. The composition sought is a chamber music work for not less than two or more than five instruments, of which one may be the piano, and one must be either a brass or woodwind instrument. Winner of first place will be given a cash award of $150, and $50 is the second prize.

The competition is open to native or naturalized composers resident in the United States or its possessions who are not less than 16 and not more than 25 years of age on April 1, 1951, the date when the contests close. In the case of veterans, this age limit is extended by the length of time spent in the service.

Judges are to be Charles Haubiel, composer and director of the Composers Press, New York City; George F. McKay, Professor of Music at the University of Washington, and Burnett C. Tuthill, Director of Music at Southwestern College, Memphis, Tenn.

Boston Symphony Opens Rehearsals To Students

A new experiment was tried recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch. The final evening rehearsal of the week was thrown open to students of all colleges and advanced schools. The idea grew from the inability of many students to hear Boston's orchestra, due to a completely subscribed season. The experiment has a precedent in the earliest days of the orchestra, when the final rehearsals on Friday afternoons were similarly opened to students for a small charge. These rehearsals gradually came to be regular subscription concerts, save for a block of "rush" seats in the second balcony which are far from sufficient for present demands.

Mr. Munch appeared in the loose jacket and crepe-soled lounging shoes which he wears at rehearsals, and many of the orchestra members were in shirtsleeves. According to one newspaper report: "Blazing sweaters turned the floor of the hall into a many-hued rug from above," this in contrast to the formal attire of the customary Bostonian subscription audience. Yehudi Menuhin, who was to be the soloist of that weekend's concerts, was eager to take part in the new venture and went through Mozart's posthumous Seventh Violin Concerto to the delight of the young audience.

They proved one or this orchestra's most attentive audiences, showing a keen interest in the brilliant playing, combined with occasional interruptions and repetitions whereby Mr. Munch applied finishing touches —a fascinating glimpse of orchestral working methods, they agreed.

Major Musical Events Due Next Month

At this time, a "preview" of some of the early events scheduled for the New Year would seem to be in order. All of our major concert series have events arranged for next month, with the Woolsey Hall Series topping the list with two programs.

In chronological order, next month's major events are as follows: January 9, Syzmon Goldberg, violinist; January 12, Bruce Simonds, pianist; January 16, Budapest String Quartet; January 23, New Haven Symphony; January 30, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist.

Syzmon Goldberg Plans Unique Program

The next appearance of Syzmon Goldberg here will provide the audience with a unique program. Mr. Goldberg made his first local appearance two years ago with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra. In his second visit here next month, the eminent violinist will appear as the soloist-director of a chamber orchestra of 23 string players. The ensemble has been enthusiastically acclaimed for its concerts to date and Mr. Goldberg has proved to be both an excellent conductor as well as a virtuoso performer. The artist's idea in using this instrumental group is to present some compositions as they were played during the period when they were written; that is, without conductor.

Dean Simonds' Piano Recital January 12

On Friday evening, January 12, Bruce Simonds will give a piano recital in Sprague Memorial Hall. Though Mr. Simonds is the busy Dean of the Yale Music School, he manages to find time each year to play an appreciable number of recitals and solo performances. Earlier this season, he appeared as soloist with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the current series.

Budapest String Quartet Coming To Sprague Hall

The third event in the Chamber Music Series at Sprague Memorial Hall will present the celebrated Budapest String Quartet on Tuesday evening, January 16. The name of this group has been for many years synonymous with the best in quartet playing. Each year the players give 100 concerts, including an annual series of programs at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C. The quartet returned to this country recently after another highly successful European tour.

Alfred Newman To Conduct New Haven Symphony

The next New Haven Symphony program on Tuesday evening, January 23, will be notable for the appearance of a native New Havener, Alfred Newman, as guest conductor. Mr. Newman is an outstanding composer in the field of motion pictures and a four time winner of the coveted Academy Award for his scores. This concert will be in the nature of a triumphant homecoming for Mr. Newman and should attract one of the largest audiences in the entire series.

Fifth Woolsey Hall Program To Feature Horowitz

On Tuesday, January 30, the most sensational pianist in the current scene will make another visit here to perform in the fifth program of the Woolsey Hall Series. Vladimir Horowitz is the artist in question, of course. The artist draws listeners as honey draws flies for he can play louder and faster than any other pianist in the business. His recital should provide a fitting climax to a group of fine musical events here next month.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS AND A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL!

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 24 1950

Music News: Reminiscence

By ARTHUR BERGER

Hilarity and general good will were reported in the press as running high at the revival of "Fledermaus" both in the audience and on stage. The previous performance at the Metropolitan Opera House was a rather different affair. This took place, it now seems, thirty-five years ago rather than forty-five, as the Met's press department maintained. We are indebted for this information to Clara T. Nichols, who took exception to the statement in last Sunday's Herald Tribune that the Strauss operetta was last given by the Metropolitan Opera forty-five years ago. The statement still holds, since the performance at the Metropolitan Opera House on May 8, 1915, was a benefit for the German Red Cross, and not a production of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose season ended before that date. For this reason, it is not in the official records, and no one is to be blamed seriously for oversight. The 1915 performance came the day after the sinking of the Lusitania, and Miss Nichols has the following to say:

"The house was crowded, but shocked and breathless over the disaster. As the Seventh Avenue Subway was then under construction, every time a blast of dynamite went off, the people feared the house was being bombed. The talk in the lobbies was inflammatory and the house rocked with stories at first and tenth hand. I was young then and enjoyed the excitement, even though I had to stand. I was glad I had my new evening wrap. Altogether it was a cold night."

The New York Tribune reported that Count von Bernstorff, German Ambassador, thought it was safer not to go through with his intentions of attending. There were plainclothes men on guard and the singing of "Deutschland Ueber Alles" was canceled. The cast included Hempel, Ober, Schumann and Reiss. It may be a surprise to those who think of Richard Hageman chiefly as songwriter that he was in the role of Frosch.

* * *

Koussevitzky: The Music Director Emeritus of the Boston Symphony continues, at seventy-six, to be as energetic as when he went through his weekly routine of preparing programs in Boston. Sunday, Jan. 7, he will conduct a special concert introducing the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra to this country in Washington's Constitution Hall. This is not considered part of the orchestra's regular tour, which will be inaugurated the following night with a dinner-concert at the Waldorf-Astoria, directed by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Koussevitzky's recent New York appearances with the Bostonians were occupied with celebrating the eighty-fifty birthday of Sibelius, who, though contemporary, is already the property of traditional repertory. But the retired Boston conductor is still enterprising enough to add new works to his repertory. He will conduct the Scherzo from the "David" Symphony of the Israeli composer, Menahem Avidom, in Washington, and not long ago in Boston he gave the American premiere of Henri Barraud's "Le Mystere des Saints Innocents." "The Boston Herald's" Rudolph Elie remarked on his "characteristic courage" in giving a new work, "although, as guest conductor, he had every right to fall back on his tried and true pieces for old times' sake." The critic described the work as "one of the most musicoreligious expressions to appear in some time," though he is in agreement with his colleagues that it is not very original. Cyrus Durgin, in "The Boston Globe," found the music "sometimes of a lyric beauty, but oftentimes thin and dull." "The Boston Post's" Warren Storey Smith found Barraud "extremely resourceful, handling his orchestral and choral forces with great skill," though the critic is otherwise reserved.

* * *

Miscellanie: Sir Thomas Beecham has informed Arthur Judson that he wants some time to consider the invitation, on behalf of Columbia Concerts Management, to return here next year with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra for a tour of four months. . . . Mrs. Sergei Rachmaninoff has presented to the Library of Congress a large collection of manuscripts, letters and memorabilia which comprise the Rachmaninoff archives. . . . Joseph Raieff, in a concert for the benefit of St. Hilda's School in Morningside Heights (McMillin Theater, Thursday night, Jan. 4), will play works by two young American composers, Harold Shapero's Sonata in C minor, No. 2, and William Bergsma's Three Fantasies. . . . A new trend in Europe to make films out of large works from traditional music literature has yielded, as one of its latest fruits, a motion picture to go with Herbert von Karajan's new recording of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION
DEC 24 1950

Record Releases

The celebrated "Water Musick, by Handel is released this wee by WCRM Recording Corp. Th complete work is resonantly pe formed by the National Galle Orchestra, Richard Bales, co ductor.

Festival Recordings, Inc., Bos ton, announces the release of Ed ward Ballantine's "Variations o Theme of Mary Had a Little Lamb." The work is in the style of various composers performed on the piano by the composer. These "Variations" have been used extensively in colleges and schools for educational purposes. They are now available for the first time on records.

RCA Victor's December Red Seal feature list contains a variety of albums and singles. Outstanding among them is an album of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," which marks the record debut of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator in this new reading, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. A partial list includes the second album of "Well-Tempered Clavier," by Landowska; new reading of the Tschaikowsky "Violin Concerto," by Heifetz; light music by Toscanini; Horowitz-Chopin album; Schuman "Song Cycle," by Marian Anderson; singles by Gladys Swarthout, the Boston "Pops," and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
DEC 24 1950

Mrs. Roosevelt Makes Debut.—

RCA Victor's December Red Seal list marks the recording debut of one of the most distinguished American citizens—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt — in Prokofieff's perennially popular "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Made at Tanglewood, Mass., during the 1950 Berkshire Festival, the recording is a permanent memento of the public performance given the work by Mrs. Roosevelt with the Boston Symphony orchestra which drew high praise from the musical press assembled for the occasion. The records are being released simultaneously on all three speeds, replacing an earlier Boston Symphony version which featured Richard Hale as narrator.

To record "Peter and the Wolf" the former First Lady flew to Tanglewood from her Hyde Park home on August 11. After a morning rehearsal she went before RCA Victor microphones with all the calmness of a veteran. Wrote New York Times music critic Howard Taubman of the recording session: "Mrs. Roosevelt spoke her part simply and charmingly. She sounded like a grandmother reading a pleasant little story to her grandchildren . . . Mrs. Roosevelt turned over half of the honorarium paid to her by RCA Victor for her share in the recording to the Berkshire Music Center and donated the other half to the Wiltwyck School for Boys." (A charitable institution for under privileged children of which she is a founder and board member).

There are few musical compositions—with such wide appeal to all ages of music lovers as "Peter and the Wolf." Its naivete and delightful humor provide this magnetism and with such an adept rcanteur as Eleanor Roosevelt, this December album is one of the most unusual debuts in the company's long association with distinguished performers.—BOB PITTS & BOB PAGE.

Prisoners To Have Feast.

[252]

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 24 1950

the RECORD CORNER

Take the cream of the songs from two current Broadway musical hits. Add a half dozen of the nation's most popular singers.

Stir well with the baton of a top orchestra leader and you have one of the season's tastiest listening treats.

It's a 10-inch long-playing disc recorded by MGM and featuring the hit songs of "Guys and Dolls" and "Call Me Madam."

On one side Billy Eckstine sings the tender love songs "I'll Know" and "I've Never Been in Love Before;" Johnny Desmond gives a happy rendition of "A Bushel and A Peck," and Art Lund does an infectious bit on "If I Were a Bell."

Art Lund

The four songs are from "Guys and Dolls."

The reverse side has Jack Carroll, Bonnie Lake and Cece Blake singing "Marrying for Love," "It's A Lovely Day Today," "You're Just in Love" and "The Best Things for You" from Call Me Madam.

Russ Case and his Orchestra help make this one of the best albums to come down the pike in many a month.

On the Single Side

Taking time out from recording musicals, MGM has waxed a batch of good singles that are especially pleasing.

George Shearing

George Shearing's fine quintet is up to par on Roses of Picardy and Pick Yourself Up. And Ivory Joe Hunter swings out vocally and orchestrally on You Thrill Me and Sorta Need You.

Incidentally, the Shearing outfit is coming to Pittsburgh in mid-January to appear in one of the local night spots.

Art Lund, with his likeable and different style, does an excellent job on Serenata and By the Kissing Rock, a couple of ballad-type numbers that fits his singing perfectly.

Still another MGM single has Tommy Tucker braving The Thing with Tennessee Waltz on the other side. Other good singles are Shep Field's Harbor Lights and David Rose's Orchestra on An American in Paris.

Bill Farrell, who has a Pittsburgh date the second week in January, won't lose any fans with his singing of My Heart Cries for You and You Love Me.

More Musical Hits

Standout songs from two new MGM musical productions have been recorded directly from the sound track on a pair of MGM LP records.

The first features songs from "Two Weeks With Love," starring Jane Powell, Carleton Carpentar and Debbie Reynolds in the singing parts.

Songs include By the Light of the Silvery Moon, Aba Daba Honeymoon, Row, Row, Row, My Hero, A Heart That's Free and Oceana Roll, a honky-tonk number done well by Miss Powell.

The second disc waxes songs from "Summer Stock." Judy Garland, Gene Kelly, Gloria DeHaven and Phil Silvers handle the vocals from this so-so musical.

All-Time Favorites

Some of the biggest names in music play a part in RCA Victor's new 45 rpm album, "A "Program of All Time Favorites."

Marion Anderson

Here's the lineup of singers and songs:

Marian Anderson singing Carry Me Back to Old Virginny; The Boston Pops Orchestra playing Jalousie; Leopold Stokowski and the Blue Danube, and the First Piano Quartet doing Liebestraum.

Enrico Caruso sings Rigoletto; La Donna E Mobile; Allan Jones does Make Believe; Jeannette MacDonald sings the Italian Street Song and Jan Peerce winds it up with Bluebird of Happiness.

In another RCA 45 album, Eleanor Roosevelt narrates the story of "Peter and the Wolf." Music is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
DEC 24 1950

Mozart and Haydn Works Recorded by Koussevitsky

RCA VICTOR'S latest batches of classical 45 sets contain a good deal of the lovely standard music that's always welcome, no matter how many previous readings of the same works one can find in various companies' catalogues.

New releases by the Serge Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony combination so familiar to record-collectors include Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony No. 92 in G.

Koussevitzky

Both are delectable favorites which bear the brand in these versions of the high taste and exquisite finesse Mr. Koussevitzky has always applied to compositions of this period.

Both versions were made last summer at Tanglewood, and in both cases the recordings are superior technically as well as interpretively.

* * *

LOUIS KAUFMAN plays on a new Concert Hall Society 12-inch LP an excellent collection of small modern pieces most of which he has personally introduced to audiences during his recitals of the past several years. One side of the disc is devoted to European music, the other to American.

On the European side are such works as Kodaly's "Adagio," Sibelius' "Epilog," Milhaud's "Ipanema," Joseph Achron's "Mood," Camargo Guarnieri's "Canto I," and Prokofiev's "Gavotta."

From the American side emerge Robert McBride's "Aria and Toccata," Everett Helm's "Comment on Two Spirituals," William Grant Still's "Blues" arranged from the "Lenox Ave. Suite," Harold Triggs' "Danza Braziliana" and Copland's "Ukelele Serenada" and "Hoe Down."

Everything is played with Mr. Kaufman's usual flair for the dash and spice of modern music, and altogether it's an outstanding one-record concert. Piano accompanists are Annette Kaufman and Theodore Saidenberg.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
12/23/50

Boston Symphony Annotator Edits Letters of Wagner

By JOHN BARKHAM

□LETTERS OF RICHARD WAGNER: The Burrell Collection. Edited by John N. Burk. New York: The Macmillan Company. 665 pp. $10.50.

Richard Wagner was never one to hide his light under a bushel. Throughout his life he spoke his mind, in print and out, with a freedom that made Berlioz and Rimsky-Korsakoff look like a pair of secret agents. Yet, despite the existence of his own prodigious autobiography, musicologists have long been aware of an immense collection of some 800 unpublished letters and documents assembled by an Englishwoman named Mary Burrell.

The manner in which these letters have at last achieved publication is in itself a strange story. Mrs. Burrell spent years tracking down and purchasing this material all over Europe in preparation for a definitive life of Wagner she herself meant to write. She died in 1898, however, just after beginning her book. For 30 years thereafter the collection lay untouched and unseen, gathering dust. Then, in 1931, the letters were purchased by an American woman, who has now made them available for publication.

It goes without saying that these admirably edited letters constitute a musicological event of the first importance. It is impossible in a short review to do justice to their variety, scope and general significance. They throw a great deal of fresh light on the composer's character, his weaknesses, his relations with those about him. They fill in gaps in his autobiography and make very clear how much Cosima, his wife, manipulated his papers.

Wagner was frank, sometimes spiteful, about his contemporaries. Thus he wrote to a friend from London in April 1855: "That night, at the beginning of the concert, was the first time that I kept my gloves on to conduct. I did that out of malice for a Mendelssohn symphony (the Italian), a very bad symphony; but I took them off for the Euryanthe overture."

By and large these letters bear out the view that Wagner was a querulous egotist, and an unpleasant, often unbalanced, genius. Now that they have at last become public, it is to be hoped that the aging Ernest Newman, whose monumental life of Wagner was completed a few years ago, will now revise his great work in the light of these documents.

Editor Burk is librarian and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both for its winter season and for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in the summer.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 26 1950

Symphony Program Friday-Saturday

At the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 29 and 30, Charles Munch will be heard in the music of Bruckner for the first time in this country, conducting the Seventh Symphony. He will also introduce at this pair of concerts the Second Piano Concerto by Alexander Tcherepnin in which the composer will appear as soloist. The Concerto is in one movement. The program will open with Gluck's Overture to "Alceste."

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
DEC 20 1950

RECORDS

Eleanor a Bit Too Homespun For Fairytale

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

Having Eleanor Roosevelt narrate Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" (Victor LM-45, 10-inch L. P.) was a novel stroke all right, but, alas! no artistic coup.

While that hearty lady's followers may cherish it, her homespun way with the fairy tale is as a discordant drone against the superbly polished musical backdrop of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky.

More of Koussevitsky-spun Boston silk is in another new longplay, this one holding Mozart's gem of a serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Haydn's spirited "Oxford" Symphony. Both are played with surprising sympathy for 18th-century style (Victor LM-1102, 12-inch).

* * *

SIX SONGS that seem to evoke all sweet nostalgia for "Old Vienna" are sung by Helen Traubel in a new collection under that title—and sung with supple warmth and flavor that insures the casting of the spell.

Among them are "Im Prater Bluehn Wieder die Baeume," the "Merry Widow" waltz, "Vienna City of My Dreams" and "Yours is My Heart Alone."

Frank Black conducts the accompanying orchestra. (Victor LM-39, 10-inch L.P.)

[203]

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
DEC 1950

Concert Recordings

By Thomas B. Sherman

ROSSINI: The opera "La Cenerentola" (abridged version) with Giulietta Simionato, mezzo-soprano, Cesare Valleti, tenor; Cristiano Dalmangas, bass and others; Orchestra and Chorus of Radio Italiano under the direction of Mario Rossi. (Cetra-Sofia, two 33⅓ RPMs in album with Italian and English text.)

Rossini's treatment of the Cinderella myth is not produced very often in this country because, apparently, there are so few contraltos with sufficient vocal agility for the name role. It is comparable, nevertheless to the immortal "Barber." Its continuous sparkle, its supple melodies, and effective coloratura writing all show a complete mastery of the medium as well as a natural love for it. The principals listed above are excellent; it's a splendid performance and a first rate recording.

★ ★ ★

SCHUMANN: "Kinderscenen" and CHOPIN: Five Mazurkas; played by the pianist Vladimir Horowitz. (RCA-Victor, One 33⅓ RPM.)

Horowitz plays with a brilliant tone and unerring accuracy. Exaggerated dynamic contrasts make both the Schumann and Chopin pieces sound more "impressive" than they need to be. The piano reproduction is remarkably life-like.

★ ★ ★

VERDI: String Quartet No. 1; played by the Paganini String Quartet. (RCA-Victor, One 10-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

Verdi's string quartet is a musical curiosity because, and only because it was written merely as a time-killer. Though its intrinsic value is not such as to make it a suitable companion piece for the best of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, it's well made of interesting material. The Paganini ensemble plays it incisively. It will be included in the program of their St. Louis concert the second week in January.

★ ★ ★

HAYDN: String Quartets in E Flat Major Opus 64 No. 6 and D Major, Opus 76 No. 6; played by the Vienna Konzerthaus Quartet. (Westminster, One 33⅓ RPM.)

The E Flat Quartet is good Haydn but the D Major is super-Haydn in every respect. The slow movement is one of the great utterances of Eighteenth Century music. The material is immensely moving even when first stated but it becomes deeper and more complicated in its appeal through steady expansion brought about by the subtlest and most masterly treatment. The Konzerthaus performance is interpretively mature; the reproduction is excellent.

★ ★ ★

SACRED MUSIC OF THE RENAISSANCE: Choral works by Lassus, Victoria, Palestrina and others; sung by the Vatican Choir under Msgr. Licino Refice. (Mercury, One 12-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

The fusion of voices in the all-male Vatican choir together with its hair-line precision in attacks, releases and inflection places these performances on a level of excellence rarely heard. The dryness of timbre in the treble voices is exactly right for this kind of devotional music. It soars above the common passions of mankind.

★ ★ ★

VIVALDI: "THE Conflict Between Harmony and Invention"; played by Louis Kaufman, violinist and the Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra under Clemens Dahinden. (Concert Hall, One 33⅓ RPM.)

The Concert Hall Society presents its public with a rare item and a beautiful one. In its form this cumbersomely titled composition is a suite for violin and orchestra that follows, in general, the logic of the concerto grosso rather than the modern concerto. The several parts contain a great deal of naturalistic descriptive writing but it's intrinsic merit as music makes other considerations negligible. Kaufman and the orchestra give a poised, cultivated, musically mature and tonally gracious performance.

Best Sellers

ROBERT SHAW'S Christmas Hymns and Carols (RCA-Victor, in all three speeds.)

PROKOFIEFF: "Peter and the Wolf"; played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky with Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator. (RCA - Victor, One 33 1-3 R.P.M.).

RICHARD STRAUSS: "Also Spake Zarathustra," played by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Klemens Krauss. (London, One 33 1-3 R.P.M.).

This Clipping From
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
DEC 28 1950

Boston Symphony Tuesday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Providence for a concert at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15. Charles Munch will present two symphonies: No. 103 in E-flat by Haydn, known as "The Drum Roll," and Schumann's First, the "Spring Symphony. In the second part of the program he will perform two works of Maurice Ravel, the Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a tribute by a recent great French composer to an earlier one. The closing number will be Revel's "Spanish Rhapsody."

This Clipping From
RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
DEC 26 1950

Author of the Week

By W. G. ROGERS

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
HAMILTONIAN
DEC 28 1950

Spinning Around

By BARNEY GLAZER
Twentieth Century News Syndicate

The Juke Box Operators of America voted MGM's Ivory Joe Hunter "the best jazz'n blues artist of 1950. And the best record of all labels in the same category ironically enough is Hunter's MGM'er, "I Almost Lost My Mind"...Something new in styling from rising young vocalist Bill Farrell comes your way via his latest MGM platter, "My Heart Cries For You," backed by "You Love Me."

Jan Garber has a colorful Capitol disc in "If I Were a Bell" with "Nobody's Chasing Me" on the flip..Trombonist Pee Wee Hunt produces two smash instrumentals for Capitol in 'Louella" and "Copenhagen." Get this platter for real digging.

There is mucho depth and warmth to Margaret Whiting's latest Capitol whirl, "Once You Find Your Guy" ...The Four Tunes have a punch-packed rhythmic vocal in RCA Victor's "Cool Water"... Buddy Morrow has a tricky arrangement in RCA Victor's "I Can't Give You Anything But Love."

Milton Berle apparently isn't confined to television. His gag song for RCA Victor is "This Is the Chorus" and he clowns it well.

The nation's best classical music these days is coming from RCA Victor. In the album, "Prokofieff: Peter and the Wolf," Eleanor Roosevelt gives a never-to-be forgotten performance, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Another interesting RCA Victor album is "Toscanini Conducts Light Music." The maestro especially conducts "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, the Overture to Kablevsky's "Colas Breugnon" and the Perennial Waldteufel "Skaters Waltz" with the same transcendent brilliance he accords his more serious works.

For a truly rare treat, don't miss RCA Victor's album, "All The Best Sellers." Featured performers are Marian Anderson, the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, Enrico Caruso, the First Piano Quartet, Allan Jones, Jeanette MacDonald, Jan Pearce, and Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony Orchestra. The music is equally as fabulous, coming under one cover: "La Donna E Mobile", "Make Believe", "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," "Italian Street Song" "Liebestraum," "The Blue Danube," "Jalousie," and "Bluebird of Happiness."

Jack Fina scores with a double barreled MGM hit in "Song of the Bayou" and "Baltimore Rag".

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Student Rehearsals Catch On in a Hurry

The scene on the stage was familiar enough: the men of the orchestra sitting around in shirt-sleeves, sports jackets, and sweaters and all chatting or tuning up or looking over the music on the stands before them. It was the scene in the auditorium that was different.

For crammed into Symphony Hall were young men and women, some of them in their shirt-sleeves, too, and all as gay and informal as a bunch of students can be. It was the occasion of the second unique rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra for all comers, but especially for the students of the Boston area.

Student Request

As it happened, some Harvard students had really caused the open rehearsals to come into being when a group of them wrote a note to George Judd, manager of the orchestra. What they said, in effect, was that they'd always been told Boston had one of the great symphony orchestras, but how did students go about getting to hear it? All the regular series were sold out, including the concerts in the University's Sanders theater, and even if they weren't, they couldn't afford to pay the price anyway. So what good was the symphony to them?

Mr. Judd talked this over one day with Charles Munch, the orchestra's new conductor. Mr. Munch, recalling that some European opera houses admit people who otherwise couldn't afford to attend an opera to dress rehearsals, suggested the same thing be done in Boston. The result was this series of five Thursday evening rehearsals during the season, the whole being offered to students in the area at $8 for the whole series, federal tax included.

The first open rehearsal last month, at which Yehudi Menuhin appeared to the delight of everyone in a plaid shirt with the tails out, didn't quite draw as many students as the management had expected, so the rules were changed whereby students alone could buy series tickets, but all comers could buy tickets at the door on the evening of the rehearsal. Thus, the other night, all but a few top balcony seats were filled as Mr. Munch, in a khaki jacket, a pair of tweeds and crepe rubber soled sports shoes came running onto the stage with a bunch of musical scores under his arm, a smile of greeting and pleasure on his face.

He went right to work on a Haydn symphony, stopping the orchestra in full cry to give musical instructions in his lightly accented English, singing along with the orchestra in a husky baritone, jumping off the platform among the players to illustrate how softly he wanted the passage to go, crying "Sing!" at the top of his voice to achieve a more expressive tone quality, and leaping off his rehearsal stool like a lion with his mane in his eyes to get a more dramatic attack on a loud passage.

Delighted Audience

He warmed up to the delighted audience as he went along, half turning around to the students and pointing out the sound of the flute, the oboe, the bassoon and the other instruments, but many of them missed what he said as there was no microphone—as there will be at the next—to convey his voice to the listeners. But the listeners caught the significance of his repetitions of various passages and seemed to find the process of starting and stopping highly enjoyable as well as instructive.

The Haydn symphony rehearsed to Mr. Munch's satisfaction, the soloist came on the stage. He was Aldo Ciccolini, a 25-year-old Italian pianist who, like Yehudi Menuhin, had willingly offered to rehearse with an audience on hand. So perfectly did the soloist and conductor agree on the interpretation and performance of the work they stopped only once or twice throughout the long concerto, and the young man got very prolonged and enthusiastic applause as he finished his rehearsal performance.

At the intermission the students milled around near the stage doors to see and chat with the musicians who came out for [illegible] them went back to the green [illegible] Mr. Munch, whose affability with the young people seemed to impress them as much as his musicianship.

But none of the students tried their French on him. "I was going to," explained one to his girl friend as he came out, "but I got cold feet. What do you say to a guy like that, anyway?"

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1950

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
DEC 27 1950

Concert Recordings

By Thomas B. Sherman

ROSSINI: The opera "La Cenerentola" (abridged version) with Giulietta Simionato, mezzo-soprano, Cesare Valleti, tenor, Cristiano Dalmangas, bass and others; Orchestra and Chorus of Radio Italiano under the direction of Mario Rossi. (Cetra-Sofia, two 33⅓ RPMs in album with Italian and English text.)

Rossini's treatment of the Cinderella myth is not produced very often in this country because, apparently, there are so few contraltos with sufficient vocal agility for the name role. It is comparable, nevertheless to the immortal "Barber." Its continuous sparkle, its supple melodies, and effective coloratura writing all show a complete mastery of the medium as well as a natural love for it. The principals listed above are excellent; it's a splendid performance and a first rate recording.

★ ★ ★

SCHUMANN: "Kinderscenen" and CHOPIN: Five Mazurkas; played by the pianist Vladimir Horowitz. (RCA-Victor, One 33⅓ RPM.)

Horowitz plays with a brilliant tone and unerring accuracy. Exaggerated dynamic contrasts make both the Schumann and Chopin pieces sound more "impressive" than they need to be. The piano reproduction is remarkably life-like.

★ ★ ★

VERDI: String Quartet No. 1; played by the Paganini String Quartet. (RCA-Victor, One 10-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

Verdi's string quartet is a musical curiosity because, and only because it was written merely as a time-killer. Though its intrinsic value is not such as to make it a suitable companion piece for the best of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, it's well made of interesting material. The Paganini ensemble plays it incisively. It will be included in the program of their St. Louis concert the second week in January.

★ ★ ★

HAYDN: String Quartets in E Flat Major Opus 64 No. 6 and D Major, Opus 76 No. 6; played by the Vienna Konzerthaus Quartet. (Westminster, One 33⅓ RPM.)

The E Flat Quartet is good Haydn but the D Major is super-Haydn in every respect. The slow movement is one of the great utterances of Eighteenth Century music. The material is immensely moving even when first stated but it becomes deeper and more complicated in its appeal through steady expansion brought about by the subtlest and most masterly treatment. The Konzerthaus performance is interpretively mature; the reproduction is excellent.

★ ★ ★

SACRED MUSIC OF THE RENAISSANCE: Choral works by Lassus, Victoria, Palestrina and others; sung by the Vatican Choir under Msgr. Licino Refice. (Mercury, One 12-inch 33⅓ RPM.)

The fusion of voices in the all-male Vatican choir together with its hair-line precision in attacks, releases and inflection places these performances on a level of excellence rarely heard. The dryness of timbre in the treble voices is exactly right for this kind of devotional music. It soars above the common passions of mankind.

★ ★ ★

VIVALDI: "THE Conflict Between Harmony and Invention"; played by Louis Kaufman, violinist and the Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra under Clemens Dahinden. (Concert Hall, One 33⅓ RPM.)

The Concert Hall Society presents its public with a rare item and a beautiful one. In its form this cumbersomely titled composition is a suite for violin and orchestra that follows, in general, the logic of the concerto grosso rather than the modern concerto. The several parts contain a great deal of naturalistic descriptive writing but it's intrinsic merit as music makes other considerations negligible. Kaufman and the orchestra give a poised, cultivated, musically mature and tonally gracious performance.

Best Sellers

ROBERT SHAW'S Christmas Hymns and Carols (RCA-Victor, in all three speeds.)

PROKOFIEFF: "Peter and the Wolf"; played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky with Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator. (RCA - Victor, One 33 1-3 R.P.M.).

RICHARD STRAUSS: "Also Spake Zarathustra," played by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Klemens Krauss. (London, One 33 1-3 R.P.M.).

This Clipping From
WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
DEC 28 1950

Boston Symphony Tuesday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Providence for a concert at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, next Tuesday evening, at 8:15. Charles Munch will present two symphonies: No. 103 in E-flat by Haydn, known as "The Drum Roll," and Schumann's First, the "Spring Symphony. In the second part of the program he will perform two works of Maurice Ravel, the Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a tribute by a recent great French composer to an earlier one. The closing number will be Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody."

This Clipping From
RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL TIMES
DEC 26 1950

Author of the Week

By W. G. ROGERS

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
HAMILTONIAN
DEC 28 1950

Spinning Around

By BARNEY GLAZER
Twentieth Century News Syndicate

The Juke Box Operators of America voted MGM's Ivory Joe Hunter "the best jazz'n blues artist of 1950. And the best record of all labels in the same category ironically enough is Hunter's MGM'er, "I Almost Lost My Mind"... Something new in styling from rising young vocalist Bill Farrell comes your way via his latest MGM platter, "My Heart Cries For You," backed by "You Love Me."

Jan Garber has a colorful Capitol disc in "If I Were a Bell" with "Nobody's Chasing Me" on the flip...Trombonist Pee Wee Hunt produces two smash instrumentals for Capitol in 'Louella" and "Copenhagen." Get this platter for real digging.

There is mucho depth and warmth to Margaret Whiting's latest Capitol whirl, "Once You Find Your Guy"...The Four Tunes have a punch-packed rhythmic vocal in RCA Victor's "Cool Water"... Buddy Morrow has a tricky arrangement in RCA Victor's "I Can't Give You Anything But Love."

Milton Berle apparently isn't confined to television. His gag song for RCA Victor is "This Is the Chorus" and he clowns it well.

The nation's best classical music these days is coming from RCA Victor. In the album, "Prokofieff: Peter and the Wolf," Eleanor Roosevelt gives a never-to-be forgotten performance, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

Another interesting RCA Victor album is "Toscanini Conducts Light Music." The maestro especially conducts "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas, the Overture to Kablevsky's "Colas Breugnon" and the Perennial Waldteufel "Skaters Waltz" with the same transcendent brilliance he accords his more serious works.

For a truly rare treat, don't miss RCA Victor's album, "All The Best Sellers." Featured performers are Marian Anderson, the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, Enrico Caruso, the First Piano Quartet, Allan Jones, Jeanette MacDonald, Jan Pearce, and Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony Orchestra. The music is equally as fabulous, coming under one cover: "La Donna E Mobile", "Make Believe", "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," "Italian Street Song," "Liebestraum," "The Blue Danube," "Jalousie," and "Bluebird of Happiness."

Jack Fina scores with a double barreled MGM hit in "Song of the Bayou" and "Baltimore Rag".

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The Student Rehearsals Catch On in a Hurry

The scene on the stage was familiar enough: the men of the orchestra sitting around in shirt-sleeves, sports jackets, and sweaters and all chatting or tuning up or looking over the music on the stands before them. It was the scene in the auditorium that was different.

For crammed into Symphony Hall were young men and women, some of them in their shirt-sleeves, too, and all as gay and informal as a bunch of students can be. It was the occasion of the second unique rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra for all comers, but especially for the students of the Boston area.

Student Request

As it happened, some Harvard students had really caused the open rehearsals to come into being when a group of them wrote a note to George Judd, manager of the orchestra. What they said, in effect, was that they'd always been told Boston had one of the great symphony orchestras, but how did students go about getting to hear it? All the regular series were sold out, including the concerts in the University's Sanders theater, and even if they weren't, they couldn't afford to pay the price anyway. So what good was the symphony to them?

Mr. Judd talked this over one day with Charles Munch, the orchestra's new conductor. Mr. Munch, recalling that some European opera houses admit people who otherwise couldn't afford to attend an opera to dress rehearsals, suggested the same thing be done in Boston. The result was this series of five Thursday evening rehearsals during the season, the whole being offered to students in the area at $8 for the whole series, federal tax included.

The first open rehearsal last month, at which Yehudi Menuhin appeared to the delight of everyone in a plaid shirt with the tails out, didn't quite draw as many students as the management had expected, so the rules were changed whereby students alone could buy series tickets, but all comers could buy tickets at the door on the evening of the rehearsal. Thus, the other night, all but a few top balcony seats were filled as Mr. Munch, in a khaki jacket, a pair of tweeds and crepe rubber soled sports shoes came running onto the stage with a bunch of musical scores under his arm, a smile of greeting and pleasure on his face.

He went right to work on a Haydn symphony, stopping the orchestra in full cry to give musical instructions in his lightly accented English, singing along with the orchestra in a husky baritone, jumping off the platform among the players to illustrate how softly he wanted the passage to go, crying "Sing!" at the top of his voice to achieve a more expressive tone quality, and leaping off his rehearsal stool like a lion with his mane in his eyes to get a more dramatic attack on a loud passage.

Delighted Audience

He warmed up to the delighted audience as he went along, half turning around to the students and pointing out the sound of the flute, the oboe, the bassoon and the other instruments, but many of them missed what he said as there was no microphone—as there will be at the next—to convey his voice to the listeners. But the listeners caught the significance of his repetitions of various passages and seemed to find the process of starting and stopping highly enjoyable as well as instructive.

The Haydn symphony rehearsed to Mr. Munch's satisfaction, the soloist came on the stage. He was Aldo Ciccolini, a 25-year-old Italian pianist who, like Yehudi Menuhin, had willingly offered to rehearse with an audience on hand. So perfectly did the soloist and conductor agree on the interpretation and performance of the work they stopped only once or twice throughout the long concerto, and the young man got very prolonged and enthusiastic applause as he finished his rehearsal performance.

At the intermission the students milled around near the stage doors to see and chat with the musicians who came out for [illegible] them went back to the green [illegible] Mr. Munch, whose affability with the young people seemed to impress them as much as his musicianship.

But none of the students tried their French on him. "I was going to," explained one to his girl friend as he came out, "but I got cold feet. What do you say to a guy like that, anyway?"

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1950

[204]

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
DEC 29 1950

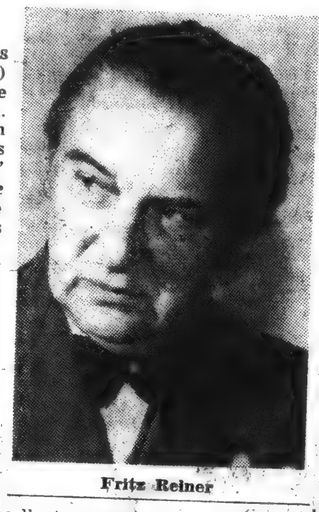
Fritz Reiner on Podium for 'Die Fledermaus' Album Recorded by Big All-star Singing Cast

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

Johann Strauss the Younger's "Die Fledermaus" ("The Bat") is beyond question one of the finest comic operas ever written. H. E. Jacob, author of "Johann Strauss: Father and Son," speaks of the story of "Die Fledermaus" as "bewitching" and says that the work "is a musical comedy of the highest rank and as new today as it ever was." He is right.

Just as the proof of the pudding is in the eating, so the proof of Mr. Jacob's assertion concerning "Die Fledermaus" is in the hearing of the work. An album of six discs presenting highlights from the comic opera (RCA Victor WDM-1457) will enable you to realize that it is by no means an exaggeration to call "Die Fledermaus" a "bewitching" comic opera.

Naturally, poor conducting, poor singing and poor playing would effectively smother the bewitching qualities contained in any work. But one need have no worries when Fritz Reiner, one of the ablest conductors of the present time, is on the podium. It is Reiner who makes his RCA Victor debut this month by presiding with admirable skill over the vivid presentation of highlights from "Die Fledermaus."



Fritz Reiner

AN ALL-STAR cast takes part in the performance. The artists are: Patrice Munsel, as Adele; Regina Resnik, as Rosalinda; Rise Stevens, as Orlovsky; James Melton, as Eisenstein; Robert Merrill, as Falke; Jan Peerce, as Alfred; Hugh Thompson, as Frank; Paula Lenchner, as Ida; Johnny Silver, as the lawyer. Robert Shaw's Chorale sings the choral parts, and the orchestra is the excellent organization called the RCA Victor Orchestra.

The opera is given in the English translation by Ruth and Thomas Martin. My own taste rebels at presenting "Die Fledermaus" in English, but I can understand why it was considered wise to use a translation. The fact remains that some of the pith and the sly humor of the work goes by the board in the progress of translating the German text into another language. Nevertheless, one must bear in mind that the truth of my statement is evident only to those who understand German.

INCIDENTALLY, "Die Fledermaus" was revived at the Metropolitan Opera Company on Dec. 20, 1950. Miss Munsel and Miss Stevens were in the cast.

Hector Berlioz' "Beatrice and Benedict Overture" glows from beginning to end with orchestral sorcery. To me its melodic content is drab, but whenever I listen to the composition, I take boundless pleasure in observing the magic which that energetic and nimble-tongued egotist whose name was Berlioz was able to put into his instrumentation. The "Beatrice and Benedict Overture" is played with striking effectiveness by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Muench (RCA Victor 49-3078).

The 34 violins — plus other instruments, of course — of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra play with fine skill the captivating "La Campanella" from Niccolo Paganini's "Violin Concerto, Op. 7" and the famous Italian wizard's "Moto Perpetuo" (RCA Victor 49-3077). Arthur Fiedler is the conductor.

* * *

New broom-director of the Metropolitan Opera, Rudolf Bing, has picked the perennial double-bill, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci, as more operas in need of refurbishing.

Horace Armistead, well known Broadway designer, has planned new scenery for both, it was announced. And John Lloyd, a designer who has specialized in musical comedy as well as opera, has designed new costumes.

To stage Cavalleria, Bing went to Indiana University and engaged Associate Professor Hans Busch who is in charge of the opera workshop there. Pagliacci's director will be Max Leavitt, a veteran of the theater and director and originator of the famous Lemonade Opera.

The Met will stage the two operas the evening of January 17. They were last performed there during the 1947-48 season.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 30 1950

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the tenth program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Alexander Tcherepnin, pianist and composer, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "Alceste"	Gluck
Piano Concerto No. 2	Tcherepnin
Symphony No. 7 in E major	Bruckner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What we had yesterday afternoon, in the first local performance of Alexander Tcherepnin's Second Piano Concerto (with the composer at the piano) was that relatively rare phenomenon: a new work that made instantaneous and pleasurable contact with the audience.

Actually the Second Piano isn't new work at all as it dates from 1923 when the six-foot five inch composer, who looks not unlike the Liszt in early middle years, was 24-years old. It is to be doubted, however, if many of yesterday's audience ever heard it before. It has, on the other hand, heard much more advanced, complex and difficult music than this in the intervening quarter of a century, and obviously found nothing in it to be alarmed about, let alone baffled.

Everything in fact is pretty neat and straightforward in this pleasant and spirited work. Its form is clear enough, developing naturally from the ebullient march-like theme of the opening to a conclusion echoing the same theme. The writing is in voices rather than chords, the harmonic points of contact offering dissonances long become consonances to the ear of 1950.

In general quality of sound it seems a cross between Prokofieff and Rachmaninoff, the rhythmic and harmonic substance being suggestive of the first named, the melodic substance being suggestive of the second. I couldn't find much in it that seemed original or anything in it that seemed striking or memorable. Nor could I be sure whether the composer erred in scoring the work, whether he wasn't quite the one to bring out its more brilliant points at the keyboard or whether he was covered by the orchestra, but the balance was often so against the solo performer the work might better have been called a symphony with piano obligato.

Small matter, however; there is clearly no effort at pretentiousness or conceit in the concerto. It is a singularly honest piece designed both to entertain the audience and to give the composer his hour on the stage, and Mr. Tcherepnin deserved every one of his four calls back to the audience.

Somewhere along about the middle of the first movement of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, I found myself speculating on whether Mr. Munch really has as much faith in Bruckner as, for instance, the Bruckner Society. By the time this 50-minute work had come to an end, I had come to the conclusion that Mr. Munch is inspired by Bruckner in a direct ratio to that composer's straightforwardness of form.

When Bruckner meanders, when he pauses to listen to the sound of his own voice and wonder at it, when he gets prolix and involved, Mr. Munch seems a little wearied of it all. But when Bruckner spins a magical moment (as he does, for notable example in the great F sharp major theme of the slow movement) or when he speaks within a concise and conventional form (as he does in the scherzo), Mr. Munch is right there to give them all his interpretative power.

All in all, I would say that this symphony, with its Wagnerian textures, its horn calls, its rapturous strings, its gigantic proclamations for brass, its naivetes and mystical utterances, is not one of Mr. Munch's most successful conceptions. The parts are all there, often very beautifully traversed, but the whole is not. And Bruckner, unlike most other composers, whose music can survive myriad interpretative fancies, is like a child who cannot take his first step without adoring and encouraging arms to fall into.

The concert opened with a superb performance of Gluck's grave and noble overture to "Alceste," a work of such advanced instrumentation it seems hard to believe that Bach was but 17 years in his grave when it was composed. Pierre Fournier, 'cellist, will be the soloist in next week's program, which offers Saint Saens' Overture to "La Princess Jaune," Lalo's 'Cello Concerto, Mennin's Fifth Symphony and Strauss' "Don Juan."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
DEC 30 1950

Fournier, Cellist Star, at Symphony

Pierre Fournier, famous French cellist, will be heard in the Cello Concerto by Lalo at the Friday afternoon and next Saturday night Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall. It will mark his first appearance at these concerts.

For the first time in the Eastern states, Charles Munch will perform Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony, composed for the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and introduced there last season.

This Clipping From
EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER
DEC 29 1950

REPORT ON MUSIC—

Ethel Merman's 'Call Me Madam' Disk, 'Die Fledermaus' Take Over Top Place

"Call Me Madam" excerpts as sung by Ethel Merman and "Die Fledermaus," featuring Hilda Gueden and Wilma Lipp have taken over the lead in popular and classical records this week, according to the Saturday Review of Literature poll.

Phil Harris' "The Thing," and "Rigoletto," last week's leaders, dropped to second place.

Following are new records out:

Classical

"QUINTET IN F MINOR" (Brahms). Only the record-wise will recognize anything uncommon about this pairing of Clifford Curzon and the Budapest Quartet; the performance is on the Columbia label, and Curzon is under contract to the London firm. However, since the latter company had no intention of recording this work, it lent him, Hollywood-fashion, to Columbia, which justified all the trouble by producing a splendid-sounding version of the favorite Brahms work. Would that more of the same kind of thing could be done, especially in opera, and for the benefit of the Met!

"BEATRICE AND BENEDICT" (Berlioz). The brilliant and colorful overture is an excellent example of the change wrought by Charles Munch in the style of playing now favored by the Boston Symphony. Fine, clear strings and lighter brass than of yore, all reproduced with sheen and excellent balance. (RCA Victor.)

"UNA FURTIVA LAGRIMA" (Donizetti). Jussie Bjoerling's first recording of this much-sung air, thus putting him in competition with Gigli, Tagliavini, Crooks and Schipa, not to mention Caruso. His treatment is more robust than any of these, but beautifully managed in his own way. The disc-partner is the "Lament of Federico" from Cilea's "L'Arlesiana." (RCA Victor.)

"GERARD SOUZAY RECITAL." Nearly a dozen and a half songs on this London long-playing disc which introduces to the nation the French baritone who recently made his New York debut. Two composers only are called upon with Faure represented by eleven songs and Schubert by six. Needless to say, in so large a selection there is some fluctuation of quality, but the average is very high. The Faure set includes "Au Bord de l'Eau," "Apres un Reve," "Claire de Lune" and "L'Horizon Chimerique." Among the Schubert songs are "Fischerweise," "Heidenroslein," "Der Doppelganger," and "Der Erlkonig." Both Souzay's voice and the piano pleyd by Jacqueline Bonneau are richly reproduced.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 30 1950

"STRINGS, SING" —One of a series by Gil Friedberg picturing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Charles Munch.

Conducts Bruckner Seventh

Tcherepnin's Second Concerto Heard With Composer at Piano

By Harold Rogers

...e B...ton Symphony Society can ... to ... magnificent ... Bruckner's Seventh ... E major. Mr. Munch ... work ... concerts this ... Yesterday afternoon we ... with this ... guiding ... Boston Sym-

... to this ... movement—its awe- ... to criticize ... simply to ... We have ... Bruckner is ... Sundays when we lis- ... his ... to be ... many rap- ... of rare beauty.

... ...

... ...ligence ... ay amount to ... sacrifice for some lis- ... After the intermission ... especially more empty ... were progressively ... after each section. Most ... however, re- ... applaud—something of ... in these days ... everything is geared to the ... while he reads. ... his gigantic sym- ... more leisurely age. ... music lovers did ... they listened.

... is a genuine sense of ... Bruckner's musical ... in the development ... often reaches a point ... returns. At these moments he pauses, takes another big breath, and develops the idea all over again. Mr. Munch kept the line flowing, held the dynamics in good contrast for interest, and built the climaxes (long in arriving) to stupendous proportions. The brasses in the Adagio had several rocky passages (could it have been the bass tuba?), but otherwise the instrumental problems were neatly solved.

* * *

Alexander Tcherepnin is the soloist this week end in his own Piano Concerto No. 2, constructed in one movement in a modified sonata-allegro form. The piano's role is a retiring one so that the work is far more like an orchestral piece with piano obbligato than a concerto.

Though it has a contemporary ring to it, when it was composed in 1923 it could not have been considered exactly in the avant garde, but neither was it lagging far behind. One could easily describe it as employing the early colors and rhythms of Stravinsky, and the spirit of Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture. The last picture might possibly be conjured up from the little tin soldier tune, almost trivial in its brassy utterance, that turns up now and again stiff as starch. The concerto is not a great work, but, like its composer, it is thoroughly Russian and intriguing to the ear.

While Mr. Tcherepnin does not perform with brilliance, his playing is neatly articulated with excellent artistry. The performance of the concerto yesterday afternoon was the first for Boston; the performance tonight may well be the last.

Mr. Munch opened the program with Gluck's tragic overture to "Alceste," a choice which, though beautifully played, unfortunately coincided too closely with a dismally rainy afternoon. All in all, this was not one of Mr. Munch's more inspiring programs, rain or no.

Jeremy Spenser as a boy conductor in "Prelude to Fame" at the Exeter.

Music and Musicians

Two Charming Books

By VIRGIL THOMSON

WITH Christmas coming on and the thought in my mind of rendering a shopping service, I took a look recently at the new books collected on my table since early fall. A few are scholarly and serious; I shall examine those later. Today I am full of delight from two volumes of partly historical, partly belle-lettrist charm. One deals with auditory pleasures in Boston, the other with musical comedies mostly originating in New York.

* * *

Bostonian Civilities And Good Sense

"SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON," by H. Earle Johnson (Little, Brown & Co., Boston, 1950, 431 pp., $6.), is a history of the cultural fare offered in that house since its opening in 1900. Naturally, it is mostly about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but it contains glimpses of other entertainment. It is not a history of all musical Boston, since it omits the celebrated opera company and the doings of Harvard and of the New England Conservatory. It is more nearly a view of music in Boston, as this might have been seen (and heard) by a homebody pigeon roosted at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues. Mr. Johnson is a chatty pigeon who tells a pretty anecdote. He also coos a bit about the privilege of living in Boston.

The main facts of the Boston story are available elsewhere, but Mr. Johnson's ornamental detail is full of surprise and charm. The sale of orchestral season tickets at auction, a procedure carried out for many years, caused Mrs. Jack Gardner to pay $47.66 2-3 for her balcony seat in 1900. The primacy of Symphony Hall in forcing the removal of ladies' hats reminds us that before 1908 the price of a ticket entitled no musical customer in any city to a sight of the stage. The fact that administration of the hall and orchestra was vested in a board of trustees only after 1918 recalls to us that both had previously been a private operation of Major Higginson.

Descriptions of the hall's architectural conveniences point out that neither New York's nor Philadelphia's orchestra is so happily housed. The history of the acoustical care that went into its planning offers a lesson to us all. Professor Wallace Sabine, of Harvard's Physics Department, undertook for this purpose extensive researches. The results of these were incorporated in the architect's design, and they actually worked. An earlier plan, though far more stylish visually, had wisely been rejected by Major Higginson and his advisers on the ground that halls of the Greek theater type were acoustically an unknown quantity. When one thinks of all the expensive auditoriums that have been built in Europe and America since 1900 and scarcely a one of them acoustically successful, one is grateful to all those who took serious thought about the matter before building Symphony Hall.

The present book, like most commissioned works, seems arbitrarily limited in its coverage; but it is good reading. Boston itself, always stimulating to the literary mind, is its real hero. This hero is portrayed resemblingly and some of his adventures with music in the twentieth century recounted through a wealth of anecdote both informative and entertaining. Whether the book is overpriced at six dollars depends, I suppose, on whether one was brought up east of Bridgeport.

* * *

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 30 1950

MUSIC

Gluck, Tcherepnin and Bruckner Conducted by Munch at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Overture to "Alceste," by Gluck; Alexander Tcherepnin's Second Piano Concerto, and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony are conducted by Charles Munch at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. None of these pieces is precisely familiar at these concerts, for performances of Gluck are rare today; the Tcherepnin work had its first Boston hearing, with the composer as soloist, and the E major Symphony is the first music of Bruckner that Mr. Munch has directed here.

You could say that Tcherepnin's Concerto, written in Paris in 1923 is beyond a doubt the music of a Slav residing in the City of Light in the early 1920s and responding to the stimulation of that spiritual home of all civilized men. It is bright and vivacious, peppery but not vinegary, cast in one long movement which subdivides into five more or less recognizable episodes. It is an exceptional concerto in that a good number of pages find the busily active piano silent under the weight of orchestral doings.

It starts with a loud roll, followed by a trumpet fanfare. The theme and variations of the second episode are workings-out of various learned contrapuntal proceedings—although they do not sound pedantic, but sustain the prevailing light, almost impish and witty tone of the whole. The writing for orchestra is colorful and expert, that for piano of a percussively virtuoso character.

Probably this concert is not important music, in the sense of a grave and weighty masterpiece, but it is pleasant to listen to, and yesterday it provided admirable contrast to a program otherwise devoted to high seriousness. Mr. Tcherepnin played like the virtuoso he is, and was enthusiastically received.

Since the vocabulary of music has grown richer and more complex, the common or tonic chord has grown colorless and ineffective except at the end of a work. But Gluck, like Mozart, knew the dramatic tension to be found in a minor tonic chord in their day, and the first measures of the "Alceste" Overture, like those of the Overture to "Don Giovanni," prove it. Gluck's work is a masterpiece still capable of making a profound impression.

Mr. Munch, later in the afternoon, achieved a poetic, large-styled and beautifully effective performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Bruckner and Gluck, undoubtedly rouse the German side of Mr. Munch's background, as does Bach, and all of them, we now are able to perceive, he plays with authority. Bruckner's wonderfully inventive texture, with its contrapuntal wizardry, was absolutely clear: you could hear every main voice and counter-theme, and the orchestra sounded superbly rich and mellow. The sizable cut made in the finale was justified, for Bruckner, although great, said everything three times.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 30 1950

MUSIC

Gluck, Tcherepnin and Bruckner Conducted by Munch at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Overture to "Alceste," by Gluck; Alexander Tcherepnin's Second Piano Concerto, and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony are conducted by Charles Munch at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. None of these pieces is precisely familiar at these concerts, for performances of Gluck are rare today; the Tcherepnin work had its first Boston hearing, with the composer as soloist, and the E major Symphony is the first music of Bruckner that Mr. Munch has directed here.

You could say that Tcherepnin's Concerto, written in Paris in 1923, is beyond a doubt the music of a Slav residing in the City of Light in the early 1920s and responding to the stimulation of that spiritual home of all civilized men. It is bright and vivacious, peppery but not vinegary, cast in one long movement which subdivides into five more or less recognizable episodes. It is an exceptional concerto in that a good number of pages find the busily active piano silent under the weight of orchestral doings.

It starts with a loud roll, followed by a trumpet fanfare. The theme and variations of the second episode are workings-out of various learned contrapuntal proceedings—although they do not sound pedantic, but sustain the prevailing light, almost impish and witty tone of the whole. The writing for orchestra is colorful and expert, that for piano of a percussively virtuoso character.

Probably this concert is not important music, in the sense of a grave and weighty masterpiece, but it is pleasant to listen to, and yesterday it provided admirable contrast to a program otherwise devoted to high seriousness. Mr. Tcherepnin played like the virtuoso he is, and was enthusiastically received.

Since the vocabulary of music has grown richer and more complex, the common or tonic chord has grown colorless and ineffective except at the end of a work. But Gluck, like Mozart, knew the dramatic tension to be found in a minor tonic chord in their day, and the first measures of the "Alceste" Overture, like those of the Overture to "Don Giovanni," prove it. Gluck's work is a masterpiece still capable of making a profound impression.

Mr. Munch, later in the afternoon, achieved a poetic, large-styled and beautifully effective performance of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. Bruckner and Gluck undoubtedly rouse the German side of Mr. Munch's background, as does Bach, and all of them, we now are able to perceive, he plays with authority. Bruckner's wonderfully inventive texture, with its contrapuntal wizardry, was absolutely clear: you could hear every main voice and counter-theme, and the orchestra sounded superbly rich and mellow. The sizable cut made in the finale was justified, for Bruckner, although great, said everything three times.

Composer to Be Soloist In Own Second Concerto

By Jules Wolffers

When Alexander Tcherepnin steps on the stage of Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon for his first eastern appearance since 1938, the composer-pianist will be demonstrating his reaction against the virtuoso aspects of his Concerto No. 1.

Not that Mr. Tcherepnin has repudiated the earlier work; he plays any of his three concertos, or any of his large list of piano compositions, with equability, equanimity, and, it might be added, a thorough command of the instrument.

But in the Second Concerto, which Charles Munch will be introducing to Boston audiences Friday and Saturday, the composer aimed at a transparent effect and economy of means with the solo instrument usually restricted to two or three voices. The one-movement work is relatively short, and it adheres rather loosely to what is called sonata-allegro form.

* * *

The Second Concerto is by no means among Mr. Tcherepnin's latest works. It was written in Paris during 1923. Boston hearers will not find idiom and style difficult since much of the new music heard here in recent years is of the same general type — terse, economical, and well-regulated.

One or two facts about the concerto deserve some attention: the composer employs what he calls the nine-step scale (imagine the C scale on the piano with D omitted and D-flat, E-flat, and A-flat added) and for the development section, a theme with twelve variations.

Many persons may think Mr. Tcherepnin to be considerably older than he actually is. This results from a natural confusion between a famous father and an equally famous son. Nicholas Tcherepnin, his father, was conductor of the Imperial Opera and a professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, besides being considered one of the leading Russian composers of his generation.

* * *

Alexander was born in St. Petersburg in 1899 and remembers some of the eminent confrères of his father. He recalls going to the railroad station when eight years old as one of the party to see Rimsky-Korsakov depart for concerts in Paris. The younger Tcherepnin left for Paris in 1918 and made that city his base for extended tours, including several visits to the Orient. He is at present teaching at the music school of De Paul University in Chicago. Since September of this year he had decided to make the United States his home.

Questioned about musical conditions in America as compared to other parts of the world, Mr. Tcherepnin had high words of praise for many aspects. He feels that this country is a leader in the general trend toward deeper penetration of serious music among the mass of the people. He has also noted the way in which our orchestras in smaller cities supply a social as well as musical need by serving as a focal point and as a common meeting-ground for those interested in the arts.

* * *

As a new resident, the composer is somewhat reticent in discussing the negative side of American music. He confined himself to a statement that more financial assistance might be given to American music students. The high cost of music education causes the period of preparation to be curtailed at times, and thus throws teachers and performers into the field with insufficient practice and not enough musical experience.

Of music in general, he noted that from 1900 to 1940 the trend was always towards the novel. For the past 10 years he has observed a return to greater self-expression leading to a new period of romanticism. In his own music, formal structure is used as a starting point, but the form is usually kept free and the ideas are allowed to develop naturally. After a constant search for new methods, he came to realize that his work had become too abstract and had led him to an impasse. To "get back to earth," Mr. Tcherepnin steeped himself in folklore, not only of Russia, but of many other countries.

Mr. Tcherepnin believes that in the folk music of all nations is to be found a common absolute musical truth, and he constantly returns to folk-lore for renewal of inspiration and for added stimulation.

Wherever the composer has traveled, he has absorbed part of the native idiom and reflected it in his work. It is interesting to speculate on what will emerge from Mr. Tcherepnin's gifted pen when he has had enough opportunity to study the wealth of folk music to be found within our own boundaries.

Symphony in Providence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season to Providence for a concert at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium Tuesday evening at 8:15. Charles Munch will present two symphonies—No. 103 in E-flat by Haydn, known as "The Drum Roll," and Schumann's First, the "Spring" Symphony.

In the second part of the program he will perform two works of Maurice Ravel— "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a tribute by a recent great French composer to an earlier one, and the "Spanish Rhapsody."

By a Staff Photographer

Alexander Tcherepnin, composer, who will be soloist in his own Second Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concerts this week end in Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 31 1950

Music News—How Boston Critics Rated Tchaikovsky

By ARTHUR BERGER

The proverbial method for inducing respect and tolerance for new music is to point to critics and audiences of the past who attacked works that later have been hailed as masterpieces or have enjoyed popular success. No composer of the present, however obscure, is innocent of the deep and sincere conviction that only the passage of time is necessary for the recognition he feels he deserves. Conversely, some justified criticisms of the past are now unduly ridiculed because a work subsequently enjoyed a success despite limitations that may actually exist on certain of its levels. Other past prognostications that we look back upon appear grotesque from any point of view, and some striking instances are provided by a recent Boston Symphony program-book which reproduced reviews of Tchaikovsky's now popular piano concerto following its world premiere in Boston on Oct. 25, 1875, by Hans von Buelow.

The luke-warm reports, printed in those days without by-lines, gave credit to the performer for the audience enthusiasm. "The Boston Transcript" put its foot in by stating categorically that the "elaborate" work is "as difficult for popular apprehension as the name of the composer," who, it was further stated, lacked individuality. "The Boston Globe" could not "award it such a high degree of merit as an enduring work," "The Boston Traveler" agreed it would not last, and "The Boston Evening Journal" felt it would not even supplant the Raff and Rubinstein concertos. A claim, however, that even now may not be so easily demolished is the one in "The Boston Globe" that it has "too much" of an "evident striving for effect."

* * *

Miscellanie: Tibor Kozma, who will assume the duties of conducting "Fledermaus" at the Metropolitan Opera House starting Thursday night, is a Hungarian-born musician who has been active in American musical circles since 1941. He is a pianist as well as conductor, and was accompanist for several well known singers. He conducted for the "Porgy and Bess" and "Carmen Jones" road companies, and in 1948 joined the music staff of the Metropolitan Opera Association. He was musical director of opera in Central City, Col., last summer. . . . Sigma Alpha Iota fraternity found no entry worthy of a prize in its recent competition for an American piano work, and it has decided instead to use the prize of $300 as a commission, which has been given to William Schuman. Schuman's piano work will be introduced in the course of the 1953 national convention marking the fraternity's fiftieth anniversary.

* * *

About Conductors: Ernest Ansermet, the Swiss conductor who will be on the podium for the Philadelphia Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall Tuesday night, is considering taking a year off, after fulfilling several commitments here and abroad, in order to write a book on a system of analysis he has evolved with the idea of making the meaning of music clearer to listeners. . . . Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, has been engaged by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra for twenty concerts from June 1 to July 9. . . . Dean Dixon has assembled an international group of 140 players under the name of the American International Orchestra of Paris in response to the lively interest of Parisians in American music.

* * *

This Clipping From
BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE
DEC 31 1950

NBC Symphony

Guido Cantelli will direct the NBC Symphony orchestra in music of Rossini and Bartok, heard tomorrow night at 9 o'clock over WJBO.

The program will open with Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" overture. This is one of the many operatic overtures of Rossini that have become an integral part of the modern symphonic repertoire, even though the operas themselves are infrequently given.

The remaining portion of the program will be devoted to Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra." This work was composed late in 1943 on commission from the Koussevitzky foundation and was first performed in 1944 by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Bartok described the music in these words: "The general mood of the work represents, apart from the jesting second movement, a gradual transition from the sternness of the first movement and the lugubrious death song of the third, to the life assertion of the last one . . ." The composition is in five movements.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
DEC 31 1950

'Quintet in F' pairs Curzon for recording

"Quintet in F minor" (Brahms). Only the record-wise will recognize anything uncommon about this pairing of Clifford Curzon and the Budapest Quartet; the performance is on the Columbia label, and Curzon is under contract to the London firm. However, since the latter company had no intention of recording this work, it lent him, Hollywood-fashion, to Columbia, which justified all the trouble by producing a splendid-sounding version of the favorite Brahms work. Would that more of the same kind of thing could be done, especially in opera, and for the benefit of the Met!

"Beatrice and Benedict" (Berlioz). The brilliant and colorful overture is an excellent example of the change wrought by Charles Munch in the style of playing now favored by the Boston Symphony. Fine, clear strings and lighter brass than of yore, all reproduced with sheen and excellent balance. (RCA Victor.)

"Una furtiva lagrima" (Donizetti). Jussi Bjoerling's first recording of this much-sung air, thus putting him in competition with Gigli, Tagliavini, Crooks and Schipa, not to mention Caruso. His treatment is more robust than any of these, but beautifully managed in its own way. The disc-partner is the "Lament of Federico" from Cilea's "L'Arlesiana." (RCA Victor.)

"Gerard Souzay Recital." Nearly a dozen and a half songs on this London long-playing disc, which introduces to the nation the French baritone who recently made his New York debut. Two composers only are called upon, with Faure represented by 11 songs and Schubert by six. Needless to say, in so large a selection there is some fluctuation of quality, but the average is very high. The Faure set includes 'Au Bord de l'Eau," "Apres un Reve," 'Claire de Lune" and "L'Horizon Chimerique.' Among the Schubert songs are "Fischerweise," "Heidenroslein," "Der Poppelganger," and 'Der Erlkonig." Both Souzay's voice and the piano played by Jacqueline Bonneau are richly reproduced.

POPULAR

"Mr. Music." A happy New Year's greeting from Bing Crosby, Dorothy Kirsten and Andrew Sisters, as they sound in the just-released film. Singing with Bing (instead of for Bing) Girsten vocalizes prettily in "Accidents Will Happen" and "Milady." With the Andrew Sisters Bing sounds understandably more relaxed in "High on the List" and "Life Is So Peculiar." He also sings "Accidents Will Happen" by himself, if that is the way you want it. (Decca.)

"Teddy Wilson Plays." Time for the talented 10 of Teddy Wilson in Columbia's series of "Piano Moods," and a welcome chance for him to rerecord some of his favorite tunes: "Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea," "Honeysuckle Rose," "Fine and Dandy," "I Can't Give You Anything But Love" among them. For a novelty he pianophrases "Bess, You Is My Woman Now" with his expectable taste and musicality. Bass and drums keep the rhythm going. Choice matter for anybody who likes popular piano well played. (Columbia.)

"Pagan Love Song." This Pagan is Gene Griffin, vocalizing to a dryly percussive accompaniment punctuated by the steel-guitaring of Jerry Byrd. The overside lament is "Beyond the Reef" done in like manner. Me, no-like manner. (Mercury.)

"It Was So Beautiful." "And You're Mine" is the remained of the title of this fine item revived by Jo Stafford in her best "Too-Marvelous-for-Words" manner. Bill Loose heads the orchestra for this and "Love Is a Masquerate" on the overside. (Capitol.)

[207]

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

War Crisis Threatens Prospects For Music

By GORDON ARMSTRONG

Tomorrow begins a new year, perhaps the most crucial one in the history of our country. What the future may bring about, no one can tell. But this much we do know already and that is there is to be a tightening up all around, with less money available for the so-called non-essentials such as amusements in general and symphonic programs in particular.

For some time, of course, our concert halls have been feeling the pinch with dwindling audiences and pared budgets. Among other reasons for this already sad state of affairs is the fact that people just haven't as much money to spend for concerts and amusements. Nowadays one is often faced with the problem of whether to buy a steak for supper or a ticket to a concert that evening. In this dilemma, the stomach is apt to win out over the mind. After all, the appeals of hunger have to be satisfied before the mind becames properly receptive to entertainment. And besides, you can always stay at home and listen to the radio or watch television.

As we face the New Year, with a Spartan existence in the offing and even less money in our pocketbooks for "non-essentials," the prospects for the days ahead are certainly disturbing for all lovers of the tonal art. Probably many symphonic groups will be forced to disband because of decreased income. Certainly, those symphonic orchestras who are now receiving city and state aid in making up their normal deficits can hardly hope to have the size of their grants enlarged to offset the smaller receipts from ticket sales.

In fact, it may be said that already "the handwriting is on the walls" of the concert halls. Floyd G. Blair, president of the board of trustees of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, had some alarming things to say recently about the future of that 109-year-old orchestra. According to Mr. Blair, he expects the society's reserves to be exhausted by the end of next season. What will happen then is almost a certainty in the present state of affairs for Mr. Blair is not optimistic over the prospects of discovering new sources of income.

'MET' PICTURE DARK

The picture at the "Met" is no more bright, what with a deficit last season of more than $400,000 and an equal or greater loss in prospect for the current season. The Metropolitan Opera Company's board has no funds to dig into so that only a miracle will prevent the house from being dark and deserted next season.

The local scene is shadowed by the same dark clouds which are obscuring the countrywide musical panorama. Attendance so far in the current New Haven Symphony concerts is not improving and in general, the orchestra's trustees face the same bleak future that confronts similar groups all over the country.

"It's an ill wind that doesn't blow some good," is an old saying that is applicable both now and in the immediate future. We have become a nation of listeners, increasingly so in recent years, and we have lost the art of making our own music. As poor as our own efforts may be, there is a certain satisfaction and joy in performing for our own amusement (or amazement—take your choice) that can never be experienced in listening. Perhaps many who feel obliged to deny themselves the luxury of the concert hall will discover the joys of performing. We must have music!

CHALLENGE TO ALL

I would like to quote a paragraph from a recent editorial in Musical America magazine which poses both a hope and a challenge for all of us. Says the writer—"Perhaps we are incurably optimistic, but we prefer to believe that the musical art has really taken deep root in the United States, and that we shall be ready to meet any challenge that threatens its continuing growth. But time is running out, and every one of us must become an active advocate of music, not merely a passive admirer of it. There is no use hoping that the best of all possible worlds will come into being in our lifetime. We must make the best world we can, and that will require loyalty, imagination, and hard work."

Koussevitzky Continues Active Retirement

When Serge Koussevitzky retired from his long held post with the Boston Symphony two years ago, most of us thought that his conducting days were over, aside from his announced intentions of continuing as the head man of the Berkshire Music Festivals during the Summer. But "you can't keep a good man down" or from getting around either for evidently the good Doctor had no ideas about quitting the podium but was just tired with having to stay put! Twenty-five years is a long time for a conductor to spend with one orchestra and few conductors can match that length of tenure.

Since his "retirement," the former Boston leader has really made up for lost time in the matter of getting around. He has conducted orchestras throughout Europe and spent a considerable amount of time in Israel conducting the Israel Philharmonic for which he has developed a great liking. His protege, Leonard Bernstein, has also spent some time as a conductor in residence of the orchestra.

Israel Philharmonic To Tour America

An American tour of the Israel Philharmonic has been in the works for several months and of course, Dr. Koussevitsky is one of the sponsors of the idea which has now come to fruition. The orchestra left Israel a few days ago for its concert tour in this country. The musicians will spend three months here, giving some 57 concerts in 40 cities. Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in 18 concerts while Leonard Bernstein is scheduled to be on the podium for 30 of the events. Eleazar De Carvalho, another young protege of Koussevitzky will conduct five programs with Izler Solomon and William Steinberg slated to divide the conducting assignments of the four remaining concerts.

Considering that Leonard Bernstein has conducted many of our major symphony orchestras, his recent remarks about the Israel Philharmonic take on additional significance. Said Mr. Bernstein, "The orchestra has never sounded as beautiful as now. As a matter of fact, I think they are the most inspired orchestra of the world—inspired by the pioneering spirit of their state and striving community."

The Israel Philharmonic will commence its tour here early next month. The orchestra will make an appearance in Hartford.

Programs Announced For Young People's Concerts

Here are the first announcements concerning the coming series of Young People's Concerts by the New Haven Symphony. The committee in charge of the events met a few weeks ago to discuss plans for the programs. Present at this meeting were Mrs. Louis H. Nahum, Mrs. Harold Belshaw, Mrs. Samuel Harvey, Mrs. Robert Johnson, Harry H. Schyde, Daggett M. Lee and conductor Harry Berman. As in past years, an essay contest for pupils in the schools is to be held in connection with the series of concerts.

In the first concert on February 3, the featured young soloist will be Judith Jaimes, 11-year-old Venezuelan pianist. A 16-year-old American violinist, Michael Applebaum, will hold the spotlight at the second concert on February 17. The final program on March 10 is to present the combined choruses of Hillhouse and Wilbur Cross High Schools.

It is a pleasure to report that this is one local series of concerts that are always well attended. Their importance in the educational program for our youngsters can hardly be over-estimated.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 31 1950

Boston Symphony Here Again Tuesday

SYMPHONIES by Haydn and Schumann and two compositions by Ravel will compose the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present at its third Providence concert of the season Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Charles Munch, the orchestra's musical director, will conduct and the order of the program follows:

Symphony No. 103, in E-flat major ("The Drum Roll") ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" ..... Ravel
"Rhapsodie Espagnole" ..... Ravel

On Anderson Program

At her recital Jan. 9, in the Rhode Island College of Education's "Celebrity Series" in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Marian Anderson will sing arias by Donizetti and Mozart, songs in English by Purcell, Benjamin Britten and Roger Quilter, a group of Schubert lieder and another of Negro spirituals. Among the latter will be "Wide River," "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands," "Hear de Lam's A-Cryin' " and "Ride On, King Jesus." The program is the same which the noted contralto will present in Symphony Hall, Boston, the following Sunday. Franz Rupp will be her accompanist.

Ricci in Cranston Jan. 8

Ruggiero Ricci, who will give a violin recital in the Cranston Civic Music Association series Jan. 8 in Cranston High School, will be remembered by concertgoers as a child prodigy who became famous overnight after his debut at the age of nine years in New York. He has now teached 30 years, 21 of which have been spent on the concert stage.

Born in San Francisco he began the study of the violin early and made his first public appearance in San Francisco the year before his arrival in New York. Since then his career has been a pretty steady one of tours of this country, Europe and South America, in solo recital and as soloist with leading orchestras.

From 1942 to 1946 he served with the Army Air Forces and upon his discharge made his first postwar violin appearance in Town Hall, New York, playing an entire program of unaccompanied works for the violin. Music is both his public profession and his private hobby which has built for him one of the most comprehensive private libraries of literature, including rare scores and reference books. He carries with him a Guarnerius violin which is insured for $30,000.

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
DEC 31 1950

Record Reviews

Charles Munch, conducting Brahms' Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the chords come at you top-sides foremost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms (RCA Victor; 12-inch L.P.)

Josef Krips, in his new recording of the Fourth with the London Symphony, places the center of gravity just below center and the chords come tumbling end-over-end at you, spilling and splashing

That is the essential difference between these rivals—transparency and sublime order by Munch and a surcharged turbulence, which is not unaffecting, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

The former conception is that of Willem Mengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth Symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip was his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine—he commands it (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch L.P.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch L.P.)

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart. Kleiber's is new, with superlative ffrr quality, whereas Mengelberg's is pre-war and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among 20th century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch L.P.)

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony. The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece (Concert Hall: 12-inch L.P.)

RCA VICTOR RECORDS
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Recorded under the direction of CHARLES MUNCH

Beethoven Symphony No. 7
Beethoven "Gratulations" Minuet
Berlioz *Beatrice and Benedict Overture
Brahms Symphony No. 4
Ravel *La Valse
Schubert Symphony No. 2

Recorded under the direction of SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
(Newly Recorded)

Haydn "Oxford" Symphony No. 92; *Toy Symphony
Mozart Eine Kleine Nachtmusik
Prokofieff Peter and the Wolf (Narrator: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt)
Wagner *Prelude to Act I, "Lohengrin"

Bach, J. S. Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6; Suites 1, 2, 3, 4; Prelude in E major
Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, *3, 5, 8, 9; Missa Solemnis, *Overture to Egmont
Berlioz Symphony "Harold in Italy" (William Primrose); Three Pieces from "Damnation of Faust"; Roman Carnival Overture
Brahms Symphonies Nos. *3, 4; Violin Concerto (Heifetz); Academic Festival Overture
Copland "El Salon México"; "Appalachian Spring"; "A Lincoln Portrait" (Melvyn Douglas)
Debussy "La Mer"
Grieg "Spring"
Handel Larghetto (Concerto No. 12); Air from "Semele" (Dorothy Maynor)
Hanson Symphony No. 3
Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, No. 94
Khachaturian Piano Concerto (William Kapell)
Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony, No. 4
Mozart Symphonies in E major (25); *B-flat (33); *C major (36); *E-flat (39); Serenade for Winds; Overtures, "Idomeneo," "Impresario," "La Clemenza di Tito"; Air from "The Magic Flute" (Dorothy Maynor)
Piston Prelude and Allegro (Organ: E. Power Biggs)
Prokofieff *Classical Symphony; Violin Concerto No. 2 (Heifetz); "Lieutenant Kije" Suite; "Love for Three Oranges," Scherzo and March; Suite No. 2, "Romeo and Juliet"; Dance from "Chout"; Symphony No. 5
Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead"; "Vocalise"
Ravel "Daphnis and Chloé," Suite No. 2; Raposodie Espagnole; "Mother Goose" Suite; "Bolero"; "Pavane for a Dead Infanta"
Satie-Debussy "Gymnopédies" 1 and 2
Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony; *Symphony No. 5
Shostakoritch Symphony No. 9
Sibelius Symphony No. 2
Strauss, J. Waltzes: "Voices of Spring," "Vienna Blood"
Strauss, R. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; "Don Juan"
Stravinsky "Song of the Volga Bargemen"
Tchaikovsky Symphonies 4, 5, 6; String Serenade; "Francesca da Rimini"
Viraldi Concerto Grosso in D minor
Wagner Prelude and Good Friday Spell, "Parsifal"; "Flying Dutchman" Overture
Weber "Oberon" Overture

Recorded under the direction of LEONARD BERNSTEIN
Stravinsky "L'Histoire du Soldat," Octet for Wind Instruments

*Also 45 r.p.m. Also 33 1/3 (L.P.) and 45 r.p.m.

[208]

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
DEC 31 1950

War Crisis Threatens Prospects For Music

By GORDON ARMSTRONG

Tomorrow begins a new year, perhaps the most crucial one in the history of our country. What the future may bring about, no one can tell. But this much we do know already and that is there is to be a tightening up all around, with less money available for the so-called non-essentials such as amusements in general and symphonic programs in particular.

For some time, of course, our concert halls have been feeling the pinch with dwindling audiences and pared budgets. Among other reasons for this already sad state of affairs is the fact that people just haven't as much money to spend for concerts and amusements. Nowadays one is often faced with the problem of whether to buy a steak for supper or a ticket to a concert that evening. In this dilemma, the stomach is apt to win out over the mind. After all, the appeals of hunger have to be satisfied before the mind becomes properly receptive to entertainment. And besides, you can always stay at home and listen to the radio or watch television.

As we face the New Year, with a Spartan existence in the offing and even less money in our pocketbooks for "non-essentials," the prospects for the days ahead are certainly disturbing for all lovers of the tonal art. Probably many symphonic groups will be forced to disband because of decreased income. Certainly, those symphonic orchestras who are now receiving city and state aid in making up their normal deficits can hardly hope to have the size of their grants enlarged to offset the smaller receipts from ticket sales.

In fact, it may be said that already "the handwriting is on the walls" (of the concert halls). Floyd G. Blair, president of the board of trustees of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, had some alarming things to say recently about the future of that 109-year-old orchestra. According to Mr. Blair, he expects the society's reserves to be exhausted by the end of next season. What will happen then is almost a certainty in the present state of affairs for Mr. Blair is not optimistic over the prospects of discovering new sources of income.

'MET' PICTURE DARK

The picture at the "Met" is no more bright, what with a deficit last season of more than $400,000 and an equal or greater loss in prospect for the current season. The Metropolitan Opera Company's board has no funds to dig into so that only a miracle will prevent the house from being dark and deserted next season.

The local scene is shadowed by the same dark clouds which are obscuring the countrywide musical panorama. Attendance so far in the current New Haven Symphony concerts is not improving and in general, the orchestra's trustees face the same bleak future that confronts similar groups all over the country.

"It's an ill wind that doesn't blow some good," is an old saying that is applicable both now and in the immediate future. We have become a nation of listeners, increasingly so in recent years, and we have lost the art of making our own music. As poor as our own efforts may be, there is a certain satisfaction and joy in performing for our own amusement (or amazement—take your choice) that can never be experienced in listening. Perhaps many who feel obliged to deny themselves the luxury of the concert hall will discover the joys of performing. We must have music!

CHALLENGE TO ALL

I would like to quote a paragraph from a recent editorial in Musical America magazine which poses both a hope and a challenge for all of us. Says the writer—"Perhaps we are incurably optimistic, but we prefer to believe that the musical art has really taken deep root in the United States, and that we shall be ready to meet any challenge that threatens its continuing growth. But time is running out, and every one of us must become an active advocate of music, not merely a passive admirer of it. There is no use hoping that the best of all possible worlds will come into being in our lifetime. We must make the best world we can, and that will require loyalty, imagination, and hard work."

Koussevitzky Continues Active Retirement

When Serge Koussevitzky retired from his long held post with the Boston Symphony two years ago, most of us thought that his conducting days were over, aside from his announced intentions of continuing as the head man of the Berkshire Music Festivals during the Summer. But "you can't keep a good man down" or from getting around either for evidently the good Doctor had no ideas about quitting the podium but was just tired with having to stay put! Twenty-five years is a long time for a conductor to spend with one orchestra and few conductors can match that length of tenure.

Since his "retirement," the former Boston leader has really made up for lost time in the matter of getting around. He has conducted orchestras throughout Europe and spent a considerable amount of time in Israel conducting the Israel Philharmonic for which he has developed a great liking. His protege, Leonard Bernstein, has also spent some time as a conductor in residence of the orchestra.

Israel Philharmonic To Tour America

An American tour of the Israel Philharmonic has been in the works for several months and of course, Dr. Koussevitsky is one of the sponsors of the idea which has flow come to fruition. The orchestra left Israel a few days ago for its concert tour in this country. The musicians will spend three months here, giving some 57 concerts in 40 cities. Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the orchestra in 18 concerts while Leonard Bernstein is scheduled to be on the podium for 30 of the events. Eleazar De Carvalho, another young protege of Koussevitzky will conduct five programs with Izler Solomon and William Steinberg slated to divide the conducting assignments of the four remaining concerts.

Considering that Leonard Bernstein has conducted many of our major symphony orchestras, his recent remarks about the Israel Philharmonic take on additional significance. Said Mr. Bernstein, "The orchestra has never sounded as beautiful as now. As a matter of fact, I think they are the most inspired orchestra of the world—inspired by the pioneering spirit of their state and striving community."

The Israel Philharmonic will commence its tour here early next month. The orchestra will make an appearance in Hartford.

Programs Announced For Young People's Concerts

Here are the first announcements concerning the coming series of Young People's Concerts by the New Haven Symphony. The committee in charge of the events met a few weeks ago to discuss plans for the programs. Present at this meeting were Mrs. Louis H. Nahum, Mrs. Harold Belshaw, Mrs. Samuel Harvey, Mrs. Robert Johnson, Harry H. Schyde, Daggett M. Lee and conductor Harry Barman. As in past years, an essay contest for pupils in the schools is to be held in connection with the series of concerts.

In the first concert on February 3, the featured young soloist will be Judith Jaimes, 11-year-old Venezuelan pianist. A 16-year-old American violinist, Michael Applebaum, will hold the spotlight at the second concert on Febrtuary 17. The final program on March 10 is to present the combined choruses of Hillhouse and Wilbur Cross High Schools.

It is a pleasure to report that this is one local series of concerts that are always well attended. Their importance in the educational program for our youngsters can hardly be over-estimated.

[208]

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 31 1950

Boston Symphony Here Again Tuesday

SYMPHONIES by Haydn and Schumann and two compositions by Ravel will compose the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present at its third Providence concert of the season Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Charles Munch, the orchestra's musical director, will conduct and the order of the program follows:

Symphony No. 103, in E-flat, major ("The Drum Roll") ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, major, Op. 38 ..... Schumann
Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" ..... Ravel
"Rhapsodie Espagnole" ..... Ravel

On Anderson Program

At her recital Jan. 9, in the Rhode Island College of Education's "Celebrity Series" in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Marian Anderson will sing arias by Donizetti and Mozart, songs in English by Purcell, Benjamin Britten and Roger Quilter, a group of Schubert lieder and another of Negro spirituals. Among the latter will be "Wide River," "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands," "Hear de Lam's A-Cryin'" and "Ride On, King Jesus." The program is the same which the noted contralto will present in Symphony Hall, Boston, the following Sunday. Franz Rupp will be her accompanist.

Ricci in Cranston Jan. 8

Ruggiero Ricci, who will give a violin recital in the Cranston Civic Music Association series Jan. 8 in Cranston High School, will be remembered by concertgoers as a child prodigy who became famous overnight after his debut at the age of nine years in New York. He has now teached 30 years, 21 of which have been spent on the concert stage.

Born in San Francisco he began the study of the violin early and made his first public appearance in San Francisco the year before his arrival in New York. Since then his career has been a pretty steady one of tours of this country, Europe and South America, in solo recital and as soloist with leading orchestras.

From 1942 to 1946 he served with the Army Air Forces and upon his discharge made his first postwar appearance in Town Hall, New York, playing an entire program of works for the violin unaccompanied. He has built for him one of the most comprehensive private libraries of violin literature, including rare scores and reference books. He carries with him a Guarnerius violin which is insured for $20,000.

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
DEC 31 1950

Record Reviews

Charles Munch, conducting Brahms' Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the chords come at you top-sides foremost and you hear their light and color all the way through to their bottoms. (RCA Victor; 12-inch L.P.)

Josef Krips, in his new recording of the Fourth with the London Symphony, places the center of gravity just below center and the chords come tumbling end-over-end at you, spilling and splashing.

That is the essential difference between these rivals—transparency and sublime order by Munch and a surcharged turbulence, which is not unaffecting, by Krips. The recorded quality of both is excellent.

You may also have a choice as to Beethoven. Is he a ruthless demiurge blasting musical ukases with brutal finality? Or is he a patched-pants familiar and you have beer and sandwiches while listening?

The former conception is that of Willem Mengelberg, a self-conceived demiurge himself. He pounds the Fifth Symphony out of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw as though a bull whip was his baton. You sit on the edge of your chair with stiffened spine—he commands it (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch L.P.)

The latter is the view of Erich Kleiber, the veteran and much respected Austro-German maestro, who has recorded the Seventh Symphony, also with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw. True, the Seventh is more of the stomach and blood than the Fifth. Still, Beethoven is entirely human to Kleiber, however exalted (London; 12-inch L.P.)

The two recordings are at least 11 years apart. Kleiber's is new, with superlative ffrr quality, whereas Mengelberg's is pre-war and shows it. But Mengelberg's could have been produced by no one but Mengelberg, an enormous figure among 20th century conductors.

Another Kleiber recording newly available is of the Beethoven Second but it is an old one with an inferior orchestra, the Brussels Radio Symphony (Capitol-Telefunken; 12-inch L.P.)

By no means least among new symphonic recordings is a wonderfully realized performance of Schubert's Fifth by Fritz Busch, well-remembered by Metropolitan Opera followers, conducting the Winterthur Symphony. The reviewer can't recall having got more from the piece (Concert Hall; 12-inch L.P.)

RCA VICTOR RECORDS
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Recorded under the direction of CHARLES MUNCH

Beethoven Symphony No. 7
Beethoven "Gratulations" Minuet
Berlioz *Beatrice and Benedict Overture
Brahms Symphony No. 4
Ravel *La Valse
Schubert Symphony No. 2

Recorded under the direction of SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
(Newly Recorded)

Haydn "Oxford" Symphony No. 92; *Toy Symphony
Mozart Eine Kleine Nachtmusik
Prokofieff Peter and the Wolf (Narrator: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt)
Wagner *Prelude to Act I, "Lohengrin"

Bach, J. S. Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6; Suites 1, 2, 3, 4; Prelude in E major

Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, *3, 5, 8, 9; Missa Solemnis, *Overture to Egmont

Berlioz Symphony "Harold in Italy" (William Primrose); Three Pieces from "Damnation of Faust"; Roman Carnival Overture

Brahms Symphonies Nos. 3, 4; Violin Concerto (Heifetz); Academic Festival Overture

Copland "El Salon México"; "Appalachian Spring"; "A Lincoln Portrait" (Melvyn Douglas)

Debussy "La Mer"

Grieg "Spring"

Handel Larghetto (Concerto No. 12); Air from "Semele" (Dorothy Maynor)

Hanson Symphony No. 3

Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, No. 94

Khachaturian Piano Concerto (William Kapell)

Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony, No. 4

Mozart Symphonies in E major (26); *B-flat (33); *C major (36); *E-flat (39); Serenade for Winds; Overtures, *"Idomeneo," "Impresario," *"La Clemenza di Tito"; Air from "The Magic Flute" (Dorothy Maynor)

Piston Prelude and Allegro (Organ: E. Power Biggs)

Prokofieff *Classical Symphony; Violin Concerto No. 2 (Heifetz); "Lieutenant Kije" Suite; "Love for Three Oranges," Scherzo and March; Suite No. 2, "Romeo and Juliet"; Dance from "Chout"; Symphony No. 5

Rachmaninoff "Isle of the Dead"; "Vocalise"

Ravel "Daphnis and Chloé," Suite No. 2; Raposodie Espagnole; "Mother Goose" Suite; Bolero"; "Pavane for a Dead Infanta"

Satie-Debussy *"Gymnopédies" 1 and 2

Schubert "Unfinished" Symphony; *Symphony No. 5

Shostakovitch Symphony No. 9

Sibelius Symphony No. 2

Strauss, J. Waltzes: "Voices of Spring," "Vienna Blood"

Strauss, R. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; *"Don Juan"

Stravinsky "Song of the Volga Bargemen"

Tchaikovsky Symphonies 4, 5, 6; String Serenade; "Francesca da Rimini"

Vivaldi Concerto Grosso in D minor

Wagner Prelude and Good Friday Spell, "Parsifal"; "Flying Dutchman" Overture

Weber "Oberon" Overture

Recorded under the direction of LEONARD BERNSTEIN
Stravinsky "L'Histoire du Soldat," Octet for Wind Instruments

*Also 45 r.p.m. Also 33 1/3 (L.P.) and 45 r.p.m.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 31 1950

Civic Orchestra 25 Years Young

CONDUCTOR Paul Cherkassky, Boston Symphony violinist, beats time with right hand and with left asks for vibrato from strings.

Here is the whole orchestra, all dressed up, giving a concert on the stage of Jordan Hall. Mr. Cherkassky, baton poised, is on stand behind piano.

The Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston is celebrating its 25th anniversary. Founded in 1925 by Joseph Wagner, and conducted since 1944 by Paul Cherkassky, the orchestra now has 95 members, ranging in age from 18 to 65. Half are amateurs who like to keep their musical hand in, half are young professionals aiming at careers in music. In its quarter-century, the Civic Symphony has sent musicians to orchestras all over the country.

VIOLINS make an entrance. At left is Emmanuel Rubin, who is in the shoe business; at right, Vytaulus Janeys. They are members of first violin section.

THE OBOE, with its tiny double-reed mouthpiece, is extremely difficult. Civic Symphony's oboes are Edward Simms and Rita Waicenbook.

THE CELLO is always a difficult instrument. Here Martha Tucker and Jacob Riemer are in deep concentration as they execute a tricky passage.

CHORD for the trombones, the mighty and mellow-voiced "slip-horns" of the orchestra: John Trudeau and James Scott.

All kinds of people love music. The Civic Symphony's violas include Max Solomon, in the candy business, and Dr. A. Alter.

GLOBE STAFF PHOTO BY HUGH O'DONNELL

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 31 1950

Youth Concerts

A group of Cambridge parents has organized a series of children's concerts to be presented in Sanders Theatre on Saturday afternoons, Jan. 27, March 10 and April 28. Members of the Boston Symphony (including the Zimbler Sinfonietta), conducted by Richard Burgin, make up the orchestra.

JEAN SANDBANK, 16-year-old Brazilian violinist, was the soloist at the first concert. The children thought she was "a pretty lady."

FIRST LESSON — After the concert the children swarmed on the stage to examine the instruments. Here, Henry Portnoi of the Boston Sym... gives little Eric Jacobs a lesson on the bass fiddle.

INVESTIGATION—Elizabeth Palmer, left, and John Riley, right, find out about a bassoon from Symphony player Raymond Allard and commentator Rudolph Elie.

(Globe Staff Photos by Charles Dixon)

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Firkusny and Munch Present Martinu Concerto

Boston Symphony. Charles Munch, conductor. Rudolf Firkusny, pianist. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 18:

Symphony No. 3 ..... Diamond
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Martinu
(First time in New York)
Symphony, D minor ..... Franck

In the first Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall, Charles Munch and Rudolf Firkusny, piano soloist of the occasion, made the New York audience acquainted with an extraordinarily fine new work, Bohuslav Martinu's Third Piano Concerto. A story of patriotic interest attaches to the Czech-born composer's writing of the concerto. When he had reached the middle of the third movement, Martinu heard of the sudden death of Jan Masaryk, his close friend for many years. Although the movement was in the gay style of a polka, Martinu felt that he could not continue in that vein. Consequently he shifted abruptly to material of a sad and contemplative character before going on to the reprise of the opening section.

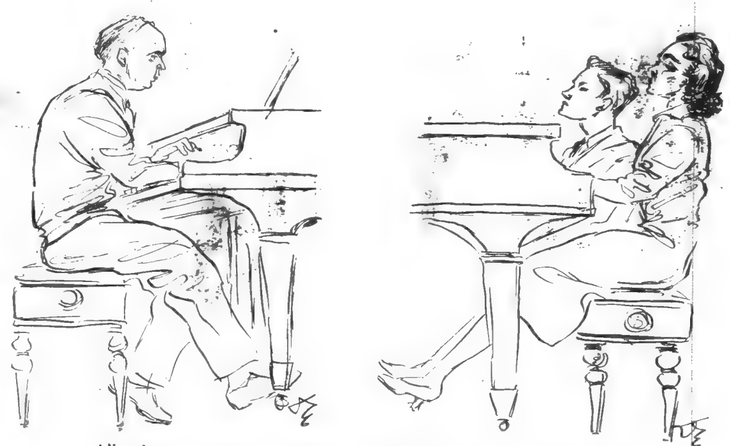
Although Martinu considers the concerto "frankly more Czech" than most of his other works, its national qualities are less apparent than its generally eclectic outlook. Some reviewers have called the music Brahmsian; this is hardly apt, though Martinu does not hesitate to call on many idiomatic features of late nineteenth-century music, along with devices of a more contemporary cast. A narrow definition of personal style, as one finds it in the music of so intellectually oriented a composer as Stravinsky, is not Martinu's aim. He is primarily a spokesman for the heart rather than the mind (though a keenly analytic intelligence guides him), and his musical thoughts spring forth so spontaneously, in so wide a variety of moods, that his music in general, and the new concerto in particular, often seems more rhapsodic than formal. Yet this is the art that conceals art, for his works are always satisfying in structural balance. The Piano Concerto is no exception. The basic materials of its three movements are extremely economical, yet they are developed and ornamented with such richness of fancy that their fundamental simplicity is not apparent at first.

Revolting against the virtuoso manner of writing for piano and orchestra, Martinu has sought in the Third Concerto to recapture the qualities of what he considers "the truest piano music"—that of Mozart and Beethoven. Although the piano is busy most of the time, it is not required to build elocutionary climaxes or to out-thunder a large orchestra. His instrumentation is discreet, and its transparency allows every note of the piano part—especially when it is played with such lucidity and effortless sonority as Mr. Firkusny brought to it—to assume a specific and important value in the whole texture. The concerto is so ingenious in spirit, and the exquisitely articulated performance of Mr. Munch, Mr. Firkusny, and the orchestra was so effortless that I hardly sensed the full beauty of the work as I heard it for the first time. But it keeps coming back in memory, renewing and enhancing the delight it gave initially, and I am persuaded that it will seem to gain in stature with renewed acquaintance.

The Martinu concerto followed David Diamond's Third Symphony, played previously in New York by Jean Morel and the Juilliard Orchestra, and reviewed by Robert Sabin in the Dec. 1, 1950, issue of MUSICAL AMERICA. As Mr. Sabin found, the symphony is one of the strongest and most expressive works its gifted composer has written. It is terse yet uncrowded and expansive, and tough-minded yet full of gentle sensibilities. The orchestra played it beautifully, for Mr. Munch plainly understood the music and sympathized with its intentions.

The concert ended with a brisk but well co-ordinated reading of the Franck symphony. Here, as in the modern works in the first half of the program, no trace remained of the uncouth tone and unbalanced instrumental relationships that have marred Mr. Munch's achievements with the Boston Symphony in the past. For the first time in my experience he seemed to hear the orchestra all the time, and to guide its playing with a wholly judicious hand.

—C. S.



All three members of the Casadesus family appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on Nov. 23; at the left is Robert, and at the right are his son, Jean, and wife, Gaby

Howard Swanson Symphony Has First Performance

New York Philharmonic Symphony Society. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Robert, Gaby, and Jean Casadesus, pianists. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 23, 24, and 26:

Overture, Ruler of the Spirits ..... Weber
Concerto, D minor, for three clavier and strings ..... Bach
Concerto, E flat major, K. 365, for two pianos ..... Mozart
Short Symphony ..... Swanson
La Mer ..... Debussy

This concert offered a musical em-

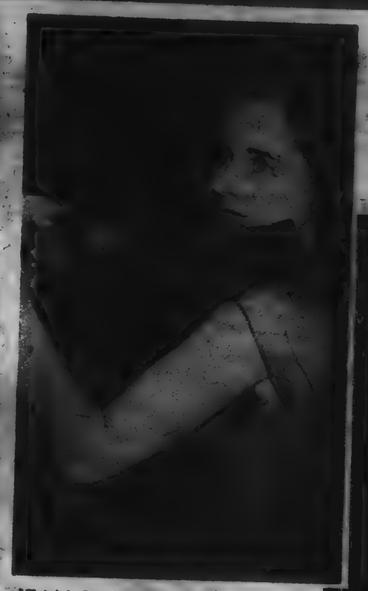
(Continued on page 27)

[210]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 31 1950

Youth Concerts

A group of Cambridge parents has organized a series of children's concerts to be presented in Sanders Theatre on Saturday afternoons, Jan. 27, March 10 and April 28. Members of the Boston Symphony (including the Zimbler Sinfonietta), conducted by Richard Burgin, make up the orchestra.



JEAN SANDBANK, 16-year-old Brazilian violinist, was the soloist at the first concert. The children thought she was "a pretty lady."

FIRST LESSON — After the concert the children swarmed on the stage to examine the instruments. Here Henry Portnoi of the Boston Sym... gives little Eric Jacobs a lesson on the bass fiddle.

INVESTIGATION—Elizabeth Palmer, left, and John Riley, right, find out about a bassoon from Symphony player Raymond Allard and commentator Rudolph Elie.

(Globe Staff Photos by Charles Dixon)

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Firkusny and Munch Present Martinu Concerto

Boston Symphony. Charles Munch, conductor. Rudolf Firkusny, pianist. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 18:

Symphony No. 1 ..... Piston
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Martinu
(First time in New York)
Symphony, D minor ..... Franck

In the first Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall, Charles Munch and Rudolf Firkusny, piano soloist of the occasion, made the New York audience acquainted with an extraordinarily fine new work, Bohuslav Martinu's Third Piano Concerto. A story of patriotic interest attaches to the Czech-born composer's writing of the concerto. When he had reached the middle of the third movement, Martinu heard of the sudden death of Jan Masaryk, his close friend for many years. Although the movement was in the gay style of a polka, Martinu felt that he could not continue in that vein. Consequently he shifted abruptly to material of a sad and contemplative character before going on to the reprise of the opening section.

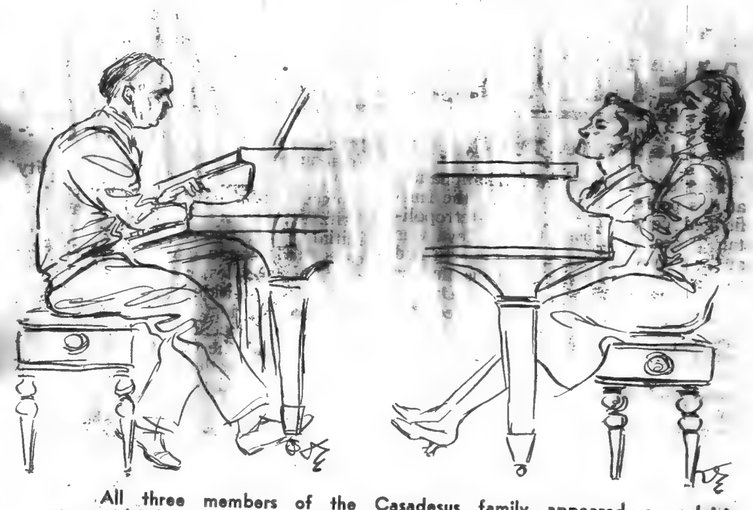
Although Martinu considers the concerto "frankly more Czech" than most of his other works, its national qualities are less apparent than its generally eclectic outlook. Some reviewers have called the music Brahmsian; this is hardly apt, though Martinu does not hesitate to call on many idiomatic features of late nineteenth-century music, along with devices of a more contemporary cast. A narrow definition of personal style, as one finds it in the music of so intellectually oriented a composer as Stravinsky, is not Martinu's aim. He is primarily a spokesman for the heart rather than the mind (though a keenly analytic intelligence guides him), and his musical thoughts spring forth so spontaneously, in so wide a variety of moods, that his music in general, and the new concerto in particular, often seems more rhapsodic than formal. Yet this is the art that conceals art, for his works are always satisfying in structural balance. The Piano Concerto is no exception. The basic materials of its three movements are extremely economical, yet they are developed and ornamented with such richness of fancy that their fundamental simplicity is not apparent at first.

Revolting against the virtuoso manner of writing for piano and orchestra, Martinu has sought in the Third Concerto to recapture the qualities of what he considers "the truest piano music"—that of Mozart and Beethoven. Although the piano is busy most of the time, it is not required to build elocutionary climaxes or to out-thunder a large orchestra. His instrumentation is discreet, and its transparency allows every note of the piano part—especially when it is played with such lucidity and effortless sonority as Mr. Firkusny brought to it—to assume a specific and important value in the whole texture. The concerto is so ingenious in spirit, and the exquisitely articulated performance of Mr. Munch, Mr. Firkusny, and the orchestra was so effortless that I hardly sensed the full beauty of the work as I heard it for the first time. But it keeps coming back in memory, renewing and enhancing the delight it gave initially, and I am persuaded that it will seem to gain in stature with renewed acquaintance.

The Martinu concerto followed David Diamond's Third Symphony, played previously in New York by Jean Morel and the Juilliard Orchestra, and reviewed by Robert Sabin in the Dec. 1, 1950, issue of MUSICAL AMERICA. As Mr. Sabin found, the symphony is one of the strongest and most expressive works its gifted composer has written. It is terse yet uncrowded and expansive, and tough-minded yet full of gentle sensibilities. The orchestra played it beautifully, for Mr. Munch plainly understood the music and sympathized with its intentions.

The concert ended with a brisk but well co-ordinated reading of the Franck symphony. Here, as in the modern works in the first half of the program, no trace remained of the uncouth tone and unbalanced instrumental relationships that have marred Mr. Munch's achievements with the Boston Symphony in the past. For the first time in my experience he seemed to hear the orchestra all the time, and to guide its playing with a wholly judicious hand.

—C. S.



All three members of the Casadesus family appeared as soloists with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on Nov. 23; at the left is Robert, and at the right are his son, Jean, and wife, Gaby

Howard Swanson Symphony Has First Performance

New York Philharmonic Symphony Society. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Robert, Gaby, and Jean Casadesus, pianists. Carnegie Hall, Nov. 20, 24, and 26:

Overture, Ruler of the Spirits ..... Weber
Concerto, D minor, for three clavichords and strings ..... Bach
Concerto, E flat major, K. 365, for two pianos ..... Mozart
Short Symphony ..... Swanson
La Mer ..... Debussy

This concert offered a musical em-

(Continued on page 27)

[210]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 31 1950

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That best-loved of oratorios, Handel's "Messiah," enjoys a monopoly that has no parallel in the musical world. To make a local matter of it, besides the two performances by the Handel and Haydn Society, there are, during the Christmas season, performances in the larger churches and by choral societies in neighboring cities and towns. As the Christmas carol piece, "Messiah" has the call. Yet it is not primarily a Christmas work, nor was it so intended, and Handel himself would probably have been surprised that it came to be accepted as such. The bulk of the text comes from the Old Testament and only a small fraction of it from the Gospels. The Dublin world premiere of 1742 took place in April and intrinsically there are good reasons for performing it on Easter Sunday, or for that matter, on Good Friday. It is, of course, an over-all musical presentation of its central figure, so its present widespread association with His birthday is logical enough.

* * *

The purpose of this preamble was not to question the suitability and appropriateness of these "Messiah" performances, without which many people would be unhappy indeed, but to call attention to a great choral work composed for and inspired by the Christmas season, the so-called Christmas Oratorio of Bach. I say so-called for, though the title is Bach's own, the Weinachts-Oratorium is in reality a set of six cantatas (or services) each designed for performance on one day of the 12-day period between Christmas and Epiphany. Collectively, the six parts, dealing with the birth and infancy of Christ, as narrated by Luke and Matthew, have a common theme and purpose. And a complete presentation, as we recently discovered, can be very impressive.

* * *

Yes, the Christmas Oratorio, not "Messiah," is the Christmas choral piece par excellence. If Schweitzer and others have been distressed by the fact that some of the music had originally served a secular purpose, the same is true of "Messiah," parts of which were first set down as Italian love songs. (Dr. Thompson Stone, in a moment of piety once omitted these portions from a Handel and Haydn performance.) Such, however, is the prestige of "Messiah" that in this part of the world, at least, it has almost completely eclipsed its companion work. Until Charles Munch made the laudable [redacted] performing as much of the latter as time permitted at the Symphony concerts preceding Christmas, few musically-minded Bostonians could be said to be familiar with it. There was a performance at Trinity Church a year ago, and in one of his earlier seasons with the Handel and Haydn Dr. Stone made the experiment of giving some of it and a portion of "Messiah," a compromise that was not wholly satisfactory. Many years before that the Choral Art Society, under Wallace Goodrich, performed here parts one and two.

Far be it from me to suggest that the Handel and Haydn abandon "Messiah" for even a single season; but the Symphony performance, the first in its history, should be repeated. It might even be made an annual event. There is no need of going into the relative merits of the two works, though if they were permitted to have only one of them most musicians would choose "Messiah." And as far as the general public is concerned, Bach wouldn't have a chance. In the matter of birth, Handel was as German as he, but thanks to his early years in Italy, he wrote more in the Italian manner; in other words, more freely, frankly and melodiously. Handel's airs would make sense without their supporting harmony and are easily remembered. Those of Bach come closer to being but one strand in a complicated polyphonic web.

* * *

Handel, especially the uniquely-inspired Handel of "Messiah," can be appreciated by anyone with half a musical ear. Bach requires a more cultivated approach. Handel was a man of his own time, yet little in his music strikes us as quaint or old-fashioned, while much of Bach's choral music is outmoded in manner if not in matter. Still of the two, it is Bach who looks the furthest ahead, and who is exerting a vital influence on the music of our own day.

Mr. Munch gave us the Christmas Oratorio in the original German, as he did the "St. John" Passion last spring, and purposes to do this year in the Holy Week performance of the "St. Matthew." And here I am going to register a protest in advance. Much of the text of the "St. Matthew" comes direct from the Scriptures. The congregation of Bach's day would have rebelled at hearing the familiar and beloved passages sung in an alien tongue. Why, then, should we have to submit to it?

* * *

At this week's Symphony Concerts Mr. Munch will offer Saint-Saens' Overture to "The Yellow Princes," the Cello Concerto of Lalo (Pierre Fournier), the Fifth Symphony of Peter Mennin and Strauss' "Don Juan."

* * *

Myra Hess, pianist, will be heard in a recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday, on which afternoon the New England Opera Theatre will present at the Opera House Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

This Clipping F
BOSTON, MA
POST
DEC 31 19

1950 WAS BACH YEAR FOR MUSIC

Sees Munch Success as Conductor of Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musically, 1950 was chiefly significant as the bicentennial of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach. This resulted in Bach festivals, in Bach programs and in a little more Bach than usual in programs generally. The most significant of the festivals was that organized in Prades, France, in the spring by the master cellist, Pablo Casals, who emerged from retirement to officiate as performer and conductor. The entire proceedings have been preserved for posterity on records.

BACH FESTIVAL

Boston had a Bach festival under the sponsorship of Brandeis University, but it chiefly benefitted from these commemorations through the revival at the Symphony concerts in Holy Week of the "St. John Passion" and the performance at those immediately preceding Christmas of the Christmas Oratorio, hitherto absent from the Boston Symphony's repertory. At Tanglewood Dr. Koussevitzky increased the number of Bach-Mozart concerts from six to eight, and the performance of Bach's B Minor Mass, which climaxed the Berkshire Festival, was called by one New York commentator the most impressive memorial of them all.

The opening of 1950 saw Charles Munch in the middle of his first term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he made good in that capacity was amply proven by the fact that by midsummer all subscription concerts for the 1950-51 season, at home and abroad, were sold out. With the assistance of Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Victor de Sabata, making his first appearance in this vicinity, Dr. Koussevitzky held sway in the Berkshires. He did not return to Symphony Hall as guest in the 1949-50 season, though it had been announced that he would do so, but he did show up for a fortnight in the autumn of the present year, and his reappearance on the platform he had graced for a quarter-century was a personal triumph.

Proves Merit

As had been the case at Tanglewood, he showed that the Boston Symphony could be made to sound under him as it had in the past, but for the most part he chose to be heard in familiar music—Brahms and Sibelius. Since the last-named composer's 85th birthday fell upon Dec. 8, the Sibelius performances had a special significance. A year of Mr. Munch's conductorship, or two halves of as many seasons, has proved that his selection as Koussevitzky's successor was a wise one. If everything has not been to everyone's liking, the concerts have benefitted enormously by a fresh approach in the matter of programs and performances.

The current year has brought to Boston two orchestras previously unheard here, though their respective conductors had appeared as leaders of our own. They were the St. Louis Symphony under Vladimir Golschmann and the Royal Philharmonic of London under Sir Thomas Beecham, the latter in a concert long to be remembered.

Opera Season

The spring visit of the Metropolitan Opera Co. had a special importance, in that it marked the last appearance of this organization under its retiring general manager, the beloved Edward Johnson. His successor, Rudolf Bing, is making a big noise in New York, and before many weeks we should have a chance to pass judgment on these activities. The most important event of the Metropolitan season was the Boston premiere of Verdi's "Simon Baccanegra." Under other auspices we made our first acquaintance with other operas. Monteverdi's 300-year-old "Coronation of Poppaea" was given at the New England Conservatory in the spring. Mozart's "La Finta Giardiniera" was produced by the New England Opera Theatre in the autumn, while in mid-January it gave us Britten's "Albert Herring." His lesser "Let's Make an Opera" found its way to the Wilbur Theatre in the fall, but a more significant visitor was Menotti's "The Consul" at the Shubert. Recitals and choral concerts cannot be included in so brief a summary, but in both departments 1950 kept its end up.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 31 1950

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That best-loved of oratorios, Handel's "Messiah," enjoys a monopoly that has no parallel in the musical world. To make a local matter of it, besides the two performances by the Handel and Haydn Society, there are, during the Christmas season, performances in the larger churches and by choral societies in neighboring cities and towns. As the Christmas carol piece, "Messiah" has the call. Yet it is not primarily a Christmas work, nor was it so intended, and Handel himself would probably have been surprised that it came to be accepted as such. The bulk of the text comes from the Old Testament and only a small fraction of it from the Gospels. The Dublin world premiere of 1742 took place in April and intrinsically there are good reasons for performing it on Easter Sunday, or for that matter, on Good Friday. It is, of course, an over-all musical presentation of its central figure, so its present widespread association with His birthday is logical enough.

* * *

The purpose of this preamble was not to question the suitability and appropriateness of these "Messiah" performances, without which many people would be unhappy indeed, but to call attention to a great choral work composed for and inspired by the Christmas season, the so-called Christmas Oratorio of Bach. I say so-called for, though the title is Bach's own, the Weinachts-Oratorium is in reality a set of six cantatas (or services) each designed for performance on one day of the 12-day period between Christmas and Epiphany. Collectively, the six parts, dealing with the birth and infancy of Christ, as narrated by Luke and Matthew, have a common theme and purpose. And a complete presentation, as we recently discovered, can be very impressive.

* * *

Yes, the Christmas Oratorio, not "Messiah," is the Christmas choral piece par excellence. If Schweitzer and others have been distressed by the fact that some of the music had originally served a secular purpose, the same is true of "Messiah," parts of which were first set down as Italian love songs. (Dr. Thompson Stone, in a moment of piety once omitted these portions from a Handel and Haydn performance.) Such, however, is the prestige of "Messiah" that in this part of the world, at least, it has almost completely eclipsed its companion work. Until Charles Munch made the laudable [redacted] performing as much of the latter as time permitted at the Symphony concerts preceding Christmas, few musically-minded Bostonians could be said to be familiar with it. There was a performance at Trinity Church a year ago, and in one of his earlier seasons with the Handel and Haydn Dr. Stone made the experiment of giving some of it and a portion of "Messiah," a compromise that was not wholly satisfactory. Many years before that the Choral Art Society, under Wallace Goodrich, performed here parts one and two.

Far be it from me to suggest that the Handel and Haydn abandon "Messiah" for even a single season; but the Symphony performance, the first in its history, should be repeated. It might even be made an annual event. There is no need of going into the relative merits of the two works, though if they were permitted to have only one of them most musicians would choose "Messiah." And as far as the general public is concerned, Bach wouldn't have a chance. In the matter of birth, Handel was as German as he, but thanks to his early years in Italy, he wrote more in the Italian manner; in other words, more freely, frankly and melodiously. Handel's airs would make sense without their supporting harmony and are easily remembered. Those of Bach come closer to being but one strand in a complicated polyphonic web.

* * *

Handel, especially the uniquely-inspired Handel of "Messiah," can be appreciated by anyone with half a musical ear. Bach requires a more cultivated approach. Handel was a man of his own time, yet little in his music strikes us as quaint or old-fashioned, while much of Bach's choral music is outmoded in manner if not in matter. Still of the two, it is Bach who looks the furthest ahead, and who is exerting a vital influence on the music of our own day.

Mr. Munch gave us the Christmas Oratorio in the original German, as he did the "St. John" Passion last spring, and purposes to do this year in the Holy Week performance of the "St. Matthew." And here I am going to register a protest in advance. Much of the text of the "St. Matthew" comes direct from the Scriptures. The congregation of Bach's day would have rebelled at hearing the familiar and beloved passages sung in an alien tongue. Why, then, should we have to submit to it?

* * *

At this week's Symphony Concerts Mr. Munch will offer Saint-Saens' Overture to "The Yellow Princes," the Cello Concerto of Lalo (Pierre Fournier), the Fifth Symphony of Peter Mennin and Strauss' "Don Juan."

* * *

Myra Hess, pianist, will be heard in a recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday, on which afternoon the New England Opera Theatre will present at the Opera House Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 31 1950

WAS [redacted] YEAR FOR MUSIC

Sees Munch Success as Conductor of Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Musically, 1950 was chiefly significant as the bicentennial of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach. This resulted in Bach festivals, in Bach programs and in a little more Bach than usual in programs generally. The most significant of the festivals was that organized in Prades, France, in the spring by the master cellist, Pablo Casals, who emerged from retirement to officiate as performer and conductor. The entire proceedings have been preserved for posterity on records.

BACH FESTIVAL

Boston had a Bach festival under the sponsorship of Brandeis University, but it chiefly benefitted from these commemorations through the revival at the Symphony concerts in Holy Week of the "St. John Passion" and the performance at those immediately preceding Christmas of the Christmas Oratorio, hitherto absent from the Boston Symphony's repertory. At Tanglewood Dr. Koussevitzky increased the number of Bach-Mozart concerts from six to eight, and the performance of Bach's B Minor Mass, which climaxed the Berkshire Festival, was called by one New York commentator the most impressive memorial of them all.

The opening of 1950 saw Charles Munch in the middle of his first term as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That he made good in that capacity was amply proven by the fact that by midsummer all subscription concerts for the 1950-51 season, at home and abroad, were sold out. With the assistance of Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Victor de Sabata, making his first appearance in this vicinity, Dr. Koussevitzky held sway in the Berkshires. He did not return to Symphony Hall as guest in the 1949-50 season, though it had been announced that he would do so, but he did show up for a fortnight in the autumn of the present year, and his reappearance on the platform he had graced for a quarter-century was a personal triumph.

Proves Merit

As had been the case at Tanglewood, he showed that the Boston Symphony could be made to sound under him as it had in the past, but for the most part he chose to be heard in familiar music—Brahms and Sibelius. Since the last-named composer's 85th birthday fell upon Dec. 8, the Sibelius performances had a special significance. A year of Mr. Munch's conductorship, or two halves of as many seasons, has proved that his selection as Koussevitzky's successor was a wise one. If everything has not been to everyone's liking, the concerts have benefitted enormously by a fresh approach in the matter of programs and performances.

The current year has brought to Boston two orchestras previously unheard here, though their respective conductors had appeared as leaders of our own. They were the St. Louis Symphony under Vladimir Golschmann and the Royal Philharmonic of London under Sir Thomas Beecham, the latter in a concert long to be remembered.

Opera Season

The spring visit of the Metropolitan Opera Co. had a special importance, in that it marked the last appearance of this organization under its retiring general manager, the beloved Edward Johnson. His successor, Rudolf Bing, is making a big noise in New York, and before many weeks we should have a chance to pass judgment on these activities. The most important event of the Metropolitan season was the Boston premiere of Verdi's "Simon Baccanegra." Under other auspices we made our first acquaintance with other operas. Monteverdi's 300-year-old "Coronation of Poppaea" was given at the New England Conservatory in the spring. Mozart's "La Finta Giardiniera" was produced by the New England Opera Theatre in the autumn, while in mid-January it gave us Britten's "Albert Herring." His lesser "Let's Make an Opera" found its way to the Wilbur Theatre in the fall, but a more significant visitor was Menotti's "The Consul" at the Shubert. Recitals and choral concerts cannot be included in so brief a summary, but in both departments 1950 kept its end up.

This Clipping From
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JAN 3 - 1951

Musical Year Marks Up A Proud Record

CREST OF THE YEAR'S musical achievement in Battle Creek was reached in the presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Charles Munch directing, the night of October 23. It marked the culmination of a long-nourished ambition on the part of the Battle Creek Concert Association to present this famous orchestra to this city, an ambition that had been cherished for many years, through the years, difficulties of routing and other reasons.

The concert was a notable success. The orchestra played superbly before an audience that completely filled the W. K. Kellogg auditorium despite the fact that it was the 20th anniversary of the beginning of Community Concerts in Battle Creek and present in various notables, including Ward French, president of the national body, New York City, and Lester Wisner, vice president, Chicago. Both of these men spoke briefly at intermission.

Dr. Munch gave Battle Creek the orchestra's finest program of the year and he and his musicians, in turn, were thrilled by the intelligent understanding of the audience and the warmth of appreciative applause. Both, his manager, George Judd of New York, and various first-chair musicians, Dr. Munch attended a dinner party at the Hart hotel, arranged for by directors of the association and the directors of both local symphony orchestra were invited as special guests.

This Clipping From AMERICAN BANKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Judge Kaplan Director

National Shawmut Bank of Boston, Mass.: Judge Jacob J. Kaplan, member of the law firm of Nutter, McClennen & Fish and former Chief Justice of the Boston Municipal Court, has been elected a director of the National Shawmut Bank. He is a graduate of Harvard, class of 1910, Harvard Law School, 1910, and secretary and a director of the Federated Department Stores, Inc.; director, William Filene's Sons Co., Inc.; trustee of the Waltham Watch Co., Provident Institution for Savings, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce Realty Trust. Also, vice-president and a director of the Boston Society of Natural History, vice-president and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., trustee and former president of Associated Jewish Philanthropies, and a trustee of Beth Israel Hospital and of Temple Israel.

JACOB J. KAPLAN
Director, National Shawmut Bank of Boston.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 3 - 1951

PIERRE FOURNIER will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony at this week's Friday and Saturday concerts in Lalo's Cello Concerto.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
JAN 1 - 1951

And Helen Traubel leaves operatic fields for a recording of "Beloved Religious Songs," which she presents with splendid conviction. They are Schubert's "Ave Maria," "The Palms," "Lead, Kindly Light," "Silent Night," "The Lost Chord" and The Lord's Prayer.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY'S recent recordings, with the Boston Symphony, are the additions to his long list of masterful readings. Mozart's delightful little serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik" and Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony are examples of his tasteful way with music of that period.

Other Koussevitzky offerings are the Haydn "Toy Symphony;" the Prelude to Act 1 of "Lohengrin" and the now famous performance of "Peter and the Wolf," with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator. A wide variety with something for all.

For a performance of Schubert's youthful Second Symphony, the Boston baton is assumed by Charles Munch, and to good effect.

To return to religious music for the moment, Victor offers Rise Stevens with the RCA Victor Orchestra, singing Bizet's "Agnus Dei," "Nearer My God to Thee," "Panis Angelicus" and others as well known.

J. D. C.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1951

N. B. C. WILL OFFER THE BOSTON 'POPS'

Radio Broadcasts 'Live' From Symphony Hall on Monday Nights Begin Jan. 29

A series of weekly radio concerts by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra will be presented by the National Broadcasting Company, beginning Monday, Jan. 29, from 10 to 11 P. M. The move is in contrast with a general decline of serious music carried by the major radio networks.

With Arthur Fiedler conducting, the concerts will be broadcast "live" from Symphony Hall in Boston. The new series will occupy the time period now filled by the N. B. C. Symphony, which moves to Saturday evenings on Jan. 27.

In addition to carrying the Boston "Pops" Concerts, N. B. C. will continue to offer recorded broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, which are presented here on Saturday mornings.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1951

Fournier Soloist at Symphony This Week

The eleventh pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Pierre Fournier, the famous French cellist who will appear for the first time at these concerts. He will be heard in the Cello Concerto by Lalo. Charles Munch will perform for the first time in the Eastern states the Fifth Symphony by Peter Mennin. Mennin's Fifth Symphony was composed for the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and introduced there last season. The program will open with Saint-Saens Overture to his opera comique, "La Princess Jaune," and close with Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 3 - 1951

Music

Boston Symphony's Third Program Here Shows Great Variety

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, presented the third concert of its series at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. A capacity audience heard a concert which was unique for the variety and delicacy of tone color and one which highlighted the virtuosity of the orchestra and the imaginative artistry of the conductor. Charles Munch was in fine form and his musicians responded to his direction implicitly.

The program:

Haydn ... Symphony No. 103, in E-flat major, ("The Drum Roll")
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Minuet
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
Schumann ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio Molto piu vivace; Trio II
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso
Intermission
Ravel ..... "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon
Ravel ..... Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prelude a la Nuit
II. Malaguena
III. Habanera
IV. Feria

The program was nicely balanced. The first half was German music which has not been played here too recently and the second half, modern French.

The Haydn "Drum Roll" Symphony seemed unusually fresh and interesting. The somber opening with the distant drum roll was only momentary. The mood soon changed to a happy one and the melodious Allegro was very gay indeed. The typical Haydn Adagio was nicely contrasted in the variations. The Minuet was hearty and the Finale, spirited.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1 is pure melody in spots and fascinating rhythmic material in others. The fantasy of the writing, the descriptive passages and above all, the humor of the Scherzo made this work completely enjoyable. There were a thousand little elves scampering about at times and only in the Larghetto was there a wistful note. The orchestra gave a splendid interpretation of this music and always within the color scale which seemed to suit the score.

It was in the Ravel Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin" that the most magnificent display of the evening occurred. The work itself is retrospective. Ravel's original piano pieces in their varied dance forms are, with keyboard tone, like fragile figurines from a museum. As he orchestrated them, they become tapestries woven of cobweb, in pastel shades. Dr. Munch controlled the instrumental tone quality of the orchestra last evening in such a way that we seemed to be looking through the haze of centuries at the picturesque era of Couperin. Only in the rowdy rhythm of the Rigaudon did Ravel seem to assert himself to recall us to the present. Dr. Munch made these charming little pieces an exquisite experience in listening.

Somehow, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" suffered in contrast. It is only fragmentary writing and one mood is hardly established before we are rushed away to another. Perhaps we had enjoyed our excursion to the days of Couperin too thoroughly to wish to be disturbed. This is not to say that the orchestra did not play the last number with all that it required, but rather, that we did not find it exciting.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Third Boston Symphony Concert Is Presented at Memorial Auditorium

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, presented the third concert of its series at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. A capacity audience heard a concert which was unique for the variety and delicacy of tone color and one which highlighted the virtuosity of the orchestra and the imaginative artistry of the conductor. Charles Munch was in fine form and his musicians responded to his direction implicitly.

The program:

Haydn ... Symphony No. 103, in E-flat major, ("The Drum Roll")
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Minuet
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
Schumann ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio Molto piu vivace; Trio II
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso
Intermission
Ravel ..... "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon
Ravel ..... Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prelude a la Nuit
II. Malaguena
III. Habanera
IV. Feria

The program was nicely balanced. The first half was German music which has not been played here too recently and the second half, modern French.

The Haydn "Drum Roll" Symphony seemed unusually fresh and interesting. The somber opening with the distant drum roll was only momentary. The mood soon changed to a happy one and the melodious Allegro was very gay indeed. The typical Haydn Adagio was nicely contrasted in the variations. The Minuet was hearty and the Finale, spirited.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1 is pure melody in spots and fascinating rhythmic material in others. The fantasy of the writing, the descriptive passages and above all, the humor of the Scherzo made this work completely enjoyable. There were a thousand little elves scampering about at times and only in the Larghetto was there a wistful note. The orchestra gave a splendid interpretation of this music and always within the color scale which seemed to suit the score.

It was in the Ravel Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin" that the most magnificent display of the evening occurred. The work itself is retrospective. Ravel's original piano pieces in their varied dance forms are, with keyboard tone, like fragile figurines from a museum. As he orchestrated them, they become tapestries woven of cobweb, in pastel shades. Dr. Munch controlled the instrumental tone quality of the orchestra last evening in such a way that we seemed to be looking through the haze of centuries at the picturesque era of Couperin. Only in the rowdy rhythm of the Rigaudon did Ravel seem to assert himself to recall us to the present. Dr. Munch made these charming little pieces an exquisite experience in listening.

Somehow, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" suffered in contrast. It is only fragmentary writing and one mood is hardly established before we are rushed away to another. Perhaps we had enjoyed our excursion to the days of Couperin too thoroughly to wish to be disturbed. This is not to say that the orchestra did not play the last number with all that it required, but rather, that we did not find it exciting.

[212]

This Clipping From
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
JAN 1 - 1951

Musical Year Marks Up A Proud Record

CREST OF THE YEAR'S musical achievement in Battle Creek was reached in the presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Charles Munch directing, on the night of October 23. It marked the culmination of a long-nourished ambition on the part of the Community Concert Association to bring this famous orchestra to this city—an ambition that had been thwarted for many years, through prohibitive costs, difficulties of routing, and other reasons.

The concert was a notable success. The orchestra played superbly for an audience that completely filled the W. K. Kellogg auditorium and the fact that it was the 20th anniversary of the beginning of Community Concerts in Battle Creek brought in various notables, including Ward French, president of the national body, New York City, and Arthur Wisner, vice president, Chicago. Both of these men spoke briefly at intermission.

Dr. Munch gave Battle Creek the orchestra's finest program of the year and he and his musicians, in turn, were thrilled by the intelligent understanding of the audience and its warmth of appreciative applause. With his manager, George Judd of New York, and various first-chair musicians, Dr. Munch attended a supper party at the Hart hotel, arranged for by directors of the association and the directors of both local symphony orchestra were invited as special guests.

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
JAN 1 - 1951

And Helen Traubel leaves operatic fields for a recording of "Beloved Religious Songs," which she presents with splendid conviction. They are Schubert's "Ave Maria," "The Palms," "Lead, Kindly Light," "Silent Night," "The Lost Chord" and The Lord's Prayer.

* * *

KOUSSEVITZKY'S recent recordings with the Boston Symphony add distinctions to his long list of masterful readings. Mozart's delightful little serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik" and Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony are examples of his tasteful way with music of that period.

Other Koussevitzky offerings are the Haydn "Toy Symphony;" the Prelude to Act 1 of "Lohengrin" and the now famous performance of "Peter and the Wolf," with Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt as narrator. A wide variety with something for all.

For a performance of Schubert's youthful Second Symphony, the Boston baton is assumed by Charles Munch, and to good effect.

To return to religious music for the moment, Victor offers Rise Stevens with the RCA Victor Orchestra, singing Bizet's "Agnus Dei," "Nearer My God to Thee," "Panis Angelicus" and others as well known.

J. D. C.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1951

Fournier Soloist at Symphony This Week

The eleventh pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist will be Pierre Fournier, the famous French cellist who will appear for the first time at these concerts. He will be heard in the Cello Concerto by Lalo. Charles Munch will perform for the first time in the Eastern states the Fifth Symphony by Peter Mennin. Mennin's Fifth Symphony was composed for the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and introduced there last season. The program will open with Saint-Saens Overture to his opera comique, "La Princess Jaune," and close with Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 3 - 1951

Music

Boston Symphony's Third Program Here Shows Great Variety

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, presented the third concert of its series at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. A capacity audience heard a concert which was unique for the variety and delicacy of tone color and one which highlighted the virtuosity of the orchestra and the imaginative artistry of the conductor. Charles Munch was in fine form and his musicians responded to his direction implicitly.

The program:

Haydn ...Symphony No. 103, in E-flat major, ("The Drum Roll")
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Minuet
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
Schumann ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio Molto piu vivace; Trio II
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso
Intermission
Ravel ..... "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon
Ravel ..... Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prelude a la Nuit
II. Malaguena
III. Habanera
IV. Feria

The program was nicely balanced. The first half was German music which has not been played here too recently and the second half, modern French.

The Haydn "Drum Roll" Symphony seemed unusually fresh and interesting. The somber opening with the distant drum roll was only momentary. The mood soon changed to a happy one and the melodious Allegro was very gay indeed. The typical Haydn Adagio was nicely contrasted in the variations. The Minuet was hearty and the Finale, spirited.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1 is pure melody in spots and fascinating rhythmic material in others. The fantasy of the writing, the descriptive passages and above all, the humor of the Scherzo made this work completely enjoyable. There were a thousand little elves scampering about at times and only in the Larghetto was there a wistful note. The orchestra gave a splendid interpretation of this music and always within the color scale which seemed to suit the score.

It was in the Ravel Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin" that the most magnificent display of the evening occurred. The work itself is retrospective. Ravel's original piano pieces in their varied dance forms are, with keyboard tone, like fragile figurines from a museum. As he orchestrated them, they become tapestries woven of cobweb, in pastel shades. Dr. Munch controlled the instrumental tone quality of the orchestra last evening in such a way that we seemed to be looking through the haze of centuries at the picturesque era of Couperin. Only in the rowdy rhythm of the Rigaudon did Ravel seem to assert himself to recall us to the present. Dr. Munch made these charming little pieces an exquisite experience in listening.

Somehow, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" suffered in contrast. It is only fragmentary writing and one mood is hardly established before we are rushed away to another. Perhaps we had enjoyed our excursion to the days of Couperin too thoroughly to wish to be disturbed. This is not to say that the orchestra did not play the last number with all that it required, but rather, that we did not find it exciting.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Third Boston Symphony Concert Is Presented at Memorial Auditorium

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, presented the third concert of its series at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. A capacity audience heard a concert which was unique for the variety and delicacy of tone color and one which highlighted the virtuosity of the orchestra and the imaginative artistry of the conductor. Charles Munch was in fine form and his musicians responded to his direction implicitly.

The program:

Haydn ...Symphony No. 103, in E-flat major, ("The Drum Roll")
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Minuet
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito
Schumann ... Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace; Trio Molto piu vivace; Trio II
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso
Intermission
Ravel ..... "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon
Ravel ..... Rapsodie Espagnole
I. Prelude a la Nuit
II. Malaguena
III. Habanera
IV. Feria

The program was nicely balanced. The first half was German music which has not been played here too recently and the second half, modern French.

The Haydn "Drum Roll" Symphony seemed unusually fresh and interesting. The somber opening with the distant drum roll was only momentary. The mood soon changed to a happy one and the melodious Allegro was very gay indeed. The typical Haydn Adagio was nicely contrasted in the variations. The Minuet was hearty and the Finale, spirited.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1 is pure melody in spots and fascinating rhythmic material in others. The fantasy of the writing, the descriptive passages and above all, the humor of the Scherzo made this work completely enjoyable. There were a thousand little elves scampering about at times and only in the Larghetto was there a wistful note. The orchestra gave a splendid interpretation of this music and always within the color scale which seemed to suit the score.

It was in the Ravel Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin" that the most magnificent display of the evening occurred. The work itself is retrospective. Ravel's original piano pieces in their varied dance forms are, with keyboard tone, like fragile figurines from a museum. As he orchestrated them, they become tapestries woven of cobweb, in pastel shades. Dr. Munch controlled the instrumental tone quality of the orchestra last evening in such a way that we seemed to be looking through the haze of centuries at the picturesque era of Couperin. Only in the rowdy rhythm of the Rigaudon did Ravel seem to assert himself to recall us to the present. Dr. Munch made these charming little pieces an exquisite experience in listening.

Somehow, the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" suffered in contrast. It is only fragmentary writing and one mood is hardly established before we are rushed away to another. Perhaps we had enjoyed our excursion to the days of Couperin too thoroughly to wish to be disturbed. This is not to say that the orchestra did not play the last number with all that it required, but rather, that we did not find it exciting.

This Clipping From AMERICAN BANKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Judge Kaplan Director

National Shawmut Bank of Boston, Mass.: Judge Jacob J. Kaplan, member of the law firm of Nutter, McClennen & Fish, and former president of the Boston Bar Association, has been elected a director of the National Shawmut Bank. Judge Kaplan is a graduate of Harvard, 1907, and the Harvard Law School, 1910. He is secretary and a director of the Federated Department Stores, Inc.; director, William Filene's Sons Co., Inc.; trustee of the Waltham Watch Co., Provident Institution for Savings, and the Boston Chamber of Commerce Realty Trust. Also, vice-president and a director of the Boston Society of Natural History, vice-president and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., trustee and former president of Associated Jewish Philanthropies, and a trustee of Beth Israel Hospital and of Temple Israel.

JACOB J. KAPLAN
Director, National Shawmut Bank of Boston.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 3 - 1951

PIERRE FOURNIER will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony at this week's Friday and Saturday concerts in Lalo's Cello Concerto.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1951

N. B. C. WILL OFFER THE BOSTON 'POPS'

Radio Broadcasts 'Live' From Symphony Hall on Monday Nights Begin Jan. 29

A series of weekly radio concerts by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra will be presented by the National Broadcasting Company, beginning Monday, Jan. 29, from 10 to 11 P. M. The move is in contrast with a general decline of serious music carried by the major radio networks.

With Arthur Fiedler conducting, the concerts will be broadcast "live" from Symphony Hall in Boston. The new series will occupy the time period now filled by the N. B. C. Symphony, which moves to Saturday evenings on Jan. 27.

In addition to carrying the Boston "Pops" Concerts, N. B. C. will continue to offer recorded broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, which are presented here on Saturday mornings.

[212]

Mennin's Fifth Symphony in Previe

Charles Munch to Introduce Composer's Music to Boston

By Klaus G. Roy

At the symphony concerts this week end Boston will be making the acquaintance of Peter Mennin, one of the most productive among the younger American composers of today. To have written five symphonies before one's twenty-seventh birthday is no mean achievement.

This shy, modest, and tall young man is a native of Erie, Pa., a graduate of the Eastman School of Music, an instructor of composition at the Juilliard School in New York, and the winner of the first Gershwin Memorial Award, a grant by the American Academy of Arts and Letters, a Guggenheim fellowship, and numerous other prizes and stipends.

To introduce this composer to Boston audiences, Charles Munch has chosen Mr. Mennin's latest symphonic work, the Fifth, which had its première by the Dallas Symphony Orchestra last spring. It had been composed from September, 1949, to March, 1950, interrupted only by a commission from the United Council of Churches for a Christmas cantata.

* * *

The symphony is not a long work, but what it has to say in its 21 minutes it says with conciseness, clarity, and concentration, to judge from the score.

"It's a very polyphonic piece," Mr. Mennin said, "both lean and heavy in texture, if that makes sense to you. The colors are primary ones—black, white, and red; no pastel shades! But I am really not interested in colors for their own sake—the thing that matters is the line itself."

This easily accounted for the composer's eschewing of the more "coloristic" instruments—such as English horn, bass clarinet, and double bassoon—with stronger emphasis placed on the brass instruments.

What percussion was he using?

"Enough," was his expressive answer. "No wood blocks, no ratchets, no gongs—just timpani, bass and snare drums, and cymbals."

But like the Third Symphony of 1946, the Fifth is purely instrumentally conceived.

"I'm not painting any pictures, not imagining any program," the composer explained. It is remarkable how Mr. Mennin's basic principles of musical form and purpose have remained the same through the years; his concern is still with the legacy of the Renaissance and Baroque eras, for their integrity of line and melodic substance, with the harmonic element as a result rather than as a framework.

As in the Third, he still "wisely avoids trying to force his musical ideas into a semblance of sonata form," as one critic has put it. He rather uses "a technique of variation or transformation, of melodic unity."

Thus the opening movement of the Fifth is based on the expansion and contraction of melodic lines, long ones and shorter ones, with what seems to be the composer's favorite phrase—an "autogeneric" motion. He builds lines which are self-propelling, which grow naturally, and which are carried by a forceful rhythmic energy. This kind of form forbids or at least makes unnecessary the method of first and second themes with their transitional passages.

"I've tried to avoid all padding," Mr. Mennin said, "I've tried to make it all music!"

The movement is marked "Con Sdegno" which literally means "with disdain," or "with scorn," although the mood the composer apparently wishes to convey comes closer to what he called "austere severity." The tightening of the structure toward the close, the integration and unification of what were originally separate strands, contributes to a feeling of hardness and strength.

* * *

"Canto," or "a growing song," is the designation of the slow movement.

"The feeling is that of a chaconne or passacaglia," Mr. Mennin pointed out, "but it is not strict—more free and variable. The opening idea with the strings and solo oboe and the subsidiary melodies are later condensed and intensified by the brass before the quietness of the beginning returns. It is like a very great arch!"

Why so scholarly a journal as the English "Music and Letters" could call Mr. Mennin "a master of counterpoint" becomes clear from the third and last movement, an "Allegro Tempestuoso." All his polyphonic skill is brought to bear on what the composer jocularly calls his "three-and-a-half themes." They are combined in close canon, in ostinatos, in augmentations and diminutions, even in double fugues. But, the composer insists, the idea is never a display of theoretical knowledge.

"One does not hear all this complexity, and one need not," he said

By a Staff Photographer

Peter Mennin, whose Fifth Symphony will have its initial Boston hearing this week end in Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

MUSIC

New Mennin Symphony, Pierre Fournier Debut, Features at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

There are two features of novelty at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, the Boston debut of Pierre Fournier in the Lalo Cello Concerto, and the Boston premiere of Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony. Further, if lesser, novelty attaches to Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," practically unknown today, and to Strauss' "Don Juan," which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before.

To tell the story backward, this was a remarkable performance of "Don Juan": super-duper, glittering, spectacular and speedy. It was not the most luscious reading of Strauss' impassioned tone poem, and probably not the best, but it must have come close to the most exciting you can imagine. This is the sort of music which fires Mr. Munch's imagination, and urges both his fine qualities of intensity and drive, clarity and beautiful sound, as well as his less admirable propensity to make things go too fast when he gets excited. No one who hears "Don Juan" this week, however, will ever forget it.

Pierre Fournier, who looks as if he were still under 40, had been known among local record collectors as a fine cellist and musician. His performance of Lalo's Concerto proves him to be one of the prime technicians and singers of his instrument. Perhaps his finger technic is more remarkable than his bowing, but he plays with finesse and an unusual effect of "singing" every phrase, all upon an exactly-pitched and silken tone.

The Lalo Concerto is a sort of 19th century rococo piece, filled with delightful little details of ornamentation, and goes along in a quietly lyrical way. It is a small piece, and Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the accompaniment. But it is the sort of music that demands just the right style and treatment, and that both conductor and soloist gave in full measure. The result was unflawed pleasure. Mr. Fournier deserves to be heard here again, and probably will be. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony is quite a piece, structurally and technically speaking, to have written at the age of 26. It is big and it shows a definte flair for structure and orchestral writing. It also shows that this mustached, spectacled young man from Erie, Penn., is going through a period of attributing more to abstract music than it can express without benefit to your knowing what was in the composer's mind.

Mennin marked his brisk and brusque first movement con sdegno which literally means "with agner" or "with disdain." What the music is supposed to be angry about he did not explain; to me it seemed merely abstract, contrapuntal, dissonant and antiseptic; totally uninfected with any cares of the heart or feeling; cold and competent and aggressive. The canto which is the somewhat slower movement musters a certain warmth, and in its own repressed way it sings. The finale, allegro tempestoso, is the best of all, for it is bold, even wild, and while its austerely contrapuntal course is being run, the movement really becomes dramatic.

This work will take some listening to get on understanding terms with it. But unless I am mistaken, it is a manifestation of a talent which may some day give us a masterpiece. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

As for Saint-Saens' Overture, that is a strange little item from the past which, musically, suggests old ivory or a lace handkerchief put away in patchouli. Also, in the first measures of its synthetic Orientalism it suggests sloe-eyed maidens in languorous, voluptuous dance. Well, anyway, Saint-Saens was young when he wrote it.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 6- 1951

Peter Mennin Work Wins Enthusiastic Reception

Boston—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, performed Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony Friday.

In the natural course of three movements and a scant 25 minutes, Mr. Mennin's introduction to Boston must have been one of some personal satisfaction to him. His music was given a first class performance by the orchestra and his personable work was accorded equally fine reception.

The Fifth Symphony, which was first performed by the Dallas Symphony last spring, is picturesque music. Mr. Mennin has made no effort to build "program" music with anything definite in mind, but he obviously feels a certain "bigness" which he brings into his score with remarkable clarity.

* * *

THE FIRST movement which is marked "Con Sdegno," or "with scorn," is a tempest of virile and energetic rhythms, which seem, more-or-less, to gather rapid momentum through their forceful and individual progression. That Mr. Mennin is a wizard of counterpoint is an everpresent, unrefutable fact. It is seldom that the contrapuntal scheme evolves into such compactness as it does in this symphony of Mennin's.

The "Song" movement, the slow movement, contains much of the "bigness" mentioned above. In this the music seems to "open up" and the line of the music itself is both sweeping and uplifting.

The final movement, the "allegro Tempestuoso," carries in its ebullient folds, all the contrapuntal and harmonic skill of the composer. Double fugues, close canon, and augmentations of everything in the book are added to the stewing broth. At the end of this great display of the composer's virtuosity, you feel quite sure that Peter Mennin should be teaching composition at Julliard, and he does.

* * *

HOWEVER, Mr. Mennin's is not merely a technical skill. He seems to know what he is trying to achieve with his equipment and, given more time, since he is only 27 now, the name of Mennin should indeed be something with which to be reckoned in, say, 10 or 15 years.

Also programmed were the overture to Saint-Saens' opera "Le Princesse Jaune," the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan," and Lalo's Cello Concerto in which the soloist was Pierre Fournier. In the latter, Mr. Fournier displayed the fine tone and technique which makes him a name in today's select group of really talented 'cellists

—FEROL SCHOENROCK

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 6- 1951

DISC DATA

JEAN-PIERRE RAMPAL plays beautifully the difficult Bach Sonata for Flute and Bethoven's Flute Sonata in B-Flat. Never have we heard anything like this new Mercury long-playing disc. On another Mercury long-play the young Swiss vocalist, Collette Lorand, sings four sacred arias by Mozart and the "Queen of the Night" arias most creditably. Ernest White uses the organ of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, New York, to record Bach's Pastorale and the Passacaglia and Fugue in C-Minor. What tone!

Conley Has a Voice

Clarion-clear is Ernest Conley's singing of Italian operatic arias. His gifted tenor voice is especially good in "O te O Cara" and "Vieni, Vieni" from Bellini's "I Puritani." This is a London long-play, as is the fine waxing of Ferde Grofe's "Atlantic Crossing," with the composer conducting the New Symphony. Anton Dolin and Ethel LeVane provide excellent narration. Kathleen Long plays four Faure selections which are dandies on another London. Even though you may not have a high fidelity player, you'll appreciate their excellence.

Those Really Sparkle

You'll find great brilliance in Victor's recording of the "Beatrice and Benedict" overture by the Boston Symphony, Munch conducting. It's a single disc. Another with equal sheen is the waxing of "La Campanella" and "Moto Perpetuo" by 34 violins of the Boston Pops, Fiedler conducting. Victor has a nice album of "Call Me Madam." With the exception of Dinah Shore, it's done with the original cast.

These Will Please, Too

Columbia has made an LP of Allen Funt's "Candid Microphone" radio programs and Vol. 1 has some very funny moments. Nelson Eddy does a nice job on "Songs We Love." Rosemary Clooney has two nice vocals with the Guy Mitchell orchestra—"The House of Singing Bamboo" and "Marrying for Love." The Ravens do well in "Don't Look Now" and "My Baby's Gone." Youngsters will love "Peter Pan" as recorded by the Broadway cast featuring Jean Arthur and Boris Karloff. The album includes pictures and text.

[213]

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
PERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 5 - 1951

NBC Will Offer Boston's 'Pops'

BOSTON—A series of weekly radio concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra will be presented by the National Broadcasting Company, beginning Monday, Jan. 29, from 10 to 11 PM. The move is in contrast with a general decline of serious music carried by the major radio networks.

With Arthur Fiedler conducting, the concerts will be broadcast "live" from Symphony Hall in Boston. The new series will occupy the time period now filled by the NBC Symphony, which moves to Saturday evenings on Jan. 27.

In addition to carrying the Boston Pops Concerts, NBC will continue to offer recorded broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, which are presented here on Saturday mornings.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 11th concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Pierre Fournier, cellist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "La Princesse Jaune"	Saint Saens
Symphony No. 5	Peter Mennin
Concerto for Cello in D minor	Lalo
"Don Juan," Op. 20	Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

PETER MENNIN'S Fifth Symphony, the new work on yesterday's program, is a concise, well-made and rather enjoyable work. It might have been written by practically any of the young contemporaries of the day, so alike is it in character to the current output, but that is neither here nor there; it makes its own way well enough.

The 28-year-old composer, who has been somewhat more prolific than most young composers are these days, gives his melodic ideas a good deal of force through what might be called bustle.

This bustle, or business, or motorical movement, or what, is the key to the two fast movements. While the brass or woodwinds proclaim the musical ideas, the strings keep up a nervously chattering commentary broken, at appropriate intervals, by what the program notes call heavy punctuation. If the strings take over the melodic ideas, something else chatters along to keep things going. Things thus move rapidly and urgently and it is all very skilful.

In the slow movement the motor force is replaced by the tension of several voices weaving in and out arriving, eventually, at the high level necessary to the proclamation of a climax. You cannot say that it isn't melodic, because it is, but as you cannot remember the opening melodic phrase (and so enjoy its development) you get the feeling of watching a child see how far he can stretch a wad of gum. Still, the work is undeniably well-made and well worth a hearing, and it is especially well worth a hearing in Mr. Munch's vigorous and dynamic conception; he tries to convey the impression that the Symphony is as musically significant as it is expert.

ASIDE FROM the charming Saint Saens' overture to the unnecessary "La Princesse Jaune" and the over-affective "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, the high point of the afternoon was the cello playing of Pierre Fournier. He had Lalo's somewhat vapid concerto, a work in which the orchestral role is largely that of accompanist, but he made it a memorable, beautiful thing.

The Lalo is undramatic, which is not to say good, and he achieves a sound of such velvet sheen I cannot think of its equal. His fingering is superb, being absolutely secure in intonation in the most rapid passages and at the highest positions on the finger board. His bowing ranges the possibilities from sustained and expressive eloquence to accents of the lightest and most supple quality. Mr. Fournier was given a very warm reception and so, too, for that matter, was Mr. Mennin, who was present for the local premiere of his symphony.

Next week Solomon, the noted English pianist, will be the soloist in Brahms' D minor concerto. Other works on the program are Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Bartok's Music For Strings, Percussion and Celesta.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 6 - 1951

MUSIC

New Mennin Symphony, Pierre Fournier Debut, Features at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

There are two features of novelty at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week: the Boston debut of Pierre Fournier in the Lalo Cello Concerto, and the Boston premiere of Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony. Further, if lesser, novelty attaches to Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," practically unknown today, and to Strauss' "Don Juan," which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before.

To tell the story backward, this was a remarkable performance of "Don Juan": super-duper, glittering, spectacular and speedy. It was not the most luscious reading of Strauss' impassioned tone poem, and probably not the best, but it must have come close to the most exciting you can imagine. This is the sort of music which fires Mr. Munch's imagination, and urges both his fine qualities of intensity and drive, clarity and beautiful sound, as well as his less admirable propensity to make things go too fast when he gets excited. No one who hears "Don Juan" this week, however, will ever forget it.

Pierre Fournier, who looks as if he were still under 40, had been known among local record collectors as a fine cellist and musician. His performance of Lalo's Concerto proves him to be one of the prime technicians and singers of his instrument. Perhaps his finger technic is more remarkable than his bowing, but he plays with finesse and an unusual effect of "singing" every phrase, all upon an exactly-pitched and silken tone.

The Lalo Concerto is a sort of 19th century rococo piece, filled with delightful little details of ornamentation, and goes along in a quietly lyrical way. It is a small piece, and Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the accompaniment. But it is the sort of music that demands just the right style and treatment, and that both conductor and soloist gave in full measure. The result was unflawed pleasure. Mr. Fournier deserves to be heard here again, and probably will be. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony is quite a piece, structurally and technically speaking, to have written at the age of 26. It is big and it shows a definte flair for structure and orchestral writing. It also shows that this mustached, spectacled young man from Erie, Penn., is going through a period of attributing more to abstract music than it can express without benefit to your knowing what was in the composer's mind.

Mennin marked his brisk and brusque first movement con sdegno, which literally means "with anger" or "with disdain." What the music is supposed to be angry about he did not explain; to me it seemed merely abstract, contrapuntal, dissonant and antiseptic; totally unfected with any cares of the heart or feeling; cold and competent and aggressive. The canto which is the somewhat slower movement musters a certain warmth, and in its own repressed way it sings. The finale, allegro tempestoso, is the best of all, for it is bold, even wild, and while its austerely contrapuntal course is being run, the movement really becomes dramatic.

This work will take some listening to get on understanding terms with it. But unless I am mistaken, it is a manifestation of a talent which may some day give us a masterpiece. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

As for Saint-Saens' Overture, that is a strange little item from the past which, musically, suggests old ivory or a lace handkerchief put away in patchouli. Also, in the first measures of its synthetic Orientalism it suggests sloe-eyed maidens in languorous, voluptuous dance. Well, anyway. Saint-Saens was young when he wrote it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 6 - 1951

Boston Pops Orchestra on Air Starting Jan. 29

A new series of coast-to-coast broadcasts is announced by the National Broadcasting Company to be given by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Arthur Fiedler will conduct. Beginning Jan. 29, the broadcasts will be given each Monday night from 10 to 11 p. m., over WBZ.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Charles Munch, continue with their weekly broadcasts from the stage of Symphony Hall where they are rehearsing.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & The Sun
JAN 6 - 1951

RECORDS

POPULAR RECORDS.

Decca has two new albums of Broadway's brightest, best-selling musicals of the season.

The best is the "original cast" album of Frank Loesser's "Guys and Dolls," based on a story and characters by Damon Runyon. Sixteen tunes from the show are reproduced on the 12-inch long-playing record. And each of the songs seems better than the one before. The principals, all in fine voice, include Robert Alda, Vivian Blaine, Sam Levene, Isabel Bigley, Pat Rooney Sr. and all the others from the stage cast.

"Call Me Madam," another 12-inch long-playing album, contains 12 songs from the Irving Berlin production with Ethel Merman in the title role of the "Hostess With the Mostes' on the Ball." She is assisted by singers Dick Haymes and Eileen Wilson and Gordon Jenkins' orchestra. Miss Merman's showmanship should help the album catch up or surpass the sales of the earlier released RCA Victor "original cast" album of the show in which Dinah Shore substituted as the lady diplomat.

New Singles.

The followers of Lil Abner's antics in the cartoon strips should go for National Records' latest release—one side features songstress Lynne Howard on a dance tune, "Dogpatch Tromp," and the reverse has the National Quartet singing "Evil Eye Fleegle," about that man with the triple whammy. . . .

The irrepressible Danny Kaye has a fine comedy record in "The Little White Duck" backed with "The Thing" (Decca). . . . Singer Jo Stafford does a nice job with the ballad "If" and the religious "It Is No Secret" (Columbia). . . .

Arthur (Guitar Boogie) Smith has a clever side with "Hot Rod Race" (M-G-M). . . . "Who Kicked the Light Plug" is one of Betty Hutton's best efforts in many a moon (RCA Victor). . . .

Other good ones: Janette Davis singing "The Lovin'-You-Continually Blues" (Columbia). . . . "Little Bitty Baby" sung by Kate Smith (National). . . . Paul Seers and Johnny Haymer dueting on "You're Never Dressed Up" (M-G-M). . . . "Castles in the Sand" with Bob Dewey's Orchestra (RCA Victor).

DAVID C. WHITNEY.

CONCERT RECORDS.

In its entirety Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music can't be described as much more than a curiosity, although it has flashes and even sustained illuminations, such as its magnificent overture.

For his devotees, however, a newly recorded complete performance by the Winterthur Symphony under Walter Goehr will give much in pleasure and in understanding, too. "Prometheus" contains pertinent clues to the genesis of latter works, particularly the "Eroica" (Concert Hall; two LPs).

A new recording of Beethoven's C minor piano concerto, the third, has Wilhelm Backhaus as soloist and the resplendent Vienna Philharmonic under Karl Bohm. Very few pianists go as deeply into a Beethoven score as Backhaus, or bring forth as much. Bohm's insight is dependable (London; one LP).

Various persons will have various reactions to Leonard Bernstein's second symphony, titled "The Age of Anxiety" after a poem by W. H. Auden, which has been recorded by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under the composer with Lukas Foss playing the piano part (Columbia; one LP).

Some may feel music has been fitted to narrative to the point of strained silliness. Others will be impressed by the obvious sincerity, the skillful uses of resources of orchestra and piano, the sensitive gropings for both a delineation of—and a remedy for—our age of anxiety.

This reviewer's report on Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt in her fortuitous role of narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, is that for him she is an entirely satisfactory narrator. She is simple and easily understood. She points the narrative always toward the music, never away from it. These are the requirements of the narrator (RCA Victor; one LP).

After years of listening to the swollen and feverish orchestral version of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," its playing by the ensemble it was intended for—a string sextet—causes almost as much surprise as pleasure. Now it has the full sense of a transfigured night rather than of nocturnal calm pierced by nightmare.

The recording is by the Hollywood String Quartet, plus Alvin Denkin, viola, and Kurt Reher, 'cello. It is loaded with stuff, this quartet made up of members of Southern California's impressive colony of top musicians.

DELOS SMITH

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1951

H. Earle Johnson's "Symphony Hall, Boston" (Little, Brown: $6) builds up the already well-bolstered Boston legend, while romanticizing the city's principal concert hall much in the manner of New York's Carnegie Hall. The author writes well and authoritatively and he does not mind having a little sport with certain Bostonian idiosyncrasies. The book is a sound historical narrative of an important chapter in American music, and the complete repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Jan. 1, 1950, as given in the appendix, provides valuable reference data.

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
JAN 7 - 1951

Berlioz: Beatrice and Benedict Overture, played by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. RCA Victor 45 rpm. Munch gives this not particularly inspired overture a theatrical, curtain-raiser reading. Musical dramatics make for pleasant listening. Good recording.

Paganini: La Campanella, Rondo from Second Concerto, played by 34 violins of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Coupled with Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, this technically good recording shows impressive precision string work, but sacrifices the interpretation only a soloist can give to a composition for violin. La Campanella makes better listening; Moto Perpetuo sounds too much like exercises for string ensemble.—Guy Munger.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
JAN 7 - 1951

Concert Series At Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will give the fourth Tuesday evening concert in Symphony Hall next Tuesday and the 12th pair of concerts in the longer series on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts the distinguished soloist will be Solomon, the famous English pianist who has been heard here in recital and who will then make his first appearance with this orchestra. Solomon's concerto will be the First by Brahmns, in D Minor. At the Tuesday concert, a young French violinist, Michele Auclair, who is coming to this country for the first time, will make her American debut.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 7 - 1951

Boston Pops On Network

Th world-renowned Boston Pops Orchestra will be heard on the NBC network on Monday evenings starting Jan. 29 over WBZ at 10 p. m., with Arthur Fiedler directing the concerts.

Negotiations were completed by Barry and George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops orchestras. Barry said the concerts would extend into the regular spring season of the Boston Pops, and the broadcasts would be continued during the regular Symphony Hall public concerts.

Arturo Toscanini's return to the podium and the moving of the NBC Symphony Orchestra to a Saturday broadcast period have made it possible to add the Boston Pops program to NBC's music schedule, Charles C. Barry, vice president in charge of radio programing, pointed out. The Boston Symphony Orchestra also is heard weekly on NBC on Saturday mornings in the unusual "rehearsal" broadcasts directed by Charles Munch.

The Boston Pops Orchestra will replace the NBC Symphony Orchestra in "Operation Tandem," the system under which several sponsors advertise on five programs. The other four programs on "Operation Tandem" are "Duffy's Tavern," a segment of "The Big Show," "The Man Called X" and "Screen Directors' Playhouse."

[214]

MUSIC

New Mennin Symphony, Pierre Fournier Debut, Features at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

There are two features of novelty at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week: the Boston debut of Pierre Fournier in the Lalo Cello Concerto, and the Boston premiere of Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony. Further, if lesser, novelty attaches to Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," practically unknown today, and to Strauss' "Don Juan," which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before.

To tell the story backward, this was a remarkable performance of "Don Juan": super-duper, glittering, spectacular and speedy. It was not the most luscious reading of Strauss' impassioned tone poem, and probably not the best, but it must have come close to the most exciting you can imagine. This is the sort of music which fires Mr. Munch's imagination and urges both his fine qualities of intensity and drive, clarity and beautiful sound, as well as his less admirable propensity to make things go too fast when he gets excited. No one who hears "Don Juan" this week, however, will ever forget it.

Pierre Fournier, who looks as if he were still under 40, had been known among local record collectors as a fine cellist and musician. His performance of Lalo's Concerto proves him to be one of the prime technicians and singers of his instrument. Perhaps his finger technic is more remarkable than his bowing, but he plays with finesse and an unusual effect of "singing" every phrase, all upon an exactly-pitched and silken tone.

The Lalo Concerto is a sort of 19th century rococo piece, filled with delightful little details of ornamentation, and goes along in a quietly lyrical way. It is a small piece, and Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the accompaniment. But it is the sort of music that demands just the right style and treatment, and that both conductor and soloist gave in full measure. The result was unflawed pleasure. Mr. Fournier deserves to be heard here again, and probably will be. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony is quite a piece, structurally and technically speaking, to have written at the age of 26. It is big and it shows a definite flair for structure and orchestral writing. It also shows that this mustached, spectacled young man from Erie, Penn., is going through a period of attributing more to abstract music than it can express without benefit to your knowing what was in the composer's mind.

Mennin marked his brisk and brusque first movement con sdegno, which literally means "with agner" or "with disdain." What the music is supposed to be angry about he did not explain; to me it seemed merely abstract, contrapuntal, dissonant and antiseptic, totally uninfected with any cares of the heart or feeling, cold and competent and aggressive. The canto which is the somewhat slower movement musters a certain warmth, and in its own repressed way it sings. The finale, allegro tempestoso, is the best of all, for it is bold, even wild, and while its austerely contrapuntal course is being run, the movement really becomes dramatic.

This work will take some listening to get an understanding terms with it. But unless I am mistaken, it is a manifestation of a talent which may some day give us a masterpiece. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

As for Saint-Saens' Overture, that is a strange little item from the past which, musically, suggests old ivory or a lace handkerchief put away in patchouli. Also, in the first measures of its synthetic Orientalism, it suggests slow-eyed maidens in languorous, voluptuous dance. Well, anyway, Saint-Saens was young when he wrote it.

Concerto. Yesterday's audience was plainly pleased with the piece, interrupting its progress with applause (after the Intermezzo) and giving Mr. Fournier an ovation at the end. Everything here was ingratiating; the Concerto, Mr. Fournier's performance and the orchestral accompaniment that matched it in sensitivity and brilliance.

Unlike some Americans, Mr. Mennin courts a melodic style, the second movement of his Symphony, marked Canto, is a sustained song and there is plenty of melody in the first movement. The finale is on the rambunctious side. It aroused the audience, and it, in turn, brought the composer to the stage several times. I made my first acquaintance with Mr. Mennin's music when I heard the Second Symphony in Cleveland two years ago and was struck with the freshness and vitality of its ideas. It was high time that Boston caught up with him.

Mr. Munch's interpretation of Strauss' tone poem is one that stresses its excitements rather than its sensuous quality. A little more richness would not be amiss, though word must be said for the extreme clarity of the orchestral playing, even in the most tumultuous passages. This product of Strauss' 25th year wears well, better, indeed, than some of his later, more pretentious works. It would be hard to find a piece, from Strauss or any other composer, that better unites the enthusiasm of youth with ripe technical mastery.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In one sense or another the phrase "first time" applies to every item in the current symphony program. Absolutely new to Boston is the Fifth Symphony of Peter Mennin, a young Pennsylvanian, hitherto unrepresented here (so far as I know) by any music at all. New to the Symphony Concerts, although not to Boston, is the first number, Saint-Saens' Overture to his opera, "La Princesse Jaune." A notable cellist, Pierre Fournier, yesterday faced a Boston audience for the first time, and delighted it with his performance of the Cello Concerto of Lalo, unperformed at the hall for 23 years. Finally, while there is nothing novel about the remaining item, Strauss' "Don Juan," Mr. Munch had not conducted it here before.

Both Saint-Saens' Overture and Lalo's Concerto were products of the 70's, a fruitful decade in French music. Mr. Burk's notes point out that "The Yellow Princess" was a venture into the "quasi-Japanese" that preceded "The Mikado" by 13 years and "Madame Butterfly" by 32. Yes, Saint-Saens uses the pentatonic scale. The whole piece is deft and charming; while the latter adjective certainly applies to Lalo's

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 7- 1951

Excellently Written Job

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON—By H. Earle Johnson; Little, Brown, Boston; $6.

Friends of the Boston Symphony will hardly want to forego the pleasure of H. Earle Johnson's second book on the musical life of the hub-city entitled "Symphony Hall, Boston." Since this acoustically perfect auditorium has housed the orchestra since 1900, any record of the hall is primarily an account of the development of that outstanding musical organization. After an interesting chapter on Boston at the turn of the century and a less absorbing description of the auditorium and its physical properties we are plunged into an account of the varying fortunes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra was only nineteen years old when it moved to its present home. Major Higginson was still the active "father" of the organization. German conductors, German players, and German music were favored until World War I. Even then the performances were first-rate, especially under Karl Muck who achieved European fame as a Wagner conductor.

The end of German ascendency and the internment of Dr. Muck during the first World War are described by the author with frankness and appropriate condemnation of war hysteria.

The French period beginning under Pierre Monteux in 1919 accomplished notable changes. Personnel and repertoire became more international. Modern music, especially modern French, figures prominently in the record of the post-war years.

The remaining account of the great Koussevitzky period is over-laudatory, if anything. Since the book was commissioned to coincide with that conductor's retirement, we can easily understand this. Although we disagree with Mr. Johnson's admiration for the quality of Koussevitzky's performances in certain schools and periods, we can certainly agree that the Russian conductor built the orchestra into a marvelous instrument and that he maintained a remarkable percentage of electrifying concerts, especially when nationalistic works were programmed. Furthermore, as the writer points out, the Boston orchestra has introduced an enviable number of major modern works.

The indexes of works performed by the orchestra since its founding, the conductors and guest conductors, soloists, the new organ, etc. make the book of value as a reference work. Two chapters of anecdotes on visiting musical greats and the clowns, politicians, and others who performed in the hall round out this account by a professor of music who can write more entertainingly than many of his more distinguished colleagues.
—CLARENCE H. BARBER.

This Clipping From
PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
JAN 8- 1951

Despite Boom in Television, Radio Continues to Expand

By C. E. Butterfield

NEW YORK (AP) — Despite last year's big boom in television, network radio was not standing still by any means. It continued to show a steady expansion.

The four networks started the new year with a grand total of 1,195 affiliated stations, representing a gain of 52 in all parts of the country over January 1, 1950.

Largest of the networks in number of stations is MBS with 543. Next in line is ABC with 297, followed by CBS 196 and NBC 181. Of these 23 have dual affiliations, that is they are listed by both MBS or one of the other networks. This gives the net total of 1,195, or slightly more than half of the 2,231 licensed standard broadcast stations.

* * * * *

THE FIGURES represent these gains over a year ago: MBS 13, ABC 14, CBS 16 and NBC 8.

Network television does not cover nearly as much territory as do the coast to coast radio chains, which also extend to Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Philippines. At present the video circuit has 80 stations in 50 cities in the east, midwest and parts of the south.

Of the 107 total [illegible] six are classed as [illegible]. Those not served on the direct are supplies show[illegible] film recordings.

* * * *

THE NBC SYMPHONY [illegible]tra returns to its Saturday evening schedule when Arturo Toscanini comes back on the podium in its vacated Monday night [illegible] will continue in the concert category. Selected to take over is the Boston Pops Orchestra, which has appeared in many a broadcast on one network or the other in the past. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony is continuing its rehearsal broadcasts on Saturday mornings.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of members of the symphony group, opens the new series January 29.

Jon Arthur, whose two-hour Saturday morning children's program, "No School Today", has gained a wide audience of all ages, is augmenting his ABC schedule with a daily series, beginning tomorrow. It will be heard at 5 p.m. local time.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 9- 1951

Violinist in U. S. Debut

Twenty-year-old Michele Auclair, French violinist, highly praised in Europe and South America, will make her American debut tonight at the fourth Tuesday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. She will be heard in Tchaikovsky's Concerto.

The concert will open with Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune." To close it, Charles Munch will present Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 7- 1951

Recorded Music

BY EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

On the Lighter Side

IF YOU missed seeing and hearing Guys and Dolls when its gay tunes were making things hum for theater-going folk in our town some months back, you can catch up on hearing those jolly bits—at least, in a pert little package from RCA Victor suitably styled Selections from Guys and Dolls.

Served richly and with considerable savor on these platters are such choice things as More I Cannot Wish You, Sue Me, Guys and Dolls, My Time of Day, If I Were a Bell, Sit Down You're Rockin' the Boat, I'll Know, I've Never Been in Love Before and Bushel and a Peck.

All quite handily handled by Audrey Marsh, Donald Richards, Ray Charles, Morey Amsterdam, The Guild Choristers and Al Goodman and His Orchestra. (Four 45 r. p. m. disks in album. $3.25.)

Top tunes of the times:

It's A Lovely Day Today, reedy, brassy treatment of a standout song from Call Me Madam, with Francis Irvin and The Satisfiers giving a good account of the lyrics, and I'll Know, with Johnny Amoroso and The Satisfiers on the vocals. Both cleverly syncopated by Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra. (Decca. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

Laura and Dancing in the Dark, wherein Charlie Parker, one of the top sax specialists on the jazz scene today, does some sophisticated horn-blowing against a richly stringed background. Norman Granz, sultan of syncopation, supervised this disking, which partly explains its superlative gloss. (Mercury. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

Donald Richards, who contributes his singing talent to a new recording of "Guys and Dolls" selections.

C'est La Vie means "that's life," and there's plenty of it in this heart-throbber by power-voiced Johnny Desmond. Obverse is You're the Only One for Me, just another blowsy ballad, but well enough done by Mr. D. with the help of the Roy Charels Singers and some fanciful stringing along by an orchestra conducted by Tony Mottola. (M-G-M. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

Liebesfreud, Kreisler's familiar air, and Gounod's beloved Ave Maria, beautifully and expertly whistled by the best pucker-upper of 'em all, Fred Lowery. With rhythm. (Columbia. 33⅓ r. p. m. Seven-inch. 60 cents.)

In Classical Vein

In its current version of Rossini's La Cenerentola, Cetra-Soria has added a sparkling little gem to its attractive list of recorded Italian opera.

This is a deftly abridged edition which includes all of the opera's highspots and introduces two voices new to this country. They are the mezzo soprano, Giulietta Simionato and the young Italian tenor, Cesare Valletti. Both possess fresh young voices, most engagingly employed.

Cenerentola, though rarely heard in this country of late years, is one of Rossini's most delightful works. The Cenerentola of the title is our childhood heroine, Cinderella.

Many critics rank Cenerentola as second only to The Barber among Rossini's masterpieces of comedy opera. It is sung here with the most beguiling elegance and style. Mario Rossi conducts, and the support is by the orchestra and chorus of Radio Italiana. (Two 12-inch LP records, with libretto in English and Italian. $11.90.)

The earlier symphonies of Franz Schubert offer treasures of melodic grace and charm too often overlooked by our orchestral program makers. RCA Victor, then, is especially to be thanked for its new recording of one of Schubert's most beguiling earlier works, his Symphony No. 2 in B Flat.

It's beautifully played by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch's approach is sensitive to the lovely lyricism of the score, and he brings delightful gusto to the more dashing movements. (One ten-inch LP. $3.85.)

MUSIC

New Mennin Symphony, Pierre Fournier Debut, Features at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

There are two features of novelty at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week: the Boston debut of Pierre Fournier in the Lalo Cello Concerto, and the Boston premiere of Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony. Further, if lesser, novelty attaches to Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," practically unknown today, and to Strauss' "Don Juan," which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before.

To tell the story backward, this was a remarkable performance of "Don Juan": super-super, glittering, spectacular and speedy. It was not the most incisive reading of Strauss' impassioned tone poem, and probably not the best, but it must have come close to the most exciting you can imagine. This is the sort of music which fires Mr. Munch's imagination and urges both his fine qualities of intensity and drive, clarity and beautiful sound, as well as his less admirable propensity to make things go too fast when he gets excited. No one who hears "Don Juan" this week, however, will ever forget it.

Pierre Fournier, who looks as if he were still under 40, had been known among local record collectors as a fine cellist and musician. His performance of Lalo's Concerto proves him to be one of the prime technicians and singers of his instrument. Perhaps his finger technic is more remarkable than his bowing, but he plays with finesse and an unusual effect of "singing" every phrase, all upon an exactly-pitched and silken tone.

The Lalo Concerto is a sort of 19th century rococo piece, filled with delightful little details of ornamentation, and goes along in a quietly lyrical way. It is a small piece, and Mr. Munch reduced the orchestra for the accompaniment. But it is the sort of music that demands just the right style and treatment, and that both conductor and soloist gave in full measure. The result was unflawed pleasure. Mr. Fournier deserves to be heard here again, and [illegible] will be. His reception yesterday was most cordial.

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony is quite a piece, structurally and technically speaking, to have written at the age of 26. It is big and it shows a definite flair for structure and orchestral writing. It also shows that this mustached, spectacled young man from Erie, Penn., is going through a period of attributing more to abstract music than it can express without benefit to your knowing what was in the composer's mind.

Mennin marked his brisk and brusque first movement con sdegno, which literally means "with agner" or "with disdain." What the music is supposed to be angry about he did not explain; to me it seemed merely abstract, contrapuntal, dissonant and antiseptic, totally uninfected with any parcel of the heart or feeling, cold and competent and aggressive. The canto which is the somewhat slower movement musters a certain warmth, and in its own repressed way it sings. The finale, allegro tempestoso, is the best of all, for it is bold, even wild, and while its austerely contrapuntal course is being run, the movement really becomes dramatic.

This work will take some listening to get an understanding terms with it. But unless I am mistaken, it is a manifestation of a talent which may some day give us a masterpiece. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

As for Saint-Saens' Overture, that is a strange little item from the past which, musically, suggests old ivory or lace handkerchiefs put away in patchouli. Also in the first measures of its synthetic Orientalism, it suggests slow-eyed maidens in languorous, voluptuous dance. Well, anyway, Saint-Saens was young when he wrote it.

Concerto. Yesterday's audience was plainly pleased with the piece, interrupting its progress with applause (after the Intermezzo) and giving Mr. Fournier an ovation at the end. Everything here was ingratiating; the Concerto, Mr. Fournier's performance and the orchestral accompaniment that matched it in sensitivity and brilliance.

Unlike some Americans, Mr. Mennin courts a melodic style, the second movement of his Symphony, marked Canto, is a sustained song and there is plenty of melody in the first movement. The finale is on the rambunctious side. It aroused the audience, and it, in turn, brought the composer to the stage several times. I made my first acquaintance with Mr. Mennin's music when I heard the Second Symphony in Cleveland two years ago and was struck with the freshness and vitality of its ideas. It was high time that Boston caught up with him.

Mr. Munch's interpretation of Strauss' tone poem is one that stresses its excitements rather than its sensuous quality. A little more richness would not be amiss, though word must be said for the extreme clarity of the orchestral playing, even in the most tumultuous passages. This product of Strauss' 25th year wears well, better, indeed, than some of his later, more pretentious works. It would be hard to find a piece, from Strauss or any other composer, that better unites the enthusiasm of youth with ripe technical mastery.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In one sense or another the phrase "first time" applies to every item in the current symphony program. Absolutely new to Boston is the Fifth Symphony of Peter Mennin, a young Pennsylvanian, hitherto unrepresented here (so far as I know) by any music at all. New to the Symphony Concerts, although not to Boston, is the first number, Saint-Saens' Overture to his opera, "La Princesse Jaune." A notable cellist, Pierre Fournier, yesterday faced a Boston audience for the first time, and delighted it with his performance of the Cello Concerto of Lalo, unperformed at the hall for 23 years. Finally, while there is nothing novel about the remaining item, Strauss' "Don Juan," Mr. Munch had not conducted it here before.

Both Saint-Saens' Overture and Lalo's Concerto were products of the 70's, a fruitful decade in French music. Mr. Burk's notes point out that "The Yellow Princess" was a venture into the "quasi-Japanese" that preceded "The Mikado" by 13 years and "Madame Butterfly" by 32. Yes, Saint-Saens uses the pentatonic scale. The whole piece is deft and charming; while the latter adjective certainly applies to Lalo's

[215]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 7- 1951

Excellently Written Job

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON—By H. Earle Johnson; Little, Brown, Boston; $6.

Friends of the Boston Symphony will hardly want to forego the pleasure of H. Earle Johnson's second book on the musical life of the hub-city entitled "Symphony Hall, Boston." Since this acoustically perfect auditorium has housed the orchestra since 1900, any record of the hall is primarily an account of the development of that outstanding musical organization. After an interesting chapter on Boston at the turn of the century and a less absorbing description of the auditorium and its physical properties we are plunged into an account of the varying fortunes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The orchestra was only nineteen years old when it moved to its present home. Major Higginson was still the active "father" of the organization. German conductors, German players, and German music were favored until World War I. Even then the performances were first-rate, especially under Karl Muck who achieved European fame as a Wagner conductor.

The end of German ascendency and the internment of Dr. Muck during the first World War are described by the author with frankness and appropriate condemnation of war hysteria.

The French period beginning under Pierre Monteux in 1919 accomplished notable changes. Personnel and repertoire became more international. Modern music, especially modern French, figures prominently in the record of the post-war years.

The remaining account of the great Koussevitzky period is over-laudatory, if anything. Since the book was commissioned to coincide with that conductor's retirement, we can easily understand this. Although we disagree with Mr. Johnson's admiration for the quality of Koussevitzky's performances in certain schools and periods, we can certainly agree that the Russian conductor built the orchestra into a marvelous instrument and that he maintained a remarkable percentage of electrifying concerts, especially when nationalistic works were programmed. Furthermore, as the writer points out, the Boston orchestra has introduced an enviable number of major modern works.

The indexes of works performed by the orchestra since its founding, the conductors and guest conductors, soloists, the new organ, etc. make the book of value as a reference work. Two chapters of anecdotes on visiting musical greats and the clowns, politicians and others who performed in the hall round out this account by a professor of music who can write more entertainingly than many of his more distinguished colleagues.

—CLARENCE H. BARBER

This Clipping From
PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
JAN 8- 1951

Despite Boom in Television, Radio Continues to Expand

By C. E. Butterfield

NEW YORK (AP) — Despite last year's big boom in television, network radio was not standing still by any means. It continued to show a steady expansion.

The four networks started the new year with a grand total of 1,195 affiliated stations, representing a gain of 52 in all parts of the country over January 1, 1950.

Largest of the networks in number of stations is MBS with 543. Next in line is ABC with 297, followed by CBS 196 and NBC 181. Of these 23 have dual affiliations, that is they are listed by both MBS or one of the other networks. This gives the net total of 1,195, or slightly more than half of the 2,231 licensed standard broadcast stations.

* * * * *

THE FIGURES represent these gains over a year ago: MBS 13, ABC 14, CBS 16 and NBC 8.

Network television does not cover nearly as much territory as do the coast to coast radio chains, which also extend to Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Philippines. At present the video circuit has 80 stations in 50 cities in the east, midwest and parts of the south.

Of the 107 total stations, only six are classed as non-network. Those not served on the network direct are supplies shows through film recordings.

* * * * *

THE NBC SYMPHONY orchestra returns to its Saturday evening schedule when Arturo Toscanini comes back on the podium but its vacated Monday night hours will continue in the concert category. Selected to take over is the Boston Pops Orchestra, which has appeared in many a broadcast on one network or the other in the past. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony is continuing its rehearsal broadcasts on Saturday mornings.

The Pops Orchestra, composed of members of the symphony group, opens the new series January 29.

Jon Arthur, whose two-hour Saturday morning children's program, "No School Today", has gained a wide audience of all ages, is augmenting his ABC scheduled with a daily series, beginning tomorrow. It will be heard at 5 p.m. local time.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 9- 1951

Violinist in U. S. Debut

Twenty-year-old Michele Auclair, French violinist, highly praised in Europe and South America, will make her American debut tonight at the fourth Tuesday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. She will be heard in Tchaikovsky's Concerto.

The concert will open with Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune." To close it, Charles Munch will present Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 7- 1951

Recorded Music

BY EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

On the Lighter Side

IF YOU missed seeing and hearing Guys and Dolls when its gay tunes were making things hum for theater-going folk in our town some months back, you can catch up on hearing those jolly bits—at least, in a pert little package from RCA Victor suitably styled Selections from Guys and Dolls.

Served richly and with considerable savor on these platters are such choice things as More I Cannot Wish You, Sue Me, Guys and Dolls, My Time of Day, If I Were a Bell, Sit Down You're Rockin' the Boat, I'll Know, I've Never Been in Love Before and Bushel and a Peck.

All quite handily handled by Audrey Marsh, Donald Richards, Ray Charles, Morey Amsterdam, The Guild Choristers and Al Goodman and His Orchestra. (Four 45 r. p. m. disks in album. $3.25.)

Top tunes of the times: It's A Lovely Day Today, reedy, brassy treatment of a standout song from Call Me Madam, with Francis Irvin and The Satisfiers giving a good account of the lyrics, and I'll Know, with Johnny Amoroso and The Satisfiers on the vocals. Both cleverly syncopated by Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra. (Decca. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

Laura and Dancing in the Dark, wherein Charlie Parker, one of the top sax specialists on the jazz scene today, does some sophisticated horn-blowing against a richly stringed background. Norman Granz, sultan of syncopation, supervised this disking, which partly explains its superlative gloss. (Mercury. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

C'est La Vie means "that's life," and there's plenty of it in this heart-throbber by power-voiced Johnny Desmond. Obverse is You're the Only One for Me, just another blowsy ballad, but well enough done by Mr. D. with the help of the Roy Charels Singers and some fanciful stringing along by an orchestra conducted by Tony Mottola. (M-G-M. 78 r. p. m. 75 cents.)

Liebesfreud, Kreisler's familiar air, and Gounod's beloved Ave Maria, beautifully and expertly whistled by the best pucker-upper of 'em all, Fred Lowery. With rhythm. (Columbia. 33⅓ r. p. m. Seven-inch. 60 cents.)

Donald Richards, who contributes his singing talent to a new recording of "Guys and Dolls" selections.

In Classical Vein

In its current version of Rossini's La Cenerentola, Cetra-Soria has added a sparkling little gem to its attractive list of recorded Italian opera.

This is a deftly abridged edition which includes all of the opera's highspots and introduces two voices new to this country. They are the mezzo soprano, Giulietta Simionato and the young Italian tenor, Cesare Valletti. Both possess fresh young voices, most engagingly employed.

Cenerentola, though rarely heard in this country of late years, is one of Rossini's most delightful works. The Cenerentola of the title is our childhood heroine, Cinderella.

Many critics rank Cenerentola as second only to The Barber among Rossini's masterpieces of comedy opera. It is sung here with the most beguiling elegance and style. Mario Rossi conducts, and the support is by the orchestra and chorus of Radio Italiana. (Two 12-inch LP records, with libretto in English and Italian. $11.90.)

The earlier symphonies of Franz Schubert offer treasures of melodic grace and charm too often overlooked by our orchestral program makers. RCA Victor, then, is especially to be thanked for its new recording of one of Schubert's most beguiling earlier works, his Symphony No. 2 in B Flat.

It's beautifully played by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Munch's approach is sensitive to the lovely lyricism of the score, and he brings delightful [illegible] to the more dashing movements. (One ten-inch LP. $3.85.)

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 11th concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Pierre Fournier, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "La Princesse Juane"	Saint Saens
Symphony No. 5	Peter Mennin
Concerto for Cello in D minor	Lalo
"Don Juan," Op. 20	Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

PETER MENNIN'S Fifth Symphony, the new work on yesterday's program, is a concise, well-made and rather enjoyable work. It might have been written by practically any of the young contemporaries of the day, so alike is it in character to the current output, but that is neither here nor there; it makes its own way well enough.

The 28-year-old composer, who has been somewhat more prolific than most young composers are these days, gives his melodic ideas a good deal of force through what might be called bustle.

This bustle, or business, or motorical movement, or what, is the key to the two fast movements. While the brass or woodwinds proclaim the musical ideas, the strings keep up a nervously chattering commentary broken, at appropriate intervals, by what the program notes call heavy punctuation. If the strings take over the melodic ideas, something else chatters along to keep things going. Things thus move rapidly and urgently and it is all very skilful.

In the slow movement the motor force is replaced by the tension of several voices weaving in and out arriving, eventually, at the high level necessary to the proclamation of a climax. You cannot say that it isn't melodic, because it is, but as you cannot remember the opening melodic phrase (and so enjoy its development) you get the feeling of watching a child see how far he can stretch a wad of gum. Still, the work is undeniably well-made and well worth a hearing, and it is especially well worth a hearing in Mr. Munch's vigorous and dynamic conception; he tries to convey the impression that the symphony is as musically significant as it is expert.

ASIDE FROM the charming little Saint Saens' overture to the Japanesey "La Princesse Jaune" and the ever-affective "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, the high point of the afternoon was the cello playing of Pierre Fournier. He did Lalo's somewhat vapid concerto, a work in which the orchestral role is largely that of valet, but he made it a memorably beautiful thing.

His style is undramatic, which is all to the good, and he achieves a legato of such velvet sheen I cannot think of its equal. His fingering is superb, being absolutely secure in intonation in the most rapid passages and at the highest positions on the finger board. His bowing ranges the possibilities from sustained and expressive eloquence to accents of the lightest and most supple quality. Mr. Fournier was given a very warm reception and so, too, for that matter, was Mr. Mennin, who was present for the local premiere of his symphony.

Next week Solomon, the noted English pianist, will be the soloist in Brahms' D minor concerto. Other works on the program are Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Bartok's Music For Strings, Percussion and Celesta.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 7 - 1951

Pops Orchestra In Monday Night Music Programs

The world-renowned Boston Pops Orchestra will be heard on the NBC network on Monday starting on the 29th (NBC, 10 p. m.), it has been announced. Arthur Fiedler will direct the concerts, which will extend into the regular spring season of the Boston Pops while the brodcasts will be continued during the regular Symphony Hall public concerts.

Arturo Toscanini's return to the podium and the moving of the NBC Symphony Orchestra to a Saturday broadcast period have made it possible to add the Boston Pops program to NBC's music schedule. The Boston Symphony Orchestra also is heard weekly on NBC on Saturday mornings in the unusual "rehearsal" broadcasts directed by Charles Munch.

Evening of Music

The addition of the Boston Pops Orchestra to the weekly schedule of NBC will keep the Monday evening of music schedule intact. The programs which precede this on the air on Monday nights are "The Railroad Hour" at 8, "The Voice of Firestone" at 8.30, "The Telephone Hour" at 9 and "Cities Service Band of America" at 9.30.

The "Boston Pops Orchestra" will replace the NBC Symphony Orchestra in "Operation Tandem," the system under which several sponsors advertise on five programs. The other four programs on "Operation Tandem" are "Duffy's Tavern," a segment of the "The Big Show," "The Man Called X" and "Screen Directors' Playhouse."

The Boston Pops Orchestra, composed of members of the Boston Symphony, has been heard by millions all over the world through radio broadcasts and through their many RCA Victor recordings. The programs will originate in Boston's Symphony Hall through the facilities of station WBZ in Boston.

This Clipping From
ST. MARY'S, PA.
PRESS
JAN 8 - 1951

RADIO
DAY by DAY

NEW YORK, Jan. 8 (AP)—Despite last year's big boom in television, network radio was not standing still by any means. It continued to show a steady expansion.

The four networks started the new year with a grand total of 1,195 affiliated stations, representing a gain of 52 in all parts of the country over January 1, 1950.

Largest of the networks in number of stations is MBS with 543. Next in line is ABC with 297, followed by CBS 196 and NBC 181. Of these 23 have dual affiliations that is they are listed by both MBS or one of the other networks. This gives the net total of 1,195, or slightly more than half of the 2231 licensed standard broadcast stations.

The figures represent these gains over a year ago: MBS 13, ABC 14, CBS 16 and NBC 8.

The NBC Symphony Orchestra returns to its Saturday night schedule when Arturo Toscanini comes back on the Podium but its vacated Monday night hours will continue in the concert category.

Selected to take over is the Boston Pops orchestra, which has appeared in many a broadcast on one network or the other in the past. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony is continuing its rehearsal broadcasts on Saturday mornings.

The Pops orchestra composed of members of the symphony group, opens the new series January 29.

Listening Tonight:

NBC 8—Gordon MacRae show "Carouse;" 9 Donald Voorhees concert; 9:30 Paul Lavalle Band of America; 10 NBC Symphony Hour.

CBS 8—Joan Bennett in Hollywood Playhouse; 9 Anny Blythe in Friend Irma; 9:30 Bob Hawk.

ABC 8—Inner Sanctum; 9 Martha Lou Harp; 9:30 Johnny Desmond; 10 United or Not, Dr. Charles [216]

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS
JAN 10 1951

Koussevitsky Will Conduct Israel Philharmonic Here

The interest of San Francisco concert-goers in the appearance of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra has been indicated by an immediate and heavy demand for tickets. Presented under the joint auspices of the Musical Association of San Francisco and the local Jewish Welfare Fund, the orchestra will be heard in two concerts at the Opera House on Feb. 27 and 28.

The conducting of the Israel Philharmonic in San Francisco will be shared by Serge Koussevitsky, who for 25 years was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his protege, Leonard Bernstein, one of the nation's outstanding musical figures.

The orchestra arrived in the United States Jan. 1 on a good will tour as an expression of gratitude to the American people for the assistance rendered to the infant state of Israel in encouraging the development of the arts.

Koussevitsky's appearance Feb. 27 will mark his San Francisco debut. He will conduct Two Anthems; the Andante and Scherzo from David Symphony by Avidom; Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony and the Fourth Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

Bernstein is already well known in San Francisco, both as a composer and a conductor. His program Feb. 28 lists Two Anthems; Linz Symphony No. 36 in C major, Mozart; Sinfonia India, Chavez, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Tickets are on sale at the Opera-Symphony Box Office, Sherman Clay & Co.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 10 1951

Pop Concert Broadcasts

A new series of coast-to-coast broadcasts is announced by the National Broadcasting Co. to be given by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Arthur Fiedler will conduct. Beginning Jan. 29, the broadcasts will be given each Monday night from 10 to 11 p. m., EST.

The Boston Pops, the summer version of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are America's original Pops concerts and date back to 1885. They have been conducted by Arthur Fiedler since 1930 and have been on the air on past occasions. The performances of the Pops Orchestra are known throughout the world on RCA Victor recordings. The new Pops broadcasts are jointly sponsored. John Wright will be the writer and producer and Ben Grauer the narrator.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Charles Munch, continue with their weekly broadcasts taken from the stage of Symphony Hall where they are rehearsing.

This program, heard on the National Broadcasting Company network and unique in radio, affords an opportunity to hear and study an orchestra in the actual course of preparation. The program is now in its third season, having started in the autumn of 1948.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
JAN 10 1951

RECORD REVIEW

New Cuttings Of Classics

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

THE SYMPHONIC SIDE: Pierre Monteux and his San Francisco Symphony play Beethoven's merry Symphony No. 8 with bright buoyancy of both tone and spirit (Victor LM-43, 10-inch longplay).

Schubert's Symphony No. 2 in B-flat—a lovable little work full of wondrously fresh melody—has a nicely polished performance by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch (Victor LM-41, 10-inch longplay).

The same performers are heard in a new recording of Brahms' 4th Symphony, but Munch's fervidly lyrical reading is marred by over-excitement in the finale (Victor LM-1086, 12-inch longplay).

All three symphonies are well recorded.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 10 1951

SOLOMON, famed British pianist, will make his first appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony at this week's Friday and Saturday concerts.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
JAN 14 1951

MAJOR & MINOR

U. S. Conductors Pay Little Attention To Great Works by U. S. Composers

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

AMERICANS will agree that the culture most important to this nation is our own.

It follows that the literature, the painting and sculpture and the music of this country mean more to its people than the contemporary art of other lands.

That probably is true of the drama and of literature generally. American sculptors have their share of memorials so liberally displayed in the nation's capital, among them Daniel French's great statue of Lincoln. Native portrait painters do as well as the aliens who visit us.

The art of music provides the exception to this reasonable rule. In this field the foreigner still has every advantage. In part this is due to the accumulated literature of music which derives most importantly from the 18th and 19th centuries during which Americans were too busy conquering the continent and confirming their political and economic institutions to be concerned with higher forms of music, though folksong and dance never ceased to be created.

♫

THE first artistic invaders were Italian and German musicians. The Italians were experienced exporters of their opera which still dominates this country's stages. The Germans had less to offer in opera but far more than any other nation in symphony.

Then came the Russians to challenge their symphonic supremacy with the result that Tschaikowsky soon pushed Bach, Beethoven and Brahms into secondary positions in the esteem of the multitude.

Tschaikowsky's symphonic art won its preeminence in America without the aid of the urgent propaganda that spread the fame of German music. The Germans were determined nationalists here as at home. They were sincerely convinced of the superior worth of German music. They were keenly aware of the value of prestige in any field and were expert at turning it to commercial advantage.

As the century opened, the Soviet propaganda machine built upon the popularity of Tschaikowsky to promote Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Kabalevsky, Miaskowsky and their present crop of geniuses. With German prestige gone, except in the classics and the Wagner-Strauss school, the Russians built so successfully through AMTORG that they became the dominant factors in modern music as exhibited in our concert halls.

♫

AMERICANS began to create importantly and in volume in this century though they still had to overcome the prejudice of their fellow countrymen whose taste had been formed by the Italians, the Germans, and the Russians with some slight assistance from the French. To be heard they were obliged to achieve expressions of a kind that paid no tribute to their clever Russian contemporaries or to other Europeans.

It cannot be said that the American composers have prospered in this struggle. The cards are stacked against them. Great alien artists control all but four of our major symphony orchestras, of which there now remain but 23.

During the 49-50 season these orchestras found places on their programs for only 59 native works. Who were these native composers? The Musical Courier lists them as follows, compiling its data from the survey of the National Music Council:

Claude Almand, George Antheil, Samuel Barber, Lionel Barrymore, Robert Russell Bennett, Leonard Bernstein, S. Thomas Beversdorf, Franz Bornschein, Radie Britain, Francis Buebendorf, Hoagland Carmichael, John Alden Carpenter, Abram Chasins, Philip Greeley Clapp, Aaron Copland, Paul Creston, Eric DeLamarter, Norman Dello Joio, David Diamond, Lehnman Engel, Carl Eppert, Alvin Ettler, George Gershwin, Don Gillis, Morton Gould, Emil Greenwald, Charles Griffes, Howard Harson, Roy Harris, John Heller, Alan Hovahness, Frederick Jacobi, Jack Kilpatrick, Edward MacDowell, Daniel Gregory Mason, Peter Mennin, Emerson Meyers, Harold Morris Arne Oldberg, Vincent Persichetti, Walter Piston, Wallingford Riegger, Richard Rodgers, Carl Ruggles, William Schuman, Roger Sessions, Harold Shapero, Arthur Shepherd, Alan Shulman, Alexander Steinert, Halsey Stevens, Deems Taylor, Randall Thompson, Virgil Thomson, Burnet Tuthill, Robert Ward, Paul White, Thomas Carl Whitmer, James C. Williams.

♫

THE five native conductors did as well by the native composer as the aliens, but no better in some instances. Howard Mitchell and the National Symphony played nine native works out of a total of 109. Thor Johnson, in Cincinnati, played eight out of a total of 94. Alfred Wallenstein, in Los Angeles, played five out of a total of 69. Saul Kaston, in Denver, played five out of a total of 85. Walter Handl, in Dallas, played seven out of a total of 75.

New York betters its showing under Mitropoulos with 16 native works out of a total of 168. Chicago, under Raphael Kubelik—son of the once famous violinist—has led the Chicago Symphony, which was first in this patriotic endeavor, to a miserable three out of 124. Kubelik is a Czech.

Charles Munch, Boston's French conductor, has not kept up Koussevitzky's fine record. He played seven American works out of a total of 89. San Francisco, under another Frenchman, Monteux, did worse. He found only three native works while playing 61 of other origin.

Ormandy, a Hungarian by birth, added 14 native works to the Philadelphia Orchestra's total of 110. Buffalo and Baltimore are tied for last place in this honor role. Reginald Stewart, a Scottish artists, played only one American composition. Buffalo, served by a conductor unknown to me, did the same.

In contrast to Baltimore's Scotsman, George Szell in Cleveland, a German musician, played 10 American works out of a total of 84. That's 10 to 1 in favor of Cleveland.

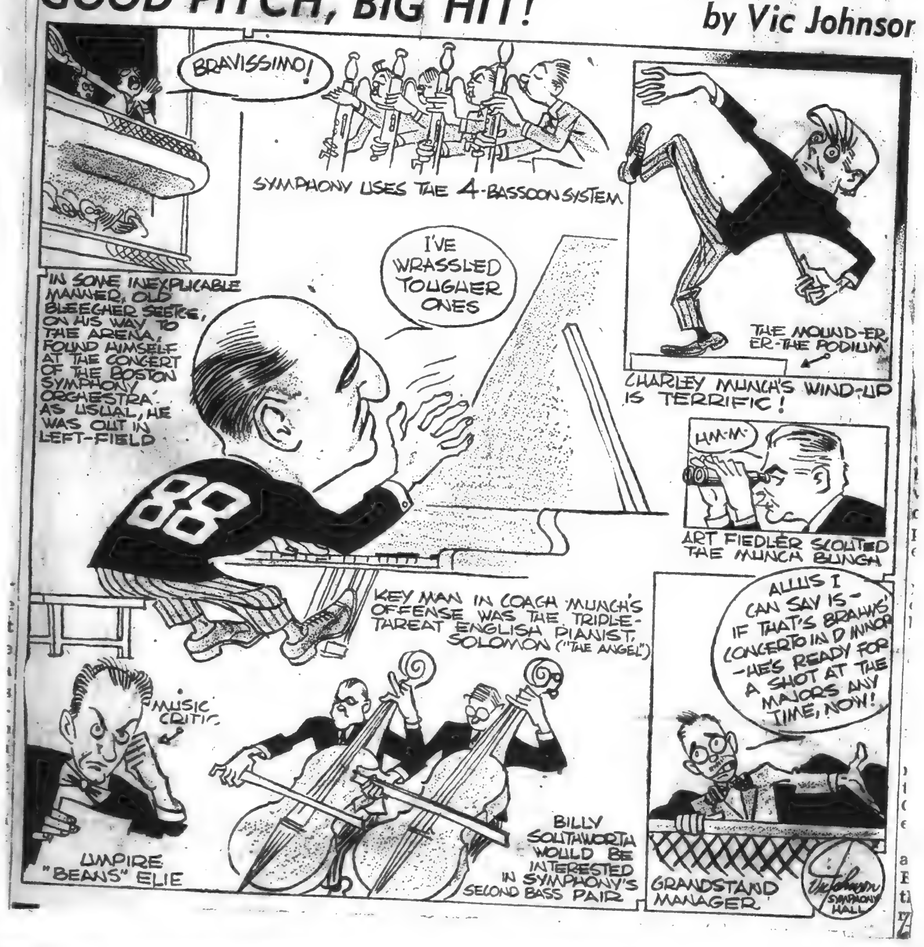
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

A NEW series of coast-to-coast broadcasts is announced by the National Broadcasting Company to be given by the Boston Pops Orchestra. Arthur Fielder will conduct. Beginning January 29, the broadcasts will be given each Monday night from 9 to 10. The Boston Pops, summer version of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is America's original Pops concert and dates back to 1885. It has been conducted by Arthur Fielder since 1930 and has been on the air on past occasions. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Charles Munch, continues with the third season of weekly broadcasts taken from the stage of Symphony Hall.

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1951

GOOD PITCH, BIG HIT!

by Vic Johnsor



[217]

TIGHT BINDING

ield House Albany Area alace of Fun

uditorium Capable of g Varied Entertainment

By C. R. ROSEBERRY

Times-Union Staff Writer

the top fancy skaters in the country will be their initials on the mirror-like floor of the House next week-end. The choice of this the eastern sectional championships of the tates Figure Skating association is one of the eathers yet in the cap of the immense audi- rena which is RPI's gift to the Albany Metro- rea.

Boston Symphony played there to a crowd of fail. The Don Cossacks sang last Friday night. e Autry show is coming Feb. 9 under sponsor- the Albany Variety club for the benefit of its und. And Mr. and Mrs. George Citizen and s can go there and skate on their own feet when like it.

WOULD BE STRETCHING a point to say that House—with all its versatility of uses and to the tri-city district—grew out of a certain that took place away back in 1930. But that had a bearing on the matter. Of course, World was what brought it to pass, in the final analysis. we were about to say, it was 1930 and the Hous- ily of Troy were reading the newspaper ac- of an event in Madison Square Garden. The igure skating championships were on—and that year when a blonde she-Viking, name of Sonja kated her way to fortune.

S WERE three lively s in the family circle, eir excitement was by what they read. is was Dr. Houston's giving them instruc- figure-skating as soon could stand on a pair s Livingston W. Hous- then president of the Valve Manufacturing and a skating en- ever since he played as an R. P. I. under- e.

way, one of the daught- isted they go down to York and see for them- Dr. Houston didn't e too hard. He got on one and next day he his skating daughters sitting in Madison e Garden. From then on, Houston girls were con- l and incurable skaters, heir father's interest in ort was revived to the where he quietly swung nfluence here and there ls getting some kind of lic arena for the Troy- nectady-Albany locality.

EW TENTATIVE moves hat direction came to t. The war intervened, e it was over, Dr. Hous- as persuaded to take the enery of his alma mater, I. Though he didn't fore- at the time, events were ng so that R. P. I. would enabled to do something ward solving the auditor- shortage.

mediately after the war, you recall, the colleges e full to busting with GI ans. R. P. I.'s registra- doubled, from 1,500 pre- to 3,000. A hasty student ing project went up on hill and was christened sselaerwyck.

NCLE SAM said he would what he could to help the eges. Scattered around the ntry were all kinds of mili- y structures which now e under the heading of r surplus". The colleges e invited to apply for them a project basis.

Well, the trustees of R. P. I. d become infected with the orts-arena idea from Presi- nt Houston, and they kept eir eyes peeled for some- ing in the way of a tremend- us metal-frame structure— aybe a big hangar. But the overnment wouldn't declare angars war-surplus. Then ey discovered this huge Navy warehouse at Davisville, R. I., and snared onto it. The gov- ernment moved it to Troy and set it up. Since then, R. P. I. has put more than $600,000 into redesigning and equip- ping it, and—viola! there's the Field House: size, 200 by 300 feet; total seating capacity, 8,000; ice-rink 185 feet by 85 feet, as large as Madison Square Garden's; and all sorts of facilities for running com- mencements, concerts, dances, conventions, and sports events.

ONE OF its potential values to the community, we don't like to think of— but it is none the less potential. When the area was struck by a ferocious gale not long ago, the Field House was standing by for possible use as a shelt- er in case of calamity. It will be available to the whole ter- ritory for any grave public emergency, whether from the elements or attack from the skies.

President Houston's empha- is over and over is upon the lfinition of the Field House s a place for "furthering the ducational, cultural and re- reational needs of this entire rea."

"We are not going into e amusement business", Dr. ouston insists. "We will not op to being a professional orts arena."

THE FIELD HOUSE isn't money-making proposition either. So far, with its $100,000 annual overhead, it hasn't broken even. The college hopes to get it on a keel where it will pay its own way, and that's all.

"Show business" is not in its line. Bob Hope and Horace Heidt recently put on their nation-wide broadcasts from the Field House, and Gene Autry is soon to come. But these were exceptions to the rule. Dr. Houston has no intention of throwing the Field House open to private promoters for enterprises of showmanship.

THE HEAD MAN up there is H. L. (Jack) Garren, who probably knows more about artificial ice-rinks than anyone in the country. While his speciality is winter sports, Garren is well qualified for the other manifold aspects of managing such a gigantic institution as he now has on his hands.

Jack Garren, a construction engineer, went to Lake Placid in 1930 to build a stadium, stayed on as construction superintendent and manager of facilities for the Olympic games. Before that, there was no such thing in the United States as a championship bobsled run, a full-scale ski center, or summer ice skating. Garren built and iced the now famous Mt. Von Hovenberg bob-run at Placid. He introduced summer skating at Lake Placid, and produced and directed the annual Figure-Skating Carnival.

THE FIRST YEAR the Field House was in use at R. P. I. (1948) its facilities were limited, and it was used only as an overflow gymnasium for track, baseball, lacrosse, and exercise of the surplus student population. The college invested a lot more money, widened it and made it versatile.

The big opening of the Field House as a semi-public facility came in October, 1949, with the celebration of R. P. I.'s 125th anniversary, when Canada's Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent spoke. Last January's commencement exercises were there, with General Omar Bradley, chief of the joint chiefs of staff speaking. Among other events have been an exposition by the Troy Junior Chamber of Commerce, two international ice revues, and a concert by the Polytechnic Chorus of Finland. The Boston symphony drew the largest audience yet—almost 6,000—and they came from as far away as Plattsburgh and Poughkeepsie. The music-shell at Tanglewood, Mass., the home grounds of the Boston orchestra, was copied in exact detail for this concert and kept as a permanent fixtxure.

The main floor was specially constructed for ice-rink purposes. Embedded in the concrete are coils of pipe totalling nine and one-half miles in length, and through them is pumped the brine that freezes the ice. When the skating season comes along in November, the ice is frozen by an expert process of spraying layer over layer on the concrete, to a thickness of one inch.

GARREN DEVELOPED his freezing technique by long trial-and-error. After each skating session, the ice is planed smooth and a new surface sprayed on it. This process has been repeated as many as three times a day at the Field House. Garren plans to do some of his artistic ice-painting for future events, engraving elaborate designs into the rink as is done at Lake Placid.

When a concert or basketball game or a dance is booked during the winter months, it is a matter of only two hours to cover the ice with a removable hardwood floor in sections. Then chairs are placed 4,000 seating capacity of the permanent concrete tiers on each side.

The Field House was the means of organizing last year the R. P. I. Figure-Skating Club, which has 75 members and is headed by William Berrigan of Schenectady.

AT SOME HOURS of almost every day and evening (according to what events are scheduled) the Field House rink is open to the public. More and more are taking advantage of it. A Junior Figure Skating Club, for children up to 14, is under way on Saturdays. Mary Lou Rolfson, a talented figure-skating professional, is attached to the Field House staff and available for private lessons. Prexy Houston is a frequent skater there. So is his attractive younger daughter, Carol.

The Field House, needless to say, has put the R. P. I. hockey team on the man. The Williams hockey team is using it as home base. Union College is considering a similar arrangement.

Indicative of the prestige which the Field House has attained almost overnight is this fact: the R. P. I. Figure Skating Club was admitted one day to membership in the U. S. Figure Skating Association; the next day it was awarded the championships to take place there Jan. 12-13-14.

AN AUDIENCE OF 6,000—That's how the Boston Symphony orchestra packed 'em in with the concert it gave last fall at the RPI Field House. It was the biggest crowd yet at the tremendous structure in Troy which is serving the Albany Metropolitan area as a combination auditorium and sports arena. The Field House seats up to 8,000.

THE PUBLIC MAY SKATE, TOO—Here is a Sunday view of just the plain garden variety of skaters who flock to the Field House in the intervals set apart for public admission to the rink.

THE SCENERY IS SUPERB—One of the most ardent habitues of the ice rink at the Field House is Miss Carol Houston, daughter of Dr. Livingston W. Houston, who is president of RPI. All three of his daughters are talented figure skaters. Carol, a recent Vassar graduate, is considered by experts to be of professional calibre.

This Clipping From
PASSAIC, N. J.
SUNDAY EAGLE
JAN 14 1951

Reviews of New Records

CONCERT MUSIC

NEW YORK (UP)—In its entirety Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music can't be described as much more than a curiosity, although it has flashes and even sustained illuminations, such as its magnificent overture.

For his devotees, however, a newly recorded complete performance by the Winterthur Symphony under Walter Goehr, will give much in pleasure and in understanding too. "Prometheus" contains pertinent clues to the genesis of latter works, particularly the "Eroica" (Concert Hall; two LPs.)

A new recording of Beethoven's C minor piano concerto, the third, has Wilhelm Backhaus as soloist and the resplendent Vienna Philharmonic under Karl Bohm. Very few pianists go as deeply into a Beethoven score as Backhaus, or bring forth as much. Bohm's insight is dependable (London: one LP.)

This reviewer's report on Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt in her fortuitous role of narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, is that for him she is an entirely satisfactory narrator. She is simple and easily understood. She points the narrative always toward the music, never away from it. These are the requirements of the narrator (RCA Victor; one LP.)

SINCERE EFFORT

Some may feel music has been fitted to narrative to the point of strained silliness. Others will be impressed by the obvious sincereity, the skillful uses of resources of orchestra and piano, the sensitive gropings for both a delineation of and a remedy for our age of anxiety.

—DELOS SMITH

[218]

— Solomon Soloist in Brahms at Symphony

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 13 1951

Solomon Both Musical, Idealistic in Concerto

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — The British pianist, Solomon, was soloist in the Brahms piano concerto in D minor, accompanied by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was an especially fine performance which was well received by an audience who had, doubtless, a curiosity to see this much talked about plianist at first hand.

In actual performance, Solomon captures the stage from the very first instant that he appears. As a pianist he seems terribly sure of himself and, although he gives a business-like performance, his music is of a certain soulful quality more than it is academic. The pianist himself is more poet than he is technician. His approach is both musical and idealistic.

* * *

WITH THE ABLE accompaniment supplied by Mr. Munch, the Brahms was given a truly compelling performance. Sometimes it is rather difficult to take too much of Brahms' piano music at one sitting, but in capturing the depth which is Brahms, Solomon has only succeeded in deepening depth itself.

This was Solomon's first appearance with the Boston orchestra and it is hoped that he will be reengaged as soon as possible—they play so well together.

Mr. Munch opened the program with an energetic playing of Schumann's "Overture to Genoveva," and Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings and Percussion."

The Bartok piece is the sort of thing that wears well on you. It is extremely listenable music of the bourgeois type and it owns a vibrant and fascinating modern slant which is cleverly fashioned from the old school.

* * *

"MUSIC FOR Strings and Percussion" is an apt title for the piece. Mr. Bartok does not seem to have wanted to fashion a masterpiece and, consequently, his music is remarkably free of the bitter pretense which accompanies a contrived composition.

Yet Bartok's music is sure to stay with us long after the fad of it has worn off, which is really the important criterion of good music. It has punch and virility. Nor is it wholly devoid of poetry.

F. S.

Munch Performance of Bartók Music Hailed

By Harold Rogers

When Solomon gave his first Boston piano recital last season, Jordan Hall was moderately filled. When he returned to Jordan Hall in the spring, seats were placed on stage to accommodate the overflow audience. When he played in Symphony Hall early this season, another capacity audience was in attendance. Almost overnight Solomon had won a large and devoted following of Bostonians.

It is only natural, then, that Solomon's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts this week end has been keenly anticipated. If listeners should find themselves disappointed with his performance of the Brahms First in D minor, there is reason for it, though Solomon should take none of the blame.

* * *

For Solomon is one of those rare interpreters who evoke a musical mood through a highly sensitive and subjective realization of the music's inner substance. He is at his best in projecting this mood when he is in complete control of the factors involved. This occurs in his solo recitals, of course, owing to his complete mastery of the piano. This does not occur in a concerto, however, because he has little control over the interpretive approach of the orchestra.

So in the Brahms yesterday afternoon we witnessed two mutually negating approaches—Solomon's subjectivity against the orchestra's objectivity. These two extremes drew into closer alignment during the serene Adagio; and in cadenza portions, of course, Solomon was free to soar to those poetic heights obtainable by only a royal few.

But by and large it was obvious that Solomon's forte is not the concerto—at least not this concerto. A pianist of mere technical brilliance is often more successful in captivating an audience by means of a concerto than one who plumbs for depths unknown by mere technique. The Brahms concerto was well performed; it was not superlatively performed. Mr. Solomon is a superb recitalist and is at his best when playing alone.

A booming bravissimo from the balcony led the barrage of applause that followed Charles Munch's refined reading of Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta. This was its first hearing in Symphony Hall since Leonard Bernstein introduced the work to Boston in 1947. It is gratifying that Bartók's starkly original talent is no longer an enigma.

After an initial splash as an innovator, Stravinsky subsided into a neo-classicism that, however valuable and valid, is overshadowed by his former fire. Schönberg's innovations, which have left a strong impress on contemporary music, are still largely a closed book to the public. But Bartók was the innovator up to the last; that his music is widely enjoyed within only a few years after his passing is a tribute to his unique genius.

* * *

By conducting with great precision, Mr. Munch held the orchestra in the accurate ensemble necessary to express Bartók's rare tonal essences, his will-o'-the-wisp moods, his exquisitely-patterned noises, his machine-like momentums. This work is imbued with intelligence, not intellectuality; with emotion, not sentimentality. Mr. Munch gave it the intelligent rendering that it requires. He deserved the bravissimo from the balcony, and many more.

Mr. Munch opened the program with a dramatic performance of Schumann's overture to his defunct opera, "Genoveva," a piece filled with much plaintive sighing, longing, and operatic agitation. Schumann is seldom heard in this frankly theatrical vein.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1951

GOOD PITCH, BIG HIT!

by Vic Johnson

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 13 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The trouble with the current Symphony program is that it lacks a suitable close. Bartok's Music of Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which originally occupied the final spot, is a bit too rarefied. Sensing that, Mr. Munch put it in the middle, and placed at the end Brahms' First Piano Concerto, which is enjoying the distinguished services of Solomon, the English virtuoso, who made his Boston Symphony debut yesterday. But taken as a whole, the concerto is a solemn piece. Even the finale, which begins and ends with a show of exuberance, is sometimes labored, and Solomon's interpretation, magnificent in many ways, is not exactly an electrifying one—if any performance of this concerto could be that.

The remaining choice for the final position was Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," revived after 33 years; and the traditional place for an overture is the beginning of a concert. It still would have made a better finish than either of the others. The opera, Schumann's only essay in the form, was a failure, but the overture is first-rate Schumann, and its neglect by every conductor since Muck seems hard to understand. There is a brooding introduction and the rest is passionate. It is not what you would call theatre music, and it suggests, of itself, why the opera never caught on. Herbert F. Peiser, who heard it that way in Germany, maintains that it is highly effective as a radio piece. Mr. Munch, who is always at his best in Schumann, gave it a stirring reading.

Curious that the Bartok should have followed so closely upon last Wednesday's Jordan Hall performance of the Sonata for two pianos and percussion. The latter is on the whole the more consistently absorbing piece of the two. Both abound in extraordinary effects of sound. Indeed, we are often more conscious of the sound of the music than of the music itself. In the piece heard yesterday, this is particularly true of the two slow divisions.

The second and fourth movements provide easier listening. The finale, in fact, is something of a thriller, and yesterday it provoked a noisy demonstration on the part of at least some members of the audience, if not of all of them. The performance in which the percussion section covered itself with glory was of remarkable quality. The work, first given here under Mr. Bernstein four years ago, was not repeated any too soon. Whether you like him or not, Bartok belongs in the repertory.

The uneveness of Brahms' early concerto was especially apparent yesterday. Solomon, with conductor and orchestra to aid, made the most of its romantic, poetic qualities, but did something less than full justice to the more vigorous episodes. Anyway, the audience rose to it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 1

MUSIC

Pianist Solomon Plays Brahms Concerto in D Minor With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was almost like the proverbial irresistible force meeting an immovable object, the first appearance of pianist Solomon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Brahms D minor Concerto. Individually each was a quantity well known; Solomon as a foremost keyboard virtuoso who plays with extraordinary clarity and "singing" tone; the Brahms as a huge work, intractable and granitic in its first movement and finale, a classic more respected than loved.

With the superlative collaboration of conductor Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony to serve as a sort of catalytic agent in this collision, the result was a stupendous performance. I had never heard the like of it, and perhaps older listeners never had, either. This result was a performance that mastered every problem of tonal balance in interpretive difficulty. Solomon is the man to make those big trills sound musical, to make the oftentimes thick Brahmsian piano texture inviting as velvet. Mr. Munch is the man to muster the right proportion of orchestral weight so that the piano does not have to roar or otherwise be submerged.

Every detail of keyboard writing and orchestral scoring was clear as mountain air, and for the first time within this chronicler's experience the D minor Concerto was real music in every measure. I should have preferred a faster tempo in the two outside movements, but pianist and conductor were thoroughly in agreement on the relatively slow pace they chose. As for the adagio which is the younger Brahms at his most delicate and sentimental, that was as near perfection as you are likely to hear. No wonder, then that cheers and applause broke in before the last chord of the whole work had ended.

Somewhat lost in the presence of this miracle was Bela Bartok's remarkable Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta that Leonard Bernstein had introduced here in 1947. Elder people won't like it, for it is often dissonant, rhythmically arbitrary and bizarre in many of its melodic and harmonic details.

This sort of music, so personal and venturesome, doesn't make friends quickly. You have to give it a lot of careful listening. But if it does not prove a 20th century masterpiece, I shall have lost a bet with myself. Beneath the rough texture is real feeling and genuine vitality, a sense of true musical communication. It was fairly well received, and a balcony section of the audience, if I heard correctly, gave it an enthusiastic shout.

The program begins with Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, a relic of the romantic past unheard at these concerts since 1918.

[219]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 12th concert of the season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Solomon, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to Genoveva ..... Schumann
Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta ..... Bartok
Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 15 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Solomon at the peak of his form, Bartok at the peak of his art, and Schumann unlike Schumann in anything else, made this one of the notable concerts in a notable season.

Taking things as they came there was first the overture to Schumann's forgotten opera "Genoveva" which is especially beautiful for the fact that while its melodic and harmonic substance is the maturest Schumann, its scoring for the orchestra is quite the best thing Schumann (whose scoring has often been rather unjustly criticised) ever did. Rather darker in color than the symphonies and more organic and "composed-through" in its orchestral language, it develops in a sustained and inevitable manner. Mr. Munch, who conducted it with devotion, is to be complimented for reviving this work, unheard here since 1918.

Quality of Vision

If the "Music for Stringed Instruments, Percussion and Celesta" is not Bartok's masterpiece, it certainly ranks as one of his most original works—and originality of an elemental quality characterizes all of this composer's music. For expressed in its drivin grhythmic power, its far-reaching tonalities and harmonic tensions ,its individuality of melodic content (drawn from Bartok's life-long absorption in the eastern European folk melos of Hungary), is a nearly messianic quality of vision.

It is as if Bartok, deaf to the sounds of western romanticism yet himself a passionate romantic, had to create this music out of an inner urgency he could not deny.

To make one case in point, consider the slow movement, which, from an eerie click of the xzylophone over glissandos in the pedal timpani, goes on to evoke a scene of other-worldly mystery and rapture, to subside again in the atmosphere of the opening bars. It is music, really, of another sphere and another time and when we all catch up with it —say in 2051—it will, I am sure, speak as directly, as personally and as profoundly as the adagio of the Ninth.

It might be added that Mr. Munch and the men of the orchestra traversed this fiendishly difficult work no less than magnificently, and it was gratifying indeed to note that the audience was sufficiently in contact with music and performance to call the condctor back for a fourth round of applause.

Big, Intimate

As far Solomon, his was the most elevated and inspired performance of Brahms' towering D minor Concerto we have heard since Rudolf Serkin did it here in 1938. Solomon, whose approach was at once big but intimate, brilliant but inward, conveyed all the sombre majesty of the first movement, all the profound melancholy of the slow movement (inspired by the attempted suicide of Schumann), and all the ingratiating energy of the rondo. It was, in fact, the Solomon of his first two memorable recitals in Jordan Hall last season, the Solomon who looks like The Angle but plays like an angel. Once again, too, Mr. Munch revealed his great stature as an accompanist, and although there were moments of rather rough tone in the woodwinds and brasses, the orchestra gave superb interpretative support.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on January 26 with Pierre Monteux making his first appearance as conductor of the orchestra in more than a generation. He will do the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which he, to the accompaniment of a riot, introduced to the startled world.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
COMPASS
JAN 11 1951

Premiere for Mennin

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony will be introduced here by the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, next Wednesday evening in Carnegie Hall.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 13 1951

MUSIC

Pianist Solomon Plays Brahms Concerto in D Minor With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was almost like the proverbial irresistible force meeting an immovable object, the first appearance of pianist Solomon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Brahms D minor Concerto. Individually each was a quantity well known: Solomon as a foremost keyboard virtuoso who plays with extraordinary clarity and "singing" tone; the Brahms as a huge work, intractable and granitic in its first movement and finale, a classic more respected than loved.

With the superlative collaboration of conductor Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony to serve as a sort of catalytic agent in this collision, the result was a stupendous performance. I had never heard the like of it, and perhaps older listeners never had, either. This result was a performance that mastered every problem of tonal balance in interpretive difficulty. Solomon is the man to make those big trills sound musical, to make the oftentimes thick Brahmsian piano texture inviting as velvet. Mr. Munch is the man to muster the right proportion of orchestral weight so that the piano does not have to rpar or otherwise be submerged.

Every detail of keyboard writing and orchestral scoring was clear as mountain air, and for the first time within this chronicler's experience, the D minor Concerto was real music in every measure. I should have preferred a faster tempo in the two outside movements, but pianist and conductor were thoroughly in agreement on the relatively slow pace they chose. As for the adagio, which is the younger Brahms at his most delicate and sentimental, that was as near perfection as you are likely to hear. No wonder, then, that cheers and applause broke in before the last chord of the whole work had ended.

Somewhat lost in the presence of this miracle was Bela Bartok's remarkable Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta that Leonard Bernstein had introduced here in 1947. Elder people won't like it, for it is often dissonant, rhythmically arbitrary and bizarre in many of its melodic and harmonic details.

This sort of music, so personal and venturesome, doesn't make friends quickly. You have to give it a lot of careful listening. But if it does not prove a 20th century masterpiece, I shall have lost a bet with myself. Beneath the rough texture is real feeling and genuine vitality, a sense of true musical communication. It was fairly well received, and a balcony section of the audience, if I heard correctly, gave it an enthusiastic shout.

The program begins with Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, a relic of the romantic past unheard at these concerts since 1918.

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER
JAN 14 1951

New Records

Various persons will have various reactions to Leonard Bernstein's second symphony, titled "The Age of Anxiety" after a poem by W. H. Auden, which has been recorded by the New York Philharmonic - Symphony under the composer, with Lukas Foss playing the piano part (Columbia; one LP.)

Sincere Effort

Some may feel music has been fitted to narrative to the point of strained silliness. Others will be impressed by the obvious sincerity, the skillful uses of resources of orchestra and piano, the sensitive groupings for both a delineation of and a remedy for our age of anxiety.

This reviewer's report on Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt in her fortuitous role of narrator in Prokofleff's "Peter and the Wolf," with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, is that for him she is an entirely satisfactory narrator. She is simple and easily understood. She points the narrative always toward the music, never away from it. These are the requirements of the narrator (RCA Victor; one LP.)

* * *

After years of listening to the swollen and feverish orchestral version of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," its playing by the ensemble it was intended for—a string sextet—causes almost as much surprise as pleasure. Now it has the full sense of a transfigured night rather than a nocturnal calm pierced by nightmare.

The recording is by the Hollywood String Quartet plus Alvin Denkin, viola, and Kurt Reher, 'cello. It is loaded with stuff, this quartet made up of members of Southern California's impressive colony of top musicians.

* * *

The latest wax-from-film musical album by MGM, "Pagan Love Song," features Howard Keel and Esther Williams singing about all the romance of the South Pacific which the GIs of the last war was somehow missed. The album has some fine songs which already are climbing into the hit list, including "Pagan Love Song," "Home of Singing Bamboo," "Why is Love so Crazy," "Singing in the Sun," "Sea of the Moon" and "Tahiti."

* * *

New singles:

Lisa Kirk sings her best pair of songs in some time with "Gotta See Ya Once More" and "Ja-Da" (RCA Victor) . . . Artie Shaw's orchestra has a tuneful two instrumental sides with "Serenade in Blue" and "Autumn Leaves" (Decca) . . .

Jo Stafford adds to her catalogue the standard "Stardust" and the new "You Don't Remind Me"—both very listenable (Columbia) . . . Jack Fina has some good old-fashioned ragtime piano in the playing of "Baltimore Rag" (MGM) . . .

Other good ones include Margaret Whiting singing "A Man Ain't A-Nothin' But a Wolf" (Capitol) . . . Don Cornell singing with Hugo Winterhalter's Orchestra, "Sue Me" and "Velvet Lips" (RCA Victor) . . . "Who Cares" with Lionel Hampton's Orchestra (Decca) . . . Sarah Vaughn singing "The Nearness of You" and "You're Mine, You" (Columbia.)

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
JAN 13 1951

Boston To Take Over Toscanini's Spot

The N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra returns to its Saturday evening chedule when Arturo Toscanini comes back to the podium 2 weeks from now, but its vacated Monday night hours will continue in the concert category.

Selected to take over as the Boston Pops Orchestra, which has been on many a broadcast on one network or the other in the past. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony is continuing its rehearsal broadcasts Saturday mornings.

The Pops, composed of members of the symphony group, opens the new series January 29.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct. Beginning January 29, the broadcasts will be given each Monday night from 10 to 11 P. M. The Boston Pops, summer version of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are America's original Pops concerts, and date back to 1885. They have been conducted by Arthur Fiedler since 1930.

As for the Boston Symphony broadcasts from the stage of Symphony Hall where they are rehearsing, this program, heard on the National Broadcasting Company network and unique in radio, affords an opportunity to hear and study an orchestra in the actual course of preparation. The program is now in its third season, having started in the autumn of 1948.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
JAN 15 1951

The Boston Symphony In N. Y. This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its third visit of the season to New York this week. In the following week, Pierre Monteux will return to Boston to conduct the orchestra for the first time since he was its regular conductor in 1919-24. Mr. Monteux will conduct the third concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater, the 13th pair of Friday and Saturday concerts on Jan. 26-27 and the third Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall on Jan. 28.

On Friday, Saturday and Sunday the program will consist of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the Third Symphony by Brahms.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Journal American (B'klyn Sect.)
JAN 18 1951

Munch Leads 3rd Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Charles Munch, will return to the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow evening for its third concert of the season. The program will open with Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E-flat ("Drum Roll"), and will continue with Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole.

The concert will be brought to a close with the Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A, by Berlioz.

The Brooklyn performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, acting in cooperation with the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

This Clipping From
JERSEY CITY, N. J.
JERSEY JOURNAL
JAN 16 1951

FEATURE LIST:—This month the entire music world observes the 50th anniversary of the death of the great Italian composer Giuseppe Verdi, whose prolific pen produced 30 operas, 11 of which are today in the repertory of the world's greatest companies; seven choral works, including the great Requiem and the Stabat Mater; a number of works for voice and instrument and small instrumental groups, and one string quartet. RCA-Victor's commemorative offering is the issuance of three albums—two representative of Verdi's most universally known and loved operas, including "Highlights from La Traviata," and the third his little-known Quartet in E Minor, the great master's only work in chamber form. Previously available as single discs, the operatic excerpts and overtures are now compiled so that opera lovers may have them in unit form performed by leading soloists of the Metropolitan Opera with whom the roles have been popularly identified. . . . Another event of significance on the Red Seal feature list is the release of Samuel Barber's Sonata for Piano, by Vladimir Horowitz, who premiered the work in New York last January. Horowitz is also represented on the January list by a recording of the Chopin Sonata in B-Flat Minor, Op. 35. . . . The January feature list contains three single discs: a coupling of Paganini's "La Campanella" and "Moto Perpetuo," played by Thirty-four Violins of the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler; a reading of the Overture to Berlioz' "Beatrice and Benedict," by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, finally, two outstanding arias: Una furtiva lagrima from "L'Elisir d'Amore" and Lamento di Federico from "L'Arlesiana," sung by tenor Jussi Bjoerling.

M.G.MELODIES:—There are some top-notch records just released by MGM which make for very pleasant listening. For instance, there is an album, "Sentimental Journey with David Rose," which is very pleasing to the ears. Rose and orchestra offer the lovely tune title itself, "Sentimental Journey." They continue with seven other lush musical way-stations. Dave's musical group, the Rose-tones, are on hand to greet you at places marked: "When the Wind Was Green" and "Time and Time Again." Visits "Star Dust," "Moon of Manakoora," "Deep Purple," "Bewitched" and "How High the Moon" are in charge of the orchestra alone. . . . From the film "Royal Wedding" come two tunes that are sung by Fred Astaire and Jane Powell. The first is a number which has one of the longest titles on record, a hilarious ditty called "How Could You Believe Me When I Said I Loved You When You Know I've Been a Liar All My Life?" The coupler offers Jane alone in an outstanding new ballad, "Too Late Now." . . . If you like the mood nostalgic you get it in the latest Blue Barron recordings of "Till the End of the World with You" and "At a Perfume Counter (On the Rue de la Paix)." . . . From the musical production "Bless You All" Ted Straeter and orchestra offer "Take Off the Coat." The lyric is fine. Coupler is "Use Your Imagination," from "Out of This World." The Straeter Singers add charm to the number. . . . Two standard tunes, "I'm Gonna Sit Right Down and Write Myself a Letter" and "I'm Through with Love," are done well by Sarah Vaughan.

CAPITOL CLICKS:—Country singer Jimmie Skinner performs two of his own original songs with a strong beat and with guitar featured. Numbers are "There's Nothin' About You Special" and "It's My World." Skinner's singing is particularly well adapted to this fine coupling. . . . "The Great American Eagle" is a patriotic number by Leon Payne and with narration by Tex Ritter. Reverse side, "Fatal Letter," features the sensitive voice of Payne. . . . Polka king Steve Adamczyk socks across two sure-fire winners for his followers with "Ballroom Polka" and "Around and Around," the latter being strictly instrumental. . . . That hot number "Hot Rod Race" is well done by Jimmy Dolan. Flipside is "Walkin' the Blues."

[200]

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 12th program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Solomon, pianist, was the soloist. The program:
Overture to "Genoveva" ..... Schumann
Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta ..... Bartok
Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 ..... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Solomon at the peak of his form, Bartok at the peak of his art, and Schumann unlike Schumann in anything else, made this one of the notable concerts in a notable season.

Taking things as they came there was first the overture to Schumann's forgotten opera "Genoveva," which is especially beautiful for the fact that while its melodic and harmonic substance is the maturest Schumann, its scoring for the orchestra is quite the best thing Schumann (whose scoring has often been rather unjustly criticised) ever did. Rather darker in color than the symphonies and more organic and "composed-through" in its orchestral language, it develops in a sustained and inevitable manner. Mr. Munch, who conducted it with devotion, is to be complimented for reviving this work, unheard here since 1918.

Quality of Vision

If the "Music for Stringed Instruments, Percussion and Celesta" is not Bartok's masterpiece, it certainly ranks as one of his most original works—and originality of an elemental quality characterizes all of this composer's music. For expressed in its drivin grhythmic power, its far-reaching tonalities and harmonic tensions ,its individuality of melodic content (drawn from Bartok's life-long absorption in the eastern European folk melos of Hungary), is a nearly messianic quality of vision.

It is as if Bartok, deaf to the sounds of western romanticism yet himself a passionate romantic, had to create this music out of an inner urgency he could not deny.

To make one case in point, consider the slow movement, which, from an eerie click of the xzylophone over glissandos in the pedal timpani, goes on to evoke a scene of other-worldly mystery and rapture, to subside again in the atmosphere of the opening bars. It is music, really, of another sphere and another time and when we all catch up with it —say in 2051—it will, I am sure, speak as directly, as personally and as profoundly as the adagio of the Ninth.

It might be added that Mr. Munch and the men of the orchestra traversed this fiendishly difficult work no less than magnificently, and it was gratifying indeed to note that the audience was sufficiently in contact with music and performance to call the condctor back for a fourth round of applause.

Big, Intimate

As far Solomon, his was the most elevated and inspired performance of Brahms' towering D minor Concerto we have heard since Rudolf Serkin did it here in 1938. Solomon, whose approach was at once big but intimate, brilliant but inward, conveyed all the sombre majesty of the first movement, all the profound melancholy of the slow movement (inspired by the attempted suicide of Schumann), and all the ingratiating energy of the rondo. It was, in fact, the Solomon of his first two memorable recitals in Jordan Hall last season, the Solomon who looks like The Angle but plays like an angel. Once again, too, Mr. Münch revealed his great stature as an accompanist, and although there were moments of rather rough tone in the woodwinds and brasses, the orchestra gave superb interpretative support.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on January 26 with Pierre Monteux making his first appearance as conductor of the orchestra in more than a generation. He will do the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which he, to the accompaniment of a riot, introduced to the startled world.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
JAN 16 1951

Bostonians to Play Mennin Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch returns to Carnegie Hall tomorrow for its third visit of the season. Included will be the first local performance of the Fifth Symphony of the young American composer, Peter Mennin. Also scheduled are Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Schumann's First Symphony.

On Saturday at 2:30, the orchestra, for its second Carnegie concert, will perform Haydn's Symphony No. 103, the "Drum Roll," and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. This same program will be performed Friday night at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

-SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1

MUSIC

Pianist Solomon Plays Brahms Concerto in D Minor With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was almost like the proverbial irresistible force meeting an immovable object, the first appearance of pianist Solomon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Brahms D minor Concerto. Individually each was a quantity well known: Solomon as a foremost keyboard virtuoso who plays with extraordinary clarity and "singing" tone; the Brahms as a huge work, intractable and granitic in its first movement and finale, a classic more respected than loved.

With the superlative collaboration of conductor Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony to serve as a sort of catalytic agent in this collision, the result was a stupendous performance. I had never heard the like of it, and perhaps older listeners never had, either. This result was a performance that mastered every problem of tonal balance in interpretive difficulty. Solomon is the man to make those big trills sound musical, to make the oftentimes thick Brahmsian piano texture inviting as velvet. Mr. Munch is the man to muster the right proportion of orchestral weight so that the piano does not have to roar or otherwise be submerged.

Every detail of keyboard writing and orchestral scoring was clear as mountain air, and for the first time within this chronicler's experience, the D minor Concerto was real music in every measure. I should have preferred a faster tempo in the two outside movements, but pianist and conductor were thoroughly in agreement on the relatively slow pace they chose. As for the adagio, which is the younger Brahms at his most delicate and sentimental, that was as near perfection as you are likely to hear. No wonder, then, that cheers and applause broke in before the last chord of the whole work had ended.

Somewhat lost in the presence of this miracle was Bela Bartok's remarkable Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta that Leonard Bernstein had introduced here in 1947. Elder people won't like it, for it is often dissonant, rhythmically arbitrary and bizarre in many of its melodic and harmonic details.

This sort of music, so personal and venturesome, doesn't make friends quickly. You have to give it a lot of careful listening. But if it does not prove a 20th century masterpiece, I shall have lost a bet with myself. Beneath the rough texture is real feeling and genuine vitality, a sense of true musical communication. It was fairly well received, and a balcony section of the audience, if I heard correctly, gave it an enthusiastic shout.

The program begins with Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, a relic of the romantic past unheard at these concerts since 1918.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The trouble with the current Symphony program is that it lacks a suitable close. Bartok's Music of Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which originally occupied the final spot, is a bit too rarefied. Sensing that, Mr. Munch put it in the middle, and placed at the end Brahms' First Piano Concerto, which is enjoying the distinguished services of Solomon, the English virtuoso, who made his Boston Symphony debut yesterday. But taken as a whole, the concerto is a solemn piece. Even the finale, which begins and ends with a show of exuberance, is sometimes labored, and Solomon's interpretation, magnificent in many ways, is not exactly an electrifying one—if any performance of this concerto could be that.

The remaining choice for the final position was Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," revived after 33 years; and the traditional place for an overture is the beginning of a concert. It still would have made a better finish than either of the others. The opera, Schumann's only essay in the form, was a failure, but the overture is first-rate Schumann, and its neglect by every conductor since Muck seems hard to understand. There is a brooding introduction and the rest is passionate. It is not what you would call theatre music, and it suggests, of itself, why the opera never caught on. Herbert F. Peiser, who heard it that way in Germany, maintains that it is highly effective as a radio piece. Mr. Munch, who is always at his best in Schumann, gave it a stirring reading.

Curious that the Bartok should have followed so closely upon last Wednesday's Jordan Hall performance of the Sonata for two pianos and percussion. The latter is on the whole the more consistently absorbing piece of the two. Both abound in extraordinary effects of sound. Indeed, we are often more conscious of the sound of the music than of the music itself. In the piece heard yesterday, this is particularly true of the two slow divisions.

The second and fourth movements provide easier listening. The finale, in fact, is something of a thriller, and yesterday it provoked a noisy demonstration on the part of at least some members of the audience, if not of all of them. The performance in which the percussion section covered itself with glory was of remarkable quality. The work, first given here under Mr. Bernstein four years ago, was not repeated any too soon. Whether you like him or not, Bartok belongs in the repertory.

The uneveness of Brahms' early concerto was especially apparent yesterday. Solomon, with conductor and orchestra to aid, made the most of its romantic, poetic qualities, but did something less than full justice to the more vigorous episodes. Anyway, the audience rose to it.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & The Sun
JAN 18 1951

Mennin Work Unveiled By Boston Symphony

A fresh and exciting Fifth Symphony by 26-year-old Peter Mennin of Erie, Pa., featured the visit of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

Mr. Mennin's latest score is sparing and eloquent, building the sustained power of each movement out of scant phrases and themes. The work has terrific "go" and communicates a vast sense of zest. One didn't mind the borrowed blessings of Shostakovich and Debussy.

Mr. Munch conducted the new work with a force and conviction that went out to the orchestra and from there to the audience. The same was true of readings of music by Saint-Saens, Ravel, and Schumann.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1951

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Arthur Berger

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Concert last night under the direction of Charles Munch. The program:
Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" ..... Saint-Saens
Rapsodie Espagnole ..... Ravel
Symphony No. 5 ..... Peter Mennin
(First New York performance)
Symphony No. 1 in B flat major ..... Schumann

The Bostonians

Charles Munch built a program for the Boston Symphony last night that started with the light and colorful pieces, proceeded to the novel offering of the evening, and then, after the intermission, settled down to the main musical substance, Schumann's First Symphony. The cumulative effect seemed satisfying and absorbing to the capacity house in Carnegie Hall. The glittering, playful devices of Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" in no way prejudiced the ear against the more solemn, symphonic procedures of Peter Mennin or Schumann. For Mr. Munch's Ravel was neat and beautifully proportioned, and did not squander the colors about. For so familiar a work, it was surprisingly delightful to hear and the values he gave to it were fresh and revealing, and in every way a pleasure.

The Saint-Saens Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" is one of those many overtures the French conductors are in the habit of taking down from the shelves to give us a new twist on a familiar type of repertory material. As to the Mennin symphony, it gave gratifying evidence that Mr. Munch is keeping up the fine tradition of the Boston Symphony of giving its support to the best craftsmen among our younger composers and making available to them an orchestral virtuosity for which their symphonies seem almost specifically made. Mennin is a composer, a real composer, and one of fluency and force. Let there be no doubt about it. With five symphonies at the age of twenty-seven, he forces us to take account of this as a fact.

His knack of keeping the music moving at all costs would be so much more compelling if he paused in the composing process to make all the to-do concern itself with more striking material. He falls so easily into the patterns of an expert American idiom that has been developed in the last few decades with more than a brief nod to the insistent elements that have made Sibelius so immediately appealing to listeners. The music is rhythmically alive, but the rhythms fall into a category of set formulae. The climaxes may be anticipated. This may be Mr. Mennin's way of developing his extraordinary facility, and it may take him a few more symphonies to develop something in the way of unusual interest and arresting detail. The work and its textures are, however, well integrated and indicate decided growth.

A New Trio

The trio which played last night in Times Hall takes its title from the surnames of its members, Leopold Mannes, pianist; Bronislaw Gimpel, violinist, and Luigi Silva, cellist. They played two full-length works, Brahms's trio in C minor, Op. 101, and Ravel's trio in A, and also offered Beethoven's one-movement posthumously published eighth trio in B flat major and three nocturnes composed twenty-seven years ago by Ernest Bloch.

This new group can be regarded as the successor of the Mannes Trio, in which Vittorio Brero was the violinist. The playing of the three expert musicians was characterized by unity of execution, communicative devotion to the music and unity of interpretative outlook. Tonal balance was usually, if not invariably well maintained. Mr. Silva's playing was marked by subtlety of shading; Mr. Gimpel's by more pronounced dynamic contrast, but this did not cause expressive divergence; the violinist slightly overemphasized incisiveness in his tone in certain vigorous passages. There was an appropriate contrast between energy and lyricism in the first movement of the Brahms work; in the second part of the Ravel trio a lighter and more imaginative treatment might have been appropriate, but the work as a whole was interpretatively convincing. The unfamiliar Beethoven and Bloch works were appealing, while not among their composers' more memorable creations.

F. D. P.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 18 1951

MUNCH CONDUCTS MENNIN SYMPHONY

He Leads Boston Orchestra in First Performance Here of Young Composer's Fifth

Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony, in its first New York performance, was the principal news of an uncommonly well organized and played program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Charles Munch, the regular conductor, was very much in the vein last night and provided a series of incandescent and vibrant performances.

Mr. Mennin, who was born in Erie, Pa., in 1923, has the right attitude about composing. He sails in and composes. There is a sense of confidence in his music. Not yet 30 and the author of five symphonies, he looks as though he is going to be prolific. And remember that he took time out for service in the Air Force. Since 1945 he has won several impressive prizes, and this latest symphony was written on commission of the enterprising Dallas Symphony Orchestra, which played it in its première some weeks ago.

The Fifth Symphony reflects the young man's energy. It has drive, gusto and a fine assurance that it is —expressing the author's feelings. It would be easy to point out that it bears signs of certain influences—a touch of Wagner, a bit of Sibelius, some Howard Hanson and some Roy Harris. But that is not important. After all, music is a continuous stream; it would be surprising if the young men did not write music reminiscent of their elders and forebears.

The encouraging thing about Mr. Mennin's symphony is that it has an unmistakable profile of its own. It bespeaks a talent for the orchestra. In the busy passages of the first and third movements, Mr. Mennin shows that he can keep the whole apparatus going lickety-split in the most natural way. In the slow movement he indicates that he can sing, perhaps fulsomely at times and with sustained feeling at others, but sing he can. And that is what counts. Mr. Mennin's style may undergo changes, but the main thing is basic—he is a composer.

The audience gave Mr. Mennin a rousing salutation when he came out on the stage with Mr. Munch at the end of the symphony. With all his prizes and performances, it is to be hoped that he will not hesitate to be self-critical. In that direction lies growth.

This symphony, one felt, was a work for which Mr. Munch had high personal regard. He led the orchestra in a rousing performance. It had breadth and solidity. It was preceded by a gracefully articulated reading of Saint-Saëns' "Princesse Jaune" Overture and a fine-fibered, evocative performance of Ravel's delectable "Rapsodie Espagnole." The rewarding evening ended with Schumann's richly romantic Symphony No. 1.

H. T.

'Rite' at Rehearsal

At the open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be held in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening at 7:30, Pierre Monteux will rehearse Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Seats for this rehearsal are now on sale at the Symphony Hall box office.

[22]

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

Boston Symphony Concert Presents Romantic Mood; Menuhin Scores as Soloist

By DOROTHY BETHURUM

Whether by accident or design the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at the auditorium was in mood as far from a war-clouded world as music can get. It was romanticism in its most undiluted form, and nothing could be more eloquent proof of the superb powers of the orchestra and of the gallantry of Charles Munch's directing than the response of the audience to a reading of experience nobody could now give.

For New Londoners the appearance of the Boston Symphony is the high point of the musical year. Last night excellence was added to excellence in the appearance of Yehudi Menuhin as soloist in the G minor Violin concerto of Bruch. This piece carried the burden of the romantic statement, for its virtues are those of uncomplicated melody and single orchestration. Both soloist and orchestra accepted its qualities for what they are, though Menuhin in his precise and powerful playing almost gave it a depth it does not have. Both in the first movement and in the Adagio his flawless performance evoked the last measure of Bruch's sweetness, never over-sentimentalizing it but never denying its genuine dependence on sentiment. The close of the Adagio brought the nostalgic charm of a pre-war world to its high point.

Perfect Rapport

Throughout the concerto Menuhin's virtuosity had full play. There was perfect rapport between soloist and orchestra, beautifully revealed, for example, in the blending of violin and flute in the second movement. The clarity of the brasses in the first movement and Munch's broad directing almost concealed the meretricious elements in the music, and Menuhin's brilliance in the Allegro made one overlook the monotony of theme and treatment. If the audience occasionally regretted that this superb playing was not exhibited on the Beethoven concerto or on some other more substantial work, this is not to deny the grace of Bruch.

Schumann's First Symphony, the Spring Symphony, was the major work on the program, romanticism at its most satisfying. It is not necessary to accept Schumann's own first programmatic designation of its movements as descriptive of spring—a scheme he later abandoned—to see in the whole of the symphony joyous affirmation; and the clarity of the opening trumpets and horns to the triumphant coda at the end, the orchestra brought to the playing the same sort of vitality that went into the writing of the symphony. Munch's firm control of dynamics in the first movement was revealed in the rich variations of stress. Richness and delicacy marked the Largetto; flutes, oboes, cellos and violas emphasized the lyricism of the theme, in fine contrast to the virility of the scherzo and the humor of the second trio. The charming arabesque of the last movement, echoed amusingly by the double basses, was done with absolute precision. Most beautiful in the movement was the cadenza for the flute, the perfect expression of the lyricism of the symphony in fine contrast to the energetic coda at the end.

This is the place to remark upon the musicianship of Georges Laurent, the first flautist, who not only in his solo part in the symphony, but throughout the concert was in perfect control of this instrument, and contributed some of the best effects of the evening.

Saint-Saens' Overture

The concert opened with Saint-Saens' overture to La Princese Janue, an early romantic form of exoticism, though Parisian, not Japanese. It was one of the fine things about the orchestra that it needed no "warming up"; the first crisp notes of the overture were entirely in the right mood. The woodwinds were delicate and clear, the triangle vivid, and the whole done with the precision and brilliance which marked the entire concert. Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole followed the overture, the only composition not entirely in the mood of simple romanticism. The Rapsodie exhibits a more complicated skill in orchestration and a more sophisticated sense of rhythm than quite belongs in that school. Munch's reading of the score was both careful and brilliant. The steady tempo of the first part of the Prelude a la Nuit reinforced the haunting statement of the theme given by the strings and woodwinds. In the Malaguena [illegible] theme given first by the double basses exhibited both Ravel's fine sense of contrast and the accuracy of the strings. The transition to the melody of flute and oboe was handled with a sure sense of delicacy and style. The third movement, Habanera, perhaps the slightest of the four, gave the orchestra an admirable opportunity for variety in rhythm and tonal qualities which Munch exploited to the full. In the fourth movement, the Feria, all the color of the composition appears, in variations of melody and movement handled with the flexibility of assured mastery. Full justice was done to every statement of the theme—by flute, English horn, and clarinet—and the full and rich tone of the trumpets with the controlled movement of the whole orchestra brought the Rapsodie to a brilliant close.

Unity of Feeling

The program last night was remarkable for its unity of feeling throughout. Nowhere were the depths touched. We missed both the grandeur of the great masters and the complexities of modern music. Yet Munch revealed to us the possibilities of this clear and uninhibited romanticism, re-invoking the powers of the late nineteenth century to savor experience and accept it. Perhaps he could have played no timelier music. When the problems of our present world become too much for us, it is well to recall the attitudes of a more forthright time. And the flawless playing of the orchestra, moulded into a single instrument, complex but unified and the sheer beauty of Menuhin's tone astonish us again with the power of artistry to transcend most human evils.

It is not often that one can hear in New London a combination of such distinction as the Boston Symphony and Yehudi Menuhin. The concert will long remain one of the favors of fortune and of the Connecticut College series.

This review of the concert should not end without remarking upon the rare cooperation of the elements. Usually the Boston Symphony concert is accompanied by the worst that January winter can produce. Last night was atmospherically as clear and beautiful as the music, and perhaps we can take that for a good omen.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 20 1951

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony Excitingly 'French' Under Munch's Baton at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been maintaining a high average of excellence during its Brooklyn concerts this season, and last night's program at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Charles Munch, was one of the most exciting that this conductor has given us—at least as far as the French music was concerned.

The only non-French work was Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat Major ("With the Drum Roll"), which opened the program. It was cleanly played throughout its four movements, but only in the last two did we feel that the conductor had grasped the spirit of the music. The first two movements were rather too straightforward and lacking in expression—in fact, they almost sounded perfunctory. The robust Menuetto and vivacious Finale, however, were infused with more of the lightness, charm and good humor which this music demands.

Then came Ravel's iridescent "Rapsodie Espagnole," which was given one of the most exquisite performances we can remember ever having heard. Being a Frenchman himself, M. Munch remembered that this suite was a Frenchman's impression of Spanish music, even though that Frenchman was born almost on the Spanish border. His reading had a Gallic transparency and logic from beginning to end. There was ample sensuousness, but the interpretation was never allowed to become cheaply sentimental. Most of the excitement was appropriately saved for the final section in which the conductor whipped up an exciting climax.

But most of the excitement was saved for the "Fantastic Symphony" of Hector Berlioz, the work with which the concert concluded. As we stated earlier this season, this intensely romantic symphony, important though it may be historically, has now become somewhat "old hat," and it is difficult for a conductor to make it breathe as it must have in days gone by. M. Munch is the exception. The very first season he appeared in this country, he established a name for himself with his interpretation of this work, and his reading has never lost its punch.

Last night he caused everyone to sit up and take notice as he made every phrase vibrate with new life and new interest. We noted numerous variations in tempi and other liberties with the score. Few symphonies can withstand such treatment; but once again, this is the exception. Perhaps the most notable example of his flexibility was in the slow movement—the "Scene in the Fields"—with its effective dialogue between the two shepherds, portrayed by the oboe and English horn.

But this dialogue occurs only at the beginning of the movement, while at the end, the song of the English horn is answered, not by the oboe, but by an unremitting roll of thunder. In between these two sections is some fine lyrical writing which, by its length, can cause the listener's attention to wander. By injecting a note of tension in nearly every passage, however, the conductor was able to sustain the interest throughout, even making the movement seem almost too short. It takes a master interpreter to do that.

Another startling and effective feature of the performance was the use of large brass or iron bells in the last movement instead of the conventional orchestral chimes. We haven't checked Berlioz' original instructions, and it may be that it was for such bells that this imaginative orchestrator scored this section. Be that as it may, we have never heard them used in performances of the symphony before, but we shall miss them if they are not used in the future.

An experiment was tried at last evening's concert of having the orchestra seated on a flat stage instead of being elevated on risers. On the whole, we would say that, so far as the Academy is concerned, this is a wise move. Though the woodwinds did not come through as clearly as they might, the brasses were not blaring at us with such force, and the overall balance seemed better.

The usual capacity audience was on hand, and it showed by its enthusiasm that it thoroughly enjoyed the concert. So did we.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 21 1951

Boston Symphony Heard In 3 Familiar Works

Three familiar works, one of them Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," held over from Wednesday's program, were performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The Ravel composition was preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat, "The Drum Roll," and followed by Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The Berlioz Symphony for which Mr. Munch is justly celebrated as an extraordinary interpreter, was again discoursed in stirring fashion. The impassioned disclosure of the first movement, the grace and verve with which the waltz of the second movement were conveyed, the poetry with which the "Scene in the Meadows" was imbued and the sweeping imagination and incandescence which pervaded the concluding "Dream of a Witch's Sabbath" along with the Orchestra's virtuosity in realizing Mr. Munch's desires, were the principal attributes of this exciting unfolding of the French master's creation.

In Haydn's "Drum Roll" Symphony there was much to admire in the flawless adjustment of dynamic values and in the unerring taste with which this classic product was played. But it was in the French works that the conductor's gifts were most tellingly evidenced.

J. D. B.

[illegible]

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 1951

Boston Symphony Concert Presents Romantic Mood; Menuhin Scores as Soloist

By DOROTHY BETHURUM

Whether by accident or design the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at Palmer Auditorium was in mood and tone as far from a war-clouded world as music can get. It was Romanticism in its most undiluted form, and nothing could be more eloquent proof of the superb powers of the orchestra and of the gallantry of Charles Munch's directing than the response of the audience to a reading of experience nobody could now give.

For New London, the appearance of the Boston Symphony is the high point of the musical year. Last night excellence was added to excellence in the appearance of Yehudi Menuhin as soloist in the G minor Violin concerto of Bruch. This piece carried the burden of the romantic statement, for its virtues are those of uncomplicated melody and single orchestration. Both soloist and orchestra accepted its qualities for what they are, though Menuhin in his precise and powerful playing almost gave it a depth it does not have. Both in the first movement and in the Adagio his flawless performance evoked the last measure of Bruch's sweetness, never over-sentimentalizing it but never denying its genuine dependence on sentiment. The close of the Adagio brought the nostalgic charm of a pre-war world to its high point.

Perfect Rapport

Throughout the concerto Menuhin's virtuosity had full play. There was perfect rapport between soloist and orchestra, beautifully revealed, for example, in the blending of violin and flute in the second movement. The clarity of the brasses in the first movement and Munch's broad directing almost concealed the meretricious elements in the music, and Menuhin's brilliance in the Allegro made one overlook the monotony of theme and treatment. If the audience occasionally regretted that this superb playing was not exhibited on the Beethoven concerto or on some other more substantial work, this is not to deny the grace of Bruch.

Schumann's First Symphony, the Spring Symphony, was the major work on the program, romanticism at its most satisfying. It is not necessary to accept Schumann's own first programmatic designation of its movements as descriptive of spring—a scheme he later abandoned—to see in the whole of the symphony joyous affirmation; and the clarity of the opening trumpets and horns to the triumphant coda at the end, the orchestra brought to the playing the same sort of vitality that went into the writing of the symphony. Munch's firm control of dynamics in the first movement was revealed in the rich variations of stress. Richness and delicacy marked the Largetto; flutes, oboes, cellos and violas emphasized the lyricism of the theme, in fine contrast to the virility of the scherzo and the humor of the second trio. The charming arabesque of the last movement, echoed amusingly by the double basses, was done with absolute precision. Most beautiful in the movement was the cadenza for the flute, the perfect expression of the lyricism of the symphony in fine contrast to the energetic coda at the end.

This is the place to remark upon the musicianship of Georges Laurent, the first flautist, who not only in his solo part in the symphony, but throughout the concert was in perfect control of this instrument, and contributed some of the best effects of the evening.

Saint-Saens' Overture

The concert opened with Saint-Saens' overture to La Princese Janue, an early romantic form of exoticism, though Parisian, not Japanese. It was one of the fine things about the orchestra that it needed no "warming up"; the first crisp notes of the overture were entirely in the right mood. The woodwinds were delicate and clear, the triangle vivid, and the whole done with the precision and brilliance which marked the entire concert. Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole followed the overture, the only composition not entirely in the mood of simple romanticism. The Rapsodie exhibits a more complicated skill in orchestration and a more sophisticated sense of rhythm than quite belongs in that school. Munch's reading of the score was both careful and brilliant. The steady tempo of the first part of the Prelude a la Nuit reinforced the haunting statement of the theme given by the strings and woodwinds. In the Malaguena [illegible] theme given first by the double basses exhibited both Ravel's fine sense of contrast and the accuracy of the strings. The transition to the melody of flute and oboe was handled with a sure sense of delicacy and style. The third movement, Habanera, perhaps the slightest of the four, gave the orchestra an admirable opportunity for variety in rhythm and tonal qualities which Munch exploited to the full. In the fourth movement, the Feria, all the color of the composition appears, in variations of melody and movement handled with the flexibility of assured mastery. Full justice was done to every statement of the theme—by flute, English horn, and clarinet—and the full and rich tone of the trumpets, with the controlled movement of the whole orchestra brought the Rapsodie to a brilliant close.

Unity of Feeling

The program last night was remarkable for its unity of feeling throughout. Nowhere were the depths touched. We missed both the grandeur of the great masters and the complexities of modern music. Yet Munch revealed to us the possibilities of this clear and uninhibited romanticism, re-invoking the powers of the late nineteenth century to savor experience and accept it. Perhaps he could have played no timelier music. When the problems of our present world become too much for us, it is well to recall the attitudes of a more forthright time. And the flawless playing of the orchestra, moulded into a single instrument, complex but unified, and the sheer beauty of Menuhin's tone astonish us again with the power of artistry to transcend most human evils.

It is not often that one can hear in New London a combination of such distinction as the Boston Symphony and Yehudi Menuhin. The concert will long remain one of the favors of fortune and of the Connecticut College series.

This review of the concert should not end without remarking upon the rare cooperation of the elements. Usually the Boston Symphony concert is accompanied by the worst that January winter can produce. Last night was atmospherically as clear and beautiful as the music, and perhaps we can take that for a good omen.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 20 1951

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Boston Symphony Excitingly 'French' Under Munch's Baton at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been maintaining a high average of excellence during its Brooklyn concerts this season, and last night's program at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Charles Munch, was one of the most exciting that this conductor has given us—at least as far as the French music was concerned.

The only non-French work was Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat Major ("With the Drum Roll"), which opened the program. It was cleanly played throughout its four movements, but only in the last two did we feel that the conductor had grasped the spirit of the music. The first two movements were rather too straightforward and lacking in expression—in fact, they almost sounded perfunctory. The robust Menuetto and vivacious Finale, however, were infused with more of the lightness, charm and good humor which this music demands.

Then came Ravel's iridescent "Rapsodie Espagnole," which was given one of the most exquisite performances we can remember ever having heard. Being a Frenchman himself, M. Munch remembered that this suite was a Frenchman's impression of Spanish music, even though that Frenchman was born almost on the Spanish border. His reading had a Gallic transparency and logic from beginning to end. There was ample sensuousness, but the interpretation was never allowed to become cheaply sentimental. Most of the excitement was appropriately saved for the final section in which the conductor whipped up an exciting climax.

But most of the excitement was saved for the "Fantastic Symphony" of Hector Berlioz, the work with which the concert concluded. As we stated earlier this season, this intensely romantic symphony, important though it may be historically, has now become somewhat "old hat," and it is difficult for a conductor to make it breathe as it must have in days gone by. M. Munch is the exception. The very first season he appeared in this country, he established a name for himself with his interpretation of this work, and his reading has never lost its punch.

Last night he caused everyone to sit up and take notice as he made every phrase vibrate with new life and new interest. We noted numerous variations in tempi and other liberties with the score. Few symphonies can withstand such treatment; but once again, this is the exception. Perhaps the most notable example of his flexibility was in the slow movement—the "Scene in the Fields"—with its effective dialogue between the two shepherds, portrayed by the oboe and English horn.

But this dialogue occurs only at the beginning of the movement, while at the end, the song of the English horn is answered, not by the oboe, but by an unremitting roll of thunder. In between these two sections is some fine lyrical writing which, by its length, can cause the listener's attention to wander. By injecting a note of tension in nearly every passage, however, the conductor was able to sustain the interest throughout, even making the movement seem almost too short. It takes a master interpreter to do that.

Another startling and effective feature of the performance was the use of large brass or iron bells in the last movement instead of the conventional orchestral chimes. We haven't checked Berlioz' original instructions, and it may be that it was for such bells that this imaginative orchestrator scored this section. Be that as it may, we have never heard them used in performances of the symphony before, but we shall miss them if they are not used in the future.

An experiment was tried at last evening's concert of having the orchestra seated on a flat stage instead of being elevated on risers. On the whole, we would say that, so far as the Academy is concerned, this is a wise move. Though the woodwinds did not come through as clearly as they might, the brasses were not blaring at us with such force, and the overall balance seemed better.

The usual capacity audience was on hand, and it showed by its enthusiasm that it thoroughly enjoyed the concert. So did we.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 21 1951

Boston Symphony Heard In 3 Familiar Works

Three familiar works, one of them Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," held over from Wednesday's program, were performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The Ravel composition was preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E flat, "The Drum Roll," and followed by Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The Berlioz Symphony for which Mr. Munch is justly celebrated as an extraordinary interpreter, was again discoursed in stirring fashion. The impassioned disclosure of the first movement, the grace and verve with which the waltz of the second movement were conveyed, the poetry with which the "Scene in the Meadows" was imbued and the sweeping imagination and incandescence which pervaded the concluding "Dream of a Witch's Sabbath" along with the Orchestra's virtuosity in realizing Mr. Munch's desires, were the principal attributes of this exciting unfolding of the French master's creation.

In Haydn's "Drum Roll" Symphony there was much to admire in the flawless adjustment of dynamic values and in the unerring taste with which this classic product was played. But it was in the French works that the conductor's gifts were most tellingly evidenced.

J. D. B.

[222]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
JAN 16 1951

First American Appearance of Michèle Auclair

By Margaret Taylor

When Michèle Auclair, pretty, 21-year-old French violinist, made her first American appearance recently at Symphony Hall, Boston, she had on stage with her a past master at première performances. Tucked firmly under her chin was the famous "Brodsky" violin on which Adolf Brodsky played the world première of the Tschaikowsky Violin Concerto in Vienna in 1881, and later the American première at Carnegie Hall, New York.

* * *

On this occasion, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, Miss Auclair put this same violin through the difficult paces of that same concerto. But audience reaction was certainly not the same as at that first performance in Vienna. Outright antagonism and disapproval in Vienna (directed toward the too "new" music rather than the performer) gave way in Boston to real enthusiasm and very evident approval. As far as her first American audience is concerned (and incidentally her first American critics), Miss Auclair has a bright future ahead of her and a right to carry on the tradition of "firsts" with the "Brodsky" violin.

* * *

A slight, blonde-haired girl, Miss Auclair looks, off-stage, like anything but a serious artist, if the notion that artists must be gloomy-browed and intense is still popular. On stage, however, she is all concentration and music is the primary factor of her being.

This was not Miss Auclair's first performance with Mr. Munch, for in Paris, where she studied at the Conservatory, she played with him at the time he was Director of the Société Concert. Into her short span of years she has already crowded numerous recitals and performances with leading orchestras throughout Europe and more recently in South America. In Geneva, after receiving First Prize in the International Music Contest, she was soloist with Ernest Ansermet and L'Orchestre Philharmonic.

Miss Auclair comes by her artistic ability legitimately, though becoming a musician was apparently her own idea. Her father is a well-known painter in Paris and her grandfather a collector of paintings. However, she herself, at the age of six, who decided to become a violinist and she has devoted herself to serious study ever since.

Michèle Auclair

* * *

Although Miss Auclair has been in this country for only two months, studying in New York and concertizing whenever she has had the opportunity, she finds America very much to her liking and this despite a still rather shaky knowledge of English.

She says she came to the United States with a preconceived idea of its size, the tall buildings and large cities (which must have seemed doubly so to a diminutive French girl). But she has been greatly impressed by cultural advantages in the United States, the number of schools and teachers, the fine symphony orchestras, the opportunities for young people. While her plans are to return to her home in Paris in the spring, she hopes to come back to this country again soon.

* * *

Since 1949, Miss Auclair has been under the artistic guidance of Theodore Pashkus, who "discovered" her (at Miss Auclair's insistence) when he was in Paris with Yehudi Menuhin. Miss Auclair heard he was in Paris and determined to obtain an interview with Mr. Pashkus in order to hear his opinion of her playing. Proof of his confidence in her ability lies in the fact that she has been studying with him ever since.

It's not often that a person so young has been able to accomplish as much as has Miss Auclair. Concerts, recordings, radio programs all are neatly interspersed throughout her experience. A rare combination of talent, ambition and a propensity for good hard work, nicely augmented by true charm and graciousness, answer for her past success. And the future promises to be even brighter.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 21 1951

FROM THE MAIL POUCH

Koussevitzky Appeals for New Approach To Musical Fare on the Radio

To the Music Editor:

IT was heartening to read Olin Downes' article "Music and the Networks" and see the wide response it received from the radio audience.

Personally, I experienced the acute musical aridity of the radio; this was while vacationing in Arizona at Christmas time, and I could well join in the plea for a Christmas gift of good music and improved broadcast programs in the new year.

Formerly, even a year ago, I followed and felt the pulse of our musical life from my winter retreat in the Southwest, listening in to broadcasts by the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and the N.B.C. Orchestras. Now, with the one and only exception of a twenty-minute broadcast by the N. B. C. Orchestra, I searched vainly for a symphony concert on my dial for a period of three weeks, and I lived isolated from music, exasperated by the programs presented hour after hour and day after day by our leading radio stations.

Mr. Downes, in his admirable article, defines this deplorable situation and exposes the live nerve that not alone torments the ears, minds and hearts of thousands, if not millions of Americans, but also affects and undermines our cultural standing and standards.

In the past decades, we musicians put our hopes in the radio as the far-reaching means of contact and cultural communication between our big centers and the widespread population of America. We expected radio to bring important symphony concerts and great masterpieces of music to the homes of the people and, through music, to improve the taste, knowledge and general artistic level of the public.

It is profoundly disappointing to witness that the progress of the radio, if any, has been merely technical, that radio has become an industry, that its mechanical and commercial ends have outweighed its educational and artistic destination, and that its cultural significance is shockingly regressing. The responsibility for this incapacity of radio to fill the demands of life, time and the public rests on those who control and direct its policies, as Mr. Downes justly points out.

Europe

It may be enlightening to review the radio activities in Europe. With lesser financial and technical means, some European countries exploit radio possibilities extensively and far more effectively. Thus the Government-sponsored "Radio Diffusion" in Paris, directed by means of fine intellect, though strictly limited by budget, carries on a carefully prepared plan on an educational and artistic basis.

In England an outstanding example is given by the so-called Third Program of the B. B. C. This program introduces all that is important, new, stimulating and educational in the world of music, drama, lectures, etc. Its evolutionary approach has proved to be rewarding: the Third Program is not only the most progressive in England but also most popular with the British audiences.

May the effort and achievement of our European neighbors serve as an encouragement to us to correct our methods and to re-discover the value of cultural dissemination and radiation through a medium that becomes dangerous when misused, but which possesses vital and superior powers yet to be used for the benefit of men.

We still believe in the radio as the unsurpassed miracle of the captured waves of sound.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

New York.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 21 1951

MUNCH CONDUCTS BERLIOZ SYMPHONY

Directs Boston Orchestra in 'Fantastique' and Works by Ravel and Haydn

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, concluded the program with his famous interpretation of Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," in which, in this writer's opinion, he is unmatched among present-day orchestra leaders. By so much, alone, would the concert have been emphatically a success. But Mr. Munch reached exceptional heights in two other works, the one by a classic master, the other by a composer of the modern period, though he has only recently gone to his rest. The first composer was Haydn of the "drum-roll" symphony. The second was Maurice Ravel, in the instance of his "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

To go backwards step by step along the program's progress, the playing of Ravel's famous masterpiece was something specifically Mr. Munch's own, and most imaginative and distinguished. The "Spanish Rhapsody" is one of the masterpieces of modern instrumentation and Spanish color. Interpreted by a skillful virtuoso leader, it is certain to sound effective and unusual. But Mr. Munch does much more, when he conducts this work, than exploit the virtuoso capacities of one of the greatest orchestras in the world. He plays not the glittering, coruscating outside of the music. He interprets it from inside; he finds its soul.

Colors Appropriate to Spain

This music is brutal and sensuous, among other things. It can confront us, on the one hand, with the flaring explosive brilliancy of the music of the Fair, or it can give, incomparably, the spectral atmosphere of the "Prelude à la nuit," and the ghost-ridden "Habanera." The colors are amazing—as spiritually appropriate for Ravel's fantasy of Spain, as Ravel's transcription of Mussorgsky "Pictures from the Exposition," is of the completely Russian quality of Mussorgsky. And these tone colors, in the "Spanish Rhapsody," are not merely exotic impressions of a distant clime; they have, as it were, a different psychological twist.

The music is stately and sad, or intensely amorous, or desperately gay, as the case may be. Its happiness, as Nietzsche said of Bizet's music for "Carmen," is "short, sudden, and without forgiveness." And Mr. Munch conveyed this, powerfully, subtly, in a way for which we believe Ravel, had he been alive, and who with all his popularity is none too thoroughly understood, would have profoundly rendered thanks. This was virtuoso performance of another kind than just sounding the notes. What said the good gray poet? Something to the effect, that it is not the sounds alone which move you, but that of which you are reminded by the instruments.

No Formalist in Symphony

It was good, very good, also, to hear the familiar Haydn symphony done with such feeling for its classic style and instrumental proportions, but also for its inwardness. For Haydn is by no means a mere formalist in this symphony. It seems to contrast two different emotional states, almost throughout, and to observe unusual emotional as well as thematic correspondences.

The dark brooding phrase, which is heard at once in the introduction, does not only return, most dramatically and portentously, in the midst of the fast main body of the movement, but it enters into the texture and the development of the entire section. The gay dance tune affords contrasts but does not dismiss this fundamentally foreboding nature of the music.

The slow movement also has a Janus face. The theme or themes, which are varied, appear first in major, then in minor, and so all in alternation through the whole movement, ending poetically in the major. Here, too, is music which is not simply melodious pattern-making in masterful style.

The whole concert was on the highest level and done with all the resources of a great orchestra and the afflatus of a great artist inspired in his task.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 22 1951

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Wednesday

The next "open rehearsal" of the Boston Symphony will be held on Wednesday night, this week, instead of the customary Thursday night. The conductor will be Pierre Monteux, once music director of the Boston Symphony, who will rehearse Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," a work which is introduced in Paris. The rehearsal, open to college and high school subscribers, and to the general public so long as the tickets last, will begin at 7:30.

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Wednesday (1/22/51)

The next "open rehearsal" of the Boston Symphony will be held on Wednesday night, this week, instead of the customary Thursday night. The conductor will be Pierre Monteux, once music director of the Boston Symphony, who will rehearse Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," a work which is introduced in Paris. The rehearsal, open to college and high school subscribers, and to the general public so long as the tickets last, will begin at 7:30.

Pierre Monteux Returns as Guest Conductor of Symphony

Pierre Monteux, returning to Boston to lead the orchestra which was his in the years 1919-1924, will take the Boston Symphony concerts next Tuesday evening, Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

His program for Cambridge will consist of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's's Fourth Symphony and the Third Symphony of Brahms. For the remaining three concerts, he will present the Overture of Wagner, Beethoven Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Mr. Monteux gave the world premiere of this historic piece in Paris in 1913 and introduced it to Boston and New York in 1924. He has also conducted it in San Francisco where he has been the notable leader of the orchestra for many years. Immediately after his week of concerts here he will return to San Francisco to resume his duties with his own orchestra.

A week from Tuesday, Jan. 30, Charles Munch will return to conduct the fifth concert of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall. His program will consist of Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

PIERRE MONTEUX, once the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, returns to Boston to conduct four concerts this week.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 21 51

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A musical event of more than usual interest will be the appearances this week, and part of next, of Pierre Monteux as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony. To be sure, we had him with us in May, 1947, as leader of his own orchestra, the San Francisco Symphony, which he has directed since 1935. But he has not led ours since he concluded his five-year term as its conductor, nearly 27 years ago.

* * *

When he took leave of us there were those who thought he might return, as did Gericke and Muck, both of whom had two terms. But they were unaware of the nature of his successor and of the hold that he was to have over the public, the bulk of the press and those practical men of affairs, the trustees, who were to give him a contract without a date line. Symphony conductors had come and gone; five years was an average term. But Koussevitzky changed all that. Had he felt equal to conducting even a bare majority of the concerts he would still be with us.

* * *

There were also those who felt that Monteux had been gypped, that he was entitled to an extension of his term of service, then and there. He had guided the orchestra, already crippled by a war that found it full of "enemy aliens," through a crisis, the strike of 1920, that deprived it of even more of its members. Yet starting afresh with a two-thirds membership he filled up the ranks, largely with local players, and before he was through had the satisfaction of hearing out-of-town critics describe the orchestra as being its old self again. To these protesters it seemed, and with good reason, that he, not a newcomer, should be the one to enjoy the fruits of these labors. I am afraid they were right. Monteux did not get a square deal.

* * *

More than that, the propaganda that marked Koussevitzky's final years tended to rob Monteux of the credit that was rightfully his: The orchestra, it maintained, that Koussevitzky took over was no orchestra at all, nor had it ever amounted to very much. He alone among its conductors was really hospitable to new music or gave any substantial encouragement to the native muse. The falsity of these claims has been demonstrated in these columns, with thorough documentation, and there is no need of going into it all over again. It is a matter, not of opinion, but of record.

* * *

Mr. Monteux will conduct the regular Friday-Saturday pair and the concert of next Sunday afternoon, offering at all three Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." He will also conduct the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, a week from Tuesday, repeating the Wagner and Beethoven items but substituting Brahms' Third Symphony for Stravinsky's "Rite." Wagner's Overture, unheard at the regular concerts since 1941, is the one part of his early opera with which Boston is at all familiar. The Metropolitan has given the work an elaborate revival this year and the recent broadcast revealed a wealth of attractive music. Unfortunately, we are not to hear it when the Met comes to us in April so must accept Monteux' version of the overture as a consolation prize.

* * *

The high point of the Boston program is Stravinsky's revolutionary ballet of Pagan Russia. It was Monteux who introduced it here, in its concert form, in 1924. More than that, it was he who conducted the Paris premiere of 1913, one of the stormiest "first times" in the entire history of music. "The public," wrote Jean Cocteau 13 years later, "played the role that it had to play. It laughed, spat, hissed, imitated animal cries. They might have eventually tired themselves of that had it not been for the crowd of esthetes and a few musicians, who, carried away by excess of zeal, insulted and even pushed the public off the boxes. The riot degenerated into a fight. Standing in her box, her diadem askew, the old Countess de Pourtales brandished her fan and shouted, all red in the face: 'It is the first time in 60 years that anyone has dared to make a fool of me!'"

Jan Peerce, Metropolitan Opera tenor, who sings in Jordan Hall next Sunday.

* * *

You will find all that, and more, in Slonimsky's "Music Since 1900." You will also find a poem written by an outraged Bostonian that begins, "Who wrote this hendish 'Rite of Spring,' What right had he to write the thing," and that ends, "He who could write the 'Rite of Spring' If I be right, by right should swing." The Boston audience, by the way, did not hiss; it even applauded. In his last month Mr. Monteux repeated the piece, but after the concert-proper had run its course, thereby pleasing those who wished to hear it again and placating those who threatened to discontinue their subscriptions if another performance occurred. Though it ushered in a new epoch in music, and a formidable one, "Le Sacre" seems harmless enough today. It even accompanied the cavortings of Walt Disney's prehistoric reptiles in "Fantasia," a movie designed for popular consumption. While Monteux is in town he and the orchestra will record it for Victor.

* * *

The Israel Philharmonic will give a second concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon, under the direction of Eleazar de Carvalho. With Madeleine Meredith as accompanist, Madeleine Brooks Norcross, mezzo-soprano, will give a recital in Brown Hall this afternoon. The entire program will be sung in English.

* * *

The Griller Quartet will play at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening and Jan Pearce, tenor, will sing there next Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 23 1951

(AP Photo)
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WITH PREDECESSORS — Conductor Charles Munch (right), chats with Serge Koussevitzky (center), and Pierre Monteux as the three met at a concert by the Israel Philharmonic at Symphony Hall, conducted by Koussevitzky. Monteux led the famed Symphony from 1919 to 1924 with Koussevitzky taking over until 1949 when Munch took over.

(AP Photo)
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WITH PREDECESSORS — Conductor Charles Munch (right), chats with Serge Koussevitzky (center), and Pierre Monteux as the three met at a concert by the Israel Philharmonic at Symphony Hall, conducted by Koussevitzky. Monteux led the famed Symphony from 1919 to 1924 with Koussevitzky taking over until 1949 when Munch took over.

Jan. 22, 1951
Boston Globe

ISRAEL SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA was honored at a supper following their second appearance in Boston last night. Seated are Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor emeritus of the Boston orchestra. Both men have been guest conducters of the Israel Orchestra. Standing, left to right, are four composers and Israel orchestra members Menahem Avidom, Josef Kaminski, H. U. Boskevich, and Odeon Partos.

[224]

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, DIENSTAG, den 23. JANUAR 1951

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von FRED LOW

Charles Munch dirigiert Boston Symphony

Charles Munch dirigierte die Konzertserie des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters Mittwoch abend und Samstag nachmittag in der Carnegie Hall. Er brachte im Mittwoch-Konzert die New Yorker Erstaufführung der fünften Symphonie des amerikanischen Komponisten Peter Mennin, die Ouvertüre zu "La Princesse Jaune" von Saint-Saens, "Rapsodie Espagnole" von Ravel und Schumanns erste Symphonie.

Peter Mennin kommt aus Erie, Pennsylvania, er ist dort 1923 geboren und zeigt in seinen Werken trotz seiner Jugend die sichere Hand des erfahrenen Komponisten. Er hat zahlreiche Wettbewerbe gewonnen und die fünfte Symphonie im Auftrag des Dallas Symphonie-Orchesters geschrieben, das auch vor wenigen Wochen die Premiere des Werkes veranstaltete. Die Partitur läßt Sinn für Orchesterklang, Erfindung und Geschmack erkennen; an einigen Stellen ist der Einfluß der Musik Wagners auf den jungen Komponisten zu bemerken, der Charakter des Werkes bleibt aber immer originell und die Symphonie ist mehr als eine Talentprobe, sie ist bereits Erfüllung. Die Passagen des ersten und dritten Satzes sind flüssig geschrieben, die Melodien des langsamen Satzes gesangsvoll. Charles Munch lieh dem Werk seine liebevolle Unterstützung, er war sorgfältig bemüht, alle Nuancen zu bester Geltung zu bringen.

In der brillanten Ouvertüre zur "Princesse Jaune" von Saint-Saens und der "Rapsodie Espagnole" von Ravel ist die Interpretation des Dirigenten geistvoll und wird den Schönheiten und der Farbenpracht der Musik in jeder Hinsicht gerecht. Das Orchester spielte hervorragend, der Streicherklang kam in Schumanns romantischer Symphonie No. 1 zu allerbester Geltung.

Der Höhepunkt der Konzertserie war aber die Wiedergabe der "Symphonie Fantastique" von Berlioz Samstag nachmittag. Das Werk wurde erst vor kurzem in einer Veranstaltung des Philadelphia Orchesters gespielt, der Vergleich der Interpretation ist interessant. Charles Munch läßt die grandiosen Effekte in den Bläserstellen noch mehr hervortreten, die Kontraste zu den pastoralen Melodien erscheinen prachtvoll, der Walzer des zweiten Satzes ist rhythmisch und dynamisch glanzvoll und der "Marche des Supplices" läßt die Feierlichkeit und Wildheit, die Brillanz und Gewalt der Themen in hellstem Licht erstrahlen. Wenn sich im Finale ("Traum vom Hexensabbath") die parodierten Klänge des "Dies Irae" mit dem Tanz der Hexen vereinen und Charles Munch das Orchester zu leidenschaftlichem Spiel aufpeitscht, wird die Spannung beim Hörer auf den Gipfelpunkt getrieben. Die Musiker folgen jeder gewollten Nuance des Dirigenten, das Spiel ist in den Streichern und Bläsern von einer Einheitlichkeit, die nur sehr selten in diesem Grade wiederzufinden ist. — Im Programm war die Wiederholung der "Rapsodie Espagnole" aus dem Mittwoch-Konzert und eine prächtige Wiedergabe der Haydn Symphonie No. 103. Das Publikum feierte den Dirigenten und die Musiker begeistert.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 22 1951

Munch Gives Brilliant Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

If conductors have an affinity for certain works, then Charles Munch has completely taken over Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." I doubt whether any other conductor in the first half of this century ever created anything to equal his interpretation with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. In a word, it was fantastic.

All the adjectives of moviedom might be corralled to describe the intensity with which it was played. Yet however theatrical the performance, it was always artistic.

The musician never let the virtuoso get the upper hand though every bit of virtuosity that the Bostonians can boast was called into operation. No wonder the performance was "super-colossal."

The most impressive moments came in the subtle handling of places like the end of the "Scene in the Meadows," the hollow of "A Witches' Sabbath," the terrifying quality of the "March to the Scaffold." The work was beautifully and admirably played. The music more than came alive: it burst into full bloom.

That ability to mold the comprehension of detail into beautiful expression suffused Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole." The performance was a revelation of loveliness of tone, projection of mood, and mastery of orchestration. And the piece had meaning as Ravel's "diary" of a Spanish journey.

The same mastery which illumined Ravel and Berlioz shone through a performance of Haydn's "Drum Roll' Symphony No. 103, its classic line and its fine proportion perhaps disclosed where Munch derives his strength.

Without such superb control, he could not conduct with such impassioned intensity and emerge triumphant. That the orchestra responded so wonderfully is a tribute to their technical and musical achievement.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 23 1951

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor emeritus of Boston Symphony Orchestra (center), chats with two predecessors—Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of Boston Symphony (left) and Dr. Charles Munch, present conductor. Reunion was at banquet given by Boston Symphony for 100-piece Israel Philharmonic Orchestra after second Boston concert.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
JAN 22 1951

ORCHESTRA OF ISRAEL ENDS STAY

Philharmonic Makes Fine Impression in Hub Visit

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Izler Solomon conducting, the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra gave at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the second and final concert of this, it's first Boston visit.

FINE IMPRESSION

Mr. Solomon, whose own orchestra is (or lately was) the Columbus (O.) Philharmonic, had not previously appeared here and he made an excellent impression, particularly with his reading of the Second Symphony of Brahms, one of the finest expositions of the work in this reviewer's recollection.

Mr. Solomon, born in St. Paul, Minn., 41 years ago, is American trained, if the expression is applicable to one who is said to have been self-taught in the conducting art. Be that as it may, he knows his business.

First U. S. Director

A note in the program stated that he was the first American to direct the Israel Orchestra and was its permanent conductor throughout the war liberation. Mr. Solomon is short and slight of build with a shock of black hair.

He is a dynamic leader who uses a score but no baton, and, to judge from yesterday's concert, and particularly the Brahms, he has the gift of making music vital without distortion, without tampering with what we may presume to be the composer's intentions.

It was in the Symphony that Mr. Solomon had his first real opportunity yesterday, as it was also in the Symphony that the orchestra for the first time confirmed the excellent impression that it made under Koussevitzky the night before.

Mr. Solomon chose to start off the afternoon with two works which did not enlist the full strength of the band, C. P. E. Bach's D major Concerto, as arranged by Steinberg, an old Koussevitzky favorite, and Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" for strings.

Attractively Played

Attractively set forth, these two 18th century pieces were a bit too much alike to afford suitable contrast, and the next number, Marc Lavri's "Emek," proved entertaining enough but rather slight of substance.

Lavri has used what are plainly Palestinian themes and his music is reminiscent of other Near Eastern scores from Ippolitov-Ivanov to Khatchaturian. This is not such distinguished music as the two movements of Avidom's "David" Symphony that Koussevitzky showed us the night before.

These Palestinian composers, most of them of European origin, are forming a new school that should some day make its mark.

Unlike the preceding concert, that of yesterday, was not sold out and in the audience, which was large if not of capacity s... both Dr. Koussevitzky and ... cessor in Boston, Charl... This audience was pleased with the first part of the program, but ... performance of the Brahms evok... as well it might, real enthus... The visit of this admirable or... tra, like that of the London P... harmonic, has helped to mak... present season an eventful on...

BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
JAN 23 1951

Charles Munch, right, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, with former conductors of the famed Hub musical organization; Serge Koussevitsky, center, and Pierre Monteux. They met at Symphony Hall Israeli Philharmonic, conducted by Koussevitsky, in U. S.-Canada tour. Monteux conducted from '19-'24, then Koussevitsky took over until '49, when Munch became conductor.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 24 1951

Wonderful to Be Back, Monteux Says, but It's 10 Years Too Late

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux is back on the spot where he spent five years of his illustrious career. That is the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which he has returned as guest director for a week, upon the invitation of Charles Munch.

Nearly 27 years have passed since the French musician, small, stocky and bright-eyed, said goodby to his Boston public as the orchestra's regular conductor. Since then he has spent a decade in Holland and France, and for the past 15 years he has been conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

When Mr. Monteux left here he was 49; today he is 75. His walrus mustache is nearly white, but his curly hair, brushed straight back, is black as ever. And so in his spirit as quick and amiable as ever.

"Do you want to ask me how I feel to be back with the Boston Symphony?" he asked as I entered the conductor's room at Symphony Hall after rehearsal yesterday morning. "I will tell you. It feels wonderful, but I think it is 10 years too late. But 10 years ago Mr. Munch was not here to invite me.

"You know, I built this orchestra twice. The first time was in the Fall of 1918, after Dr. Muck had been arrested and the German players had been dismissed. Henri Rabaud was coming as regular conductor, but I was invited to conduct until he arrived. It took two months to rebuild the orchestra then. Later on, after I had become regular conductor, there was the strike, and 45 men did not return. Then I had to rebuild the orchestra a second time."

On his program for next Friday, Saturday and Sunday, Mr. Monteux will include a score with whose history he has had an intimate relationship: "The Rite of Spring," by Stravinsky.

"You know, I conducted the premiere of 'The Rite of Spring,' as a ballet, in Paris. I shall never forget the date of that premiere, which was May 29, 1913, because there was a famous scandal. People hooted, hissed and yelled. Some left the theatre. We gave four more performances, and then it was obvious that the people still did not like it.

"I said to Stravinsky: 'I don't know whether it is your music, or the dancing, or the scenery they didn't like. But how about playing it as pure concert music?' Stravinsky said: 'Yes, of course, it is really a concert piece!' So one year later, on April 5, 1914, I conducted 'The Rite of Spring' at a concert in the Casino de Paris. That time, far from a scandal, the people liked it.

"I am sure that if I had not persisted that way, 'The Rite' would have been finished. Now it has become a modern classic, for certainly anything that lasts 40 years is a classic. I later introduced 'The Rite' to Boston and New York, and although there was something of a lesser scandal, the public eventually accepted it. Now, for all its dissonance and its hard, driving rhythms, 'The Rite' is truly a classic."

PIERRE MONTEUX

Maine Wife Tells of School

Although Mr. Monteux regards most of his career as behind him, he is active in running a school for conductors every Summer on the family estate of his wife, (nee Doris Hodgkins), at Hancock, Me.

"Let me tell it, Pierre," interposed Mrs. Monteux, "because I run the school."

"Yes, she runs it. Let her tell the story," assented Mr. Monteux with a smile.

"It began in Paris in 1931, when I got the idea that all that Pierre had learned as a viola player under such conductors as Nikisch, Mottl, Richter, Levi and Mahler, and all that he had developed himself as a conductor should be passed on to young musicians. So we advertised for young musicians who wanted to learn conducting, and had an immediate response.

"When the war came and we could not return to Europe, the obvious thing was to transfer our school to our home in Hancock. For the past eight years we have had 55 student conductors, Mr. Monteux teaches 12 of them, and the rest study with his assistant, Joseph Barone.

"All these musicians play orchestral instruments themselves, so there is a practical orchestra to work with. They conduct each other, so to speak. Today we have two concert halls, one seating 600, the other 200."

"Yes, you see, my career is behind me. But I do feel that we must do everything we can to help along the younger man," added Mr. Monteux.

Monteux Returns to Symphony Hall—N

Conductor Recalls Première Of 'Le Sacre du Printemps'

Twenty-seven years ago today Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." While the first American performance did not fall to Mr. Monteux (Leopold Stokowski gave the American première with the Philadelphia Orchestra on March 3, 1922), it is well known that Mr. Monteux conducted the world première in Paris in 1913.

"Le Sacre du Printemps"—at the outset a cause scandaleuse which has long since become a cause célèbre—has been chosen by Mr. Monteux to highlight his guest appearances with the Boston Symphony this week end—on Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon. This engagement is Mr. Monteux's first with the Boston Symphony since he was its regular conductor from 1919 to 1924. For many years he has been and still is regular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

Last night Mr. Monteux rehearsed the "Rite" in Symphony Hall for the third open rehearsal of the season.

A famous array of anecdotes have been up about the first performance of the "Rite" in Paris. In Mr. Monteux is able to straighten some points.

While chatting with John Burk in Symphony Hall earlier this week, Mr. Monteux said that the musicians who came to him afterwards, excited by the strange sound of instrument at the beginning of the work, which he could not identify (the bassoon at the top of its register), were not Saint-Saëns but Alfred Bruneau. The venerable Saint-Saëns, arriving at the last moment, had been placed by Diaghilev in the exact chair in his box, sat hunched with his head in his hands, murmuring: "This is not music—it is madness!"

Mr. Monteux's recollections of the historic performance, published in the Dance Index for 1947, are as follows:

"My first meeting with Stravinsky took place in 1911 when I was guest conductor of the Diaghilev Ballet Russe. Stravinsky, outstanding among the new composers of the modern school, had just achieved his first success with 'L'Oiseau de Feu.' We met when I conducted the world première of his second ballet, 'Petrouchka.' 'Petrouchka' was an immense success. In the field of ballet many still consider it Stravinsky's masterpiece.

* * *

"One day in 1912, after I had become the regular conductor for the Ballet Russe, Diaghilev summoned me to a tiny rehearsal room in a theater of Monte Carlo where the Ballet was at that time appearing. We were to hear Stravinsky run through the score of his new work, 'Le Sacre du Printemps.'

"With only Diaghilev and myself as audience, Stravinsky sat down to play a piano reduction of the entire score. Before he got very far I was convinced he was raving mad. Heard this way, without the color of the orchestra which is one of its great distinctions, the crudity of the rhythm was emphasized, its stark primitiveness underlined. The very walls resounded as Stravinsky pounded away, occasionally stamping his feet and jumping up and down to accentuate the force of the music. Not that it needed such emphasis.

"I was more astounded by Stravinsky's performance than shocked by the score itself. My only comment at the end was that such music would surely cause a scandal. However, the same instinct that had prompted me to recognize his genius made me realize that in this ballet he was far, far in advance of his time and that while the public might not accept it, musicians would delight in the new, weird, though logical expression of dissonance.

"'Le Sacre du Printemps' was presented in 1913 at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris, and cause a scandal it certainly did. The audience remained quiet for the first two minutes. Then came boos and cat-calls from the gallery, soon after from the lower floors. Neighbors began to hit each other over the head with fists, canes, or whatever came to hand. Soon this anger was concentrated against the dancers, and then, more particularly, against the orchestra, the direct perpetrator of the musical crime. Everything available was tossed in our direction, but we continued to play on. The end of the performance was greeted by the arrival of the gendarmes. Stravinsky had disappeared through a window backstage, to wander disconsolate along the streets of Paris.

Lenscraft

Pierre Monteux opens the original edition of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" at a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will conduct this work Friday afternoon, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JAN 24 1951

Conductor and 'Alumni'

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor Charles Munch, right, chats with former conductors of the orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, center, and Pierre Monteux as the three met at a concert by the Israel Philharmonic conducted by Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall in Boston. Monteux led the famed Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924 with Koussevitzky taking over until 1949 when Munch took over. Koussevitzky will conduct several concerts by the Israel group while they are on tour in this country and Canada.

re Monteux and 'The Rite of Spring'

Conductor Acclaimed for Performance of Stravinsky Work

By Harold Rogers

What conductor could be better qualified to give the definitive reading of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" than Pierre Monteux? He conducted the world première in Paris in 1913. The initial performances in Boston, New York, and San Francisco were also under his conservative baton. The studied dissonances and asymmetric rhythms of the work have long since become part of his musical being. When Monteux conducts the "Rite," the listener can rest assured that the manifold problems have been solved.

Mr. Monteux's guest appearances this week mark the first time he has faced the Boston Symphony Orchestra since he was its regular conductor from 1919 to 1924. Besides the "Rite," his Symphony Hall program yesterday afternoon (to be repeated tonight and tomorrow afternoon) included Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

* * *

The idea of the "Rite" came to Stravinsky while in St. Petersburg some time in 1910. After he composed "Pétrouchka," also introduced by Monteux, he brought this idea into a realization that, considered as a single work, has been without equal as an influence over the subsequent course of contemporary music.

As Leonard Bernstein pointed out some time ago while analyzing the score of the "Rite" in his conducting class at Tanglewood, its appearance in 1913 was a signal to composers that the lid was off, the sky was the limit, that anything went. Many of these composers, intoxicated by what they thought was a new freedom, jumped on their horses and rode off in all directions. But Stravinsky's startling score was deceptive. "This was not the beginning of modern music," Mr. Bernstein said, "it was the end of impressionism."

* * *

For contrary to the initial impression made by the score—that Stravinsky had ignored all rules and broken all laws—there was an intuitive, creative intelligence at work in the music as logically and as formally as in a Debussy tone poem or a Ravel ballet.

Consider, for instance, some of Stravinsky's materials for the "Rite"—the pentatonic scale, the modes, the tritone—or some of his methods—fugal entries of individual melodies, bitonal harmonies, and rhythmic counterpoints. Many of these things go back to musical antiquity; hence their apt choice to express the elemental paganism of the story.

Stravinsky simply pursued the aims of impressionism to a logical ultimate. The effect is often that of chaos, but it is an ordered chaos, a chaos that happenstance could never produce. For if there were no intelligence manifest in the "Rite" it would long since have fallen from the repertoire. Whatever important place a piece may hold in history, that place alone is not sufficient to give it active life.

As Alexandre Tansman put it in his recent biography of Stravinsky: "It took some time to realize how little the 'Rite' tried to break laws, how small a place caprice occupied in a lucid and masterly realization, rigorously uncompromising in its application of a definite method.

"The composer, like an engineer or a magician, had created a universe of stone, which sang and moved of its own accord, but whose functioning he merely supervised and ordered with presence of mind and an infallible sense of logic."

* * *

Conducting as he did with no score, Mr. Monteux gave a performance yesterday that was not only a staggering feat of memory. As the panoramic sections passed before us, there was such a completely satisfying wholeness to his conception of the work, such a sense of rightness in every detail of a macrocosm of details, that we could justly call his reading definitive.

Mr. Monteux never resorts to acrobatics to achieve his effects. Like Fritz Reiner, his impassive face and torso give no indication of the wealth of emotion that pours from the music. It is a rare technique. All we saw was the conductor solidly fixed to the podium, taking each time-change coolly with a mathematically certain baton. We heard music of potency, sensuously moving, sharply defined. It was not smeared, mauled, twisted, or otherwise misshapen. This was a great performance.

Mr. Monteux conducted Wagner's rousing overture and Beethoven's lyrical symphony with the same clarity, imagination, and vigor. The reunion of Mr. Monteux with the Boston Symphony has indeed been auspicious and fruitful.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST JA

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Historic is the word for yesterday afternoon's concert and its forthcoming repetitions tonight and tomorrow afternoon. Pierre Monteux, whose five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony preceded the 25-year one of Serge Koussevitzky, has returned at the invitation of Charles Munch, to lead the orchestra as guest in this its 70th season.

How many of those who faced Mr. Monteux yesterday and rose spontaneously when he appeared on the platform remember him of yore may not be said. And only those whose attendance at the concerts goes back to the beginning of his term of service can be fully aware of what he did for the orchestra. In his own recent words, he built it twice. When he took it over its ranks had been depleted by a war and in his first year they were further and more seriously depleted by a strike. Though the latter has not always admitted it, the instrument he turned over to Koussevitzky was a splendid one.

Some of those players sat before Mr. Monteux yesterday but most of the faces in the present band could be described as new to him. In the course of four days of rehearsal he had them completely subservient to his will. Mr. Monteux, who looks very much as he did when he left us, conducts as he used to. Compared with his successors he is sparing of gesture. There can be plenty of excitement in the music, and in the playing of it, but it does not register in his outward demeanor.

His ear for tone and for tonal balance is as fine as it ever was—probably finer. And it may be remarked that he seated the orchestra as it has not been seated since his day, with the second violins on his right and the violas behind them. The sound of it yesterday was gratifying to the ear. Everything could be heard and in the right relationship to everything else.

The afternoon began with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and continued with the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven. Both works were set forth with the utmost lucidity. The Overture was stirring, the Symphony classic in the truest sense. In both scores there could also have been a little more poetizing. The climax of the concert, and of the Symphony season to date, came with the performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which Mr. Monteux conducted in its stormy Paris premiere of 1913, and introduced to Boston 11 years later. This once-revolutionary score has itself become a classic, one of the landmarks of music. Its imitators have been legion but it towers above their efforts, as such musical milestones always do. Here in a nutshell was the whole gospel of modernity. Mr. Monteux's grasp of this music is profound, his power to communicate it absolute. This was a performance never to be forgotten, and it aroused the enthusiasm that was its due.

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
JAN 25 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR WITH PREDECESSORS — Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Charles Munch (right), chats with former conductors of the orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky (center) and Pierre Monteux as the three met at a concert by The Israel Philharmonic at Symphony Hall, Boston, recently conducted by Koussevitzky Monteux led the famed Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924 with Koussevitzky taking over until 1949 when Munch took over. Koussevitzky will conduct several concerts by the Israel group while they are on tour in this country and Canada. Monteux is a summer resident of Hancock. (Associated Press photo.)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
JAN 27 1951

MUSIC

Pierre Monteux, Guest Conductor of Symphony, Plays "Rite of Spring"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 27 years had passed since he had left that stage as the orchestra's regular conductor, but in the audience were many who had sat before him then. They promptly rose in greeting and stood applauding, as Mr. Monteux first appeared. Others soon followed and a graceful gesture on the part of old friends became a general tribute to one of the first-rank technicians among all conductors.

The program, which Mr. Monteux will repeat tonight and tomorrow afternoon, contained music by two of his three favorite composers: "The Flying Dutchman" Overture, by Wagner, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. (His third favorite is Brahms). But what some of us younger ones were waiting for was that huge and cruelly difficult score of Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." This Mr. Monteux had introduced to Boston exactly 27 years and one day before, and 11 years previous to Jan. 25, 1924, he had given the premiere of the work as a ballet in Paris.

Everyone knows the scandal it caused in 1913, and the considerable amount of disapproval it raised when new here (although there were a good many who liked it at first hearing.) Yesterday a few elderly people walked out between the two sections, and some others vented their ire in more or lesss harsh words. But for the big majority, "The Rite" was enormously satisfying, and especially so in Mr. Monteux' performance. There was round after round of cheers.

I doubt that anyone can conduct "The Rite" so well as Mr. Monteux. He has the whole score in his head (the Wagner and Beethoven, too, for that matter) and he makes it sound like music. I have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's more tonally opulent version, and Leonard Bernstein's more nervous and jumpy version, but never had I heard those driving rhythms, with their complicated accents, come out with such controlled but powerful effect. Nor had I ever heard so many details so clearly in "The Rite."

Mr. Monteux could have played it faster and louder, as others have done, but his special knowledge of this score, and his fabulous accuracy with the changing rhythmic meters, count for much more than speed and ardor. This performance was a long double crescendo of tension released only by the final crisp chords at the end of each section. Such a reading is not only a triumph of the conducting art, but it also helps to reinforce one's conviction that Stravinsky never wrote a finer or more distinctive work than "The Rite."

With Beethoven as with Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux was completely in the vein. Nothing too fast, nothing too slow, no extreme of dynamics. The "long line" of Beethoven's structure was there, and although no detail was slighted, everything was subordinated to proper style and a conception of the Symphony as a whole. If Mr. Monteux' gestures were relaxed, so was his interpretation. Wagner's Overture received the same treatment. Thus out of thorough understanding, out of technical authority and an instinct for good taste came eloquence moving, unflawed and stirring.

Incidentally, Mr. Monteux has changed the seating of the orchestra back to the classical plan, of first violins at the left, front, and seconds on the right; cellos behind first violins, and violas on the other side.

[827]

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
JAN 26 1951

JAN 26 1951

Open Rehearsal — a Symphony of Informality

All photos, Edward P. Harding

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Conducts an Open Rehearsal in Symphony Hall

Boston Orchestra Brings World of Music to People

By a Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the few American ensembles—if not the only one—whose concerts are fully subscribed well in advance of the season, it was almost impossible in years past for large numbers of students to obtain seats.

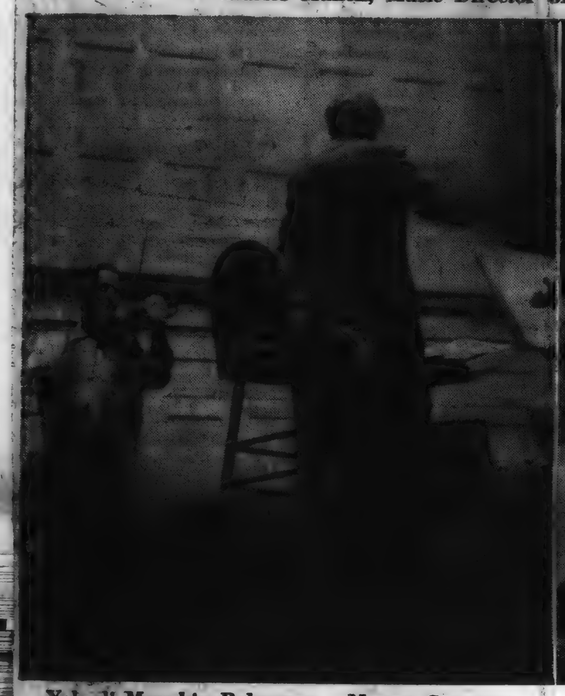
But this season Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director, corrected this dilemma by inaugurating a new series primarily for students, though the general public is invited to attend. The series consists of five midweek evening rehearsals, three of which already have been held with great success. Tickets are moderately priced; proceeds go to the orchestra's pension fund.

For these open rehearsals listeners gather informally (there are no reserved seats) for an evening of music that generally runs longer than an actual concert. There are interruptions when Mr. Munch corrects a part or improves a passage. His humor adds zest to the occasion, as when he sometimes identifies the instruments to the audience by shouting over his shoulder.

The candid photographs on this page were taken at the inaugural program of the series. Yehudi Menuhin appeared in casual sport clothes to rehearse Mozart's Concerto in D major, K. 271A. For the second open rehearsal Aldo Ciccolini, young Italian pianist now making his first tour of America, was heard in Tchaikovsky's First Concerto in B-flat minor.

Pierre Monteux, regular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, is in Boston this week to make four guest appearances with the Boston Symphony. It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux headed the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924.

H. R.



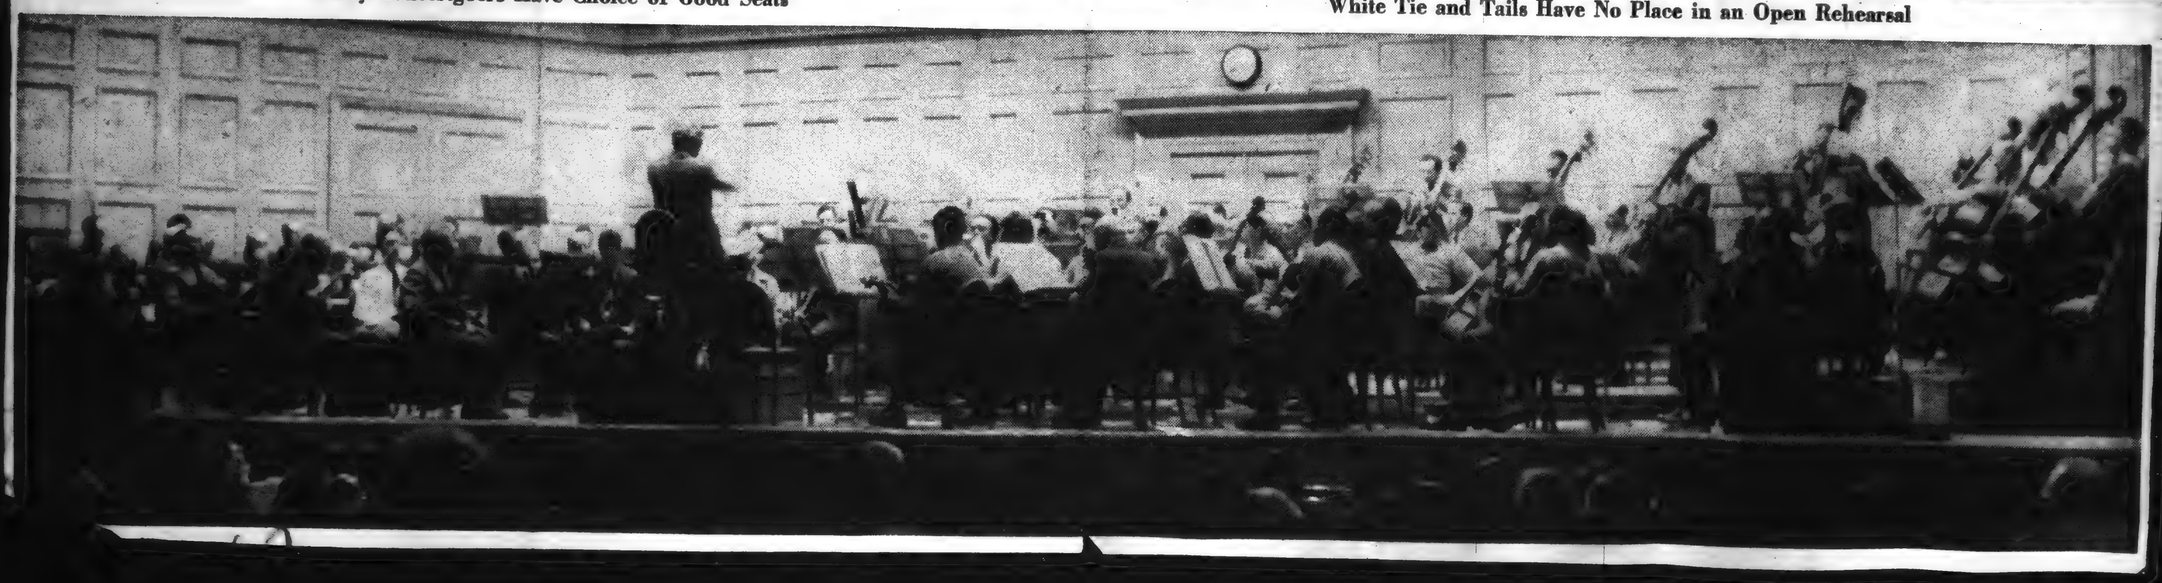
Yehudi Menuhin Rehearses a Mozart Concerto

Student Audience Looks and Listens With Close Attention

Informal Portrait of an Informal Conductor

Early Concertgoers Have Choice of Good Seats

White Tie and Tails Have No Place in an Open Rehearsal



This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 27 1951

MUSIC

Pierre Monteux, Guest Conductor of Symphony, Plays "Rite of Spring"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 27 years had passed since he had left that stage as the orchestra's regular conductor, but in the audience were many who had sat before him then. They promptly rose in greeting and stood applauding, as Mr. Monteux first appeared. Others soon followed and a graceful gesture on the part of old friends became a general tribute to one of the first-rank technicians among all conductors.

The program, which Mr. Monteux will repeat tonight and tomorrow afternoon, contained music by two of his three favorite composers: "The Flying Dutchman" Overture, by Wagner, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. (His third favorite is Brahms). But what some of us younger ones were waiting for was that huge and cruelly difficult score of Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." This Mr. Monteux had introduced to Boston exactly 27 years and one day before, and 11 years previous to Jan. 25, 1924, he had given the premiere of the work as a ballet in Paris.

Everyone knows the scandal it caused in 1913, and the considerable amount of disapproval it raised when new here (although there were a good many who liked it at first hearing.) Yesterday a few elderly people walked out between the two sections, and some others vented their ire in more or lesss harsh words. But for the big majority, "The Rite" was enormously satisfying, and especially so in Mr. Monteux' performance. There was sound after round of cheers.

I doubt that anyone can conduct "The Rite" so well as Mr. Monteux. He has the whole score in his head (the Wagner and Beethoven, too, for that matter) and he makes it sound like music. I have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's more tonally opulent version, and Leonard Bernstein's more nervous and jumpy version, but never had I heard those driving rhythms, with their complicated accents, come out with such controlled but powerful effect. Nor had I ever heard so many details so clearly in "The Rite."

Mr. Monteux could have played it faster and louder, as others have done, but his special knowledge of this score, and his fabulous accuracy with the changing rhythmic meters, count for much more than speed and ardor. This performance was a long double crescendo of tension released only by the final crisp chords at the end of each section. Such a reading is not only a triumph of the conducting art, but it also helps to reinforce one's conviction that Stravinsky never wrote a finer or more distinctive work than "The Rite."

With Beethoven as with Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux was completely in the vein. Nothing too fast, nothing too slow, no extreme of dynamics. The "long line" of Beethoven's structure was there, and although no detail was slighted, everything was subordinated to proper style and a conception of the Symphony as a whole. If Mr. Monteux' gestures were relaxed, so was his interpretation. Wagner's Overture received the same treatment. Thus out of thorough understanding, out of technical authority and an instinctive good taste came eloquence mellow, unflawed and stirring.

Incidentally, Mr. Monteux had changed the seating of the orchestra back to the classical plan of first violins at the left, front, and seconds on the right; cellos behind first violins, and violas on the other side.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 27 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 14th program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall. The program:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Op. 60 ..... Beethoven
Le Sacre du Printemps ..... Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What a superb musician, what a master is this Pierre Monteux!

He made an outrageously belated return to Boston yesterday afternoon to demonstrate beyond a question of a doubt, that he ranks with the very greatest conductors of our time. He demonstrated also why this distinction has been denied him by the public at large all these years, but no matter: his true stature in the world of music is the special comprehension of the truly musical, and he need have no concern for history's final judgment.

The reason this man, who for five years ending in 1924 was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not fully appreciated is that he can conduct an orchestra and make it sound gloriously without disturbing a lock of his shaggy mane. As it happens this sort of conducting went out of fashion with the button shoe. Whole generations have been reared on virtuoso conductors who combine the beauty of a collar model with the athletic prowess of a pole vaulter.

Here to Stay

This is not to say the virtuoso conductors are on the wrong tack; on the contrary they have doubtless done more to catch the imagination of the general public—and swell the box office receipts—than the time beaters ever could. No; the virtuoso is here to stay. He is the mirror of the times, and his achievements interpretatively are of incalculable significance. Yet how refreshing, how stimulating, how interesting to have in Monteux a man who lets the composer do all the talking!

In the Fourth Symphony it was Beethoven who spoke. Monteux, who stood immobile on the conductor's stand and traced, with exquisite sensitivity, the measures and nuances of the music, merely preserved the meaning and the intentions of that voice. It was, in such circumstances, a voice from the past; not as powerful and compelling a voice as we have heard it on other occasions, but of the greatest substance.

With Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," which Monteux introduced to a stupefied Paris in 1913 to the accompaniment of a riot, there was absolute evidence of the conductor's mastery. When he appeared on the stand without a score to this, perhaps the most complex and formidable composition in the repertoire, I could hardly believe my eyes. He has lived with it for 38 years, to be sure, but I venture to say it took him all of those years to commit this work to memory. Be that as it may, he gave it the ultimate, definitive performance, one of the most sensational performances of any music to be heard in my memory.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 14th program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall. The program:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Op. 60 ..... Beethoven
Le Sacre du Printemps ..... Stravinsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What a superb musician, what a master is this Pierre Monteux!

He made an outrageously belated return to Boston yesterday afternoon to demonstrate beyond a question of a doubt, that he ranks with the very greatest conductors of our time. He demonstrated also why this distinction has been denied him by the public at large all these years, but no matter: his true stature in the world of music is the special comprehension of the truly musical, and he need have no concern for history's final judgment.

The reason this man, who for five years ending in 1924 was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is not fully appreciated is that he can conduct an orchestra and make it sound gloriously without disturbing a lock of his shaggy mane. As it happens this sort of conducting went out of fashion with the button shoe. Whole generations have been reared on virtuoso conductors who combine the beauty of a collar model with the athletic prowess of a pole vaulter.

Here to Stay

This is not to say the virtuoso conductors are on the wrong tack; on the contrary they have doubtless done more to catch the imagination of the general public—and swell the box office receipts—than the time beaters ever could. No; the virtuoso is here to stay. He is the mirror of the times, and his achievements interpretatively are of incalculable significance. Yet how refreshing, how stimulating, how interesting to have in Monteux a man who lets the composer do all the talking!

In the Fourth Symphony it was Beethoven who spoke. Monteux, who stood immobile on the conductor's stand and traced, with exquisite sensitivity, the measures and nuances of the music, merely preserved the meaning and the intentions of that voice. It was, in such circumstances, a voice from the past; not as powerful and compelling a voice as we have heard it on other occasions, but of the greatest substance.

With Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," which Monteux introduced to a stupefied Paris in 1913 to the accompaniment of a riot, there was absolute evidence of the conductor's mastery. When he appeared on the stand without a score to this, perhaps the most complex and formidable composition in the repertoire, I could hardly believe my eyes. He has lived with it for 38 years, to be sure, but I venture to say it took him all of those years to commit this work to memory. Be that as it may, he gave it the ultimate, definitive performance, one of the most sensational performances of any music to be heard in my memory.

Top of Form

The orchestra, which obviously adores him, was in the very top of its form. Relaxed and secure in the knowledge Monteux knew every note, every split-second cue, every rhythmic and dynamic contrast, and working together in the marvelous esprit de corps that

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Historic is the word for yesterday afternoon's concert and its forthcoming repetitions tonight and tomorrow afternoon. Pierre Monteux, whose five-year term as conductor of the Boston Symphony preceded the 25-year one of Serge Koussevitzky, has returned at the invitation of Charles Munch, to lead the orchestra as guest in this its 70th season.

How many of those who faced Mr. Monteux yesterday and rose spontaneously when he appeared on the platform remember him of yore may not be said. And only those whose attendance at the concerts goes back to the beginning of his term of service can be fully aware of what he did for the orchestra. In his own recent words, he built it twice. When he took it over its ranks had been depleted by a war and in his first year they were further and more seriously depleted by a strike. Though the latter has not always admitted it, the instrument he turned over to Koussevitzky was a splendid one.

Some of those players sat before Mr. Monteux yesterday but most of the faces in the present band could be described as new to him. In the course of four days of rehearsal he had them completely subservient to his will. Mr. Monteux, who looks very much as he did when he left us, conducts as he used to. Compared with his successors he is sparing of gesture. There can be plenty of excitement in the music, and in the playing of it, but it does not register in his outward demeanor.

His ear for tone and for tonal balance is as fine as it ever was—probably finer. And it may be remarked that he seated the orchestra as it has not been seated since his day, with the second violins on his right and the violas behind them. The sound of it yesterday was gratifying to the ear. Everything could be heard and in the right relationship to everything else.

The afternoon began with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and continued with the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven. Both works were set forth with the utmost lucidity. The Overture was stirring, the Symphony classic in the truest sense. In both scores there could also have been a little more poetizing. The climax of the concert, and of the Symphony season to date, came with the performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," which Mr. Monteux conducted in its stormy Paris premiere of 1913, and introduced to Boston 11 years later. This once-revolutionary score has itself become a classic, one of the landmarks of music. Its imitators have been legion but it towers above their efforts, as such musical milestones always do. Here in a nutshell was the whole gospel of modernity. Mr. Monteux's grasp of this music is profound, his power to communicate it absolute. This was a performance never to be forgotten, and it aroused the enthusiasm that was its due.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 27 1951

There's Music in the Air

BOSTON SYMPHONY Conductor Charles Munch (right) and his predecessors, Serge Koussevitzky (center) and Pierre Monteux discuss Israel Philharmonic's concert at Symphony Hall, Boston. Koussevitzky conducted Israel group in Hartford concert and others.—[AP Photo.

[229]

MUSIC

Pierre Monteux, Guest Conductor of Symphony, Plays "Rite of Spring"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 27 years [illegible] had left that [illegible] the audience were [illegible] set before him then. [illegible] rose in greeting and [illegible] as Mr. Monteux [illegible]. Others soon followed [illegible] gesture on the part [illegible] became a general [illegible] of the first-rank [illegible] conductors. [illegible] when Mr. Monteux [illegible] tonight and tomorrow [illegible] music by two [illegible] composers: [illegible] Overture, [illegible] Beethoven's Fourth [illegible] favorite is [illegible] But that some of us [illegible] waiting for was [illegible] difficult score [illegible] The Rite of Spring."

[illegible] had introduced [illegible] 27 years and one [illegible] years previous to [illegible] he had given the [illegible] work as a ballet [illegible]

[illegible] knows the scandal it [illegible] and the considerable [illegible] of disapproval it raised [illegible] although there [illegible] many who liked it at [illegible] Yesterday a few [illegible] walked out between [illegible] and some others [illegible] in more or lesss [illegible] But for the big ma- [illegible] The Rite was enormously [illegible] and especially so in Mr. [illegible] performance. There was [illegible] of cheers.

[illegible] that any one can conduct [illegible] as well as Mr. Monteux. [illegible] whole score in his head [illegible] and Beethoven, too. [illegible] matters and he makes it [illegible] music. I have heard Mr. [illegible] tzky's more tonally opulent [illegible] and Leonard Bernstein's more nervous and jumpy version, but never had I heard those driving rhythms, with their complicated accents, come out with such controlled but powerful effect. Nor had I ever heard so many details so [illegible] in "The Rite."

Mr. Monteux could have played [illegible] and louder, as others have done, but his special knowledge of this score, and his fabulous accuracy with the changing rhythmic meters, count for much more than speed and ardor. This performance was a long double crescendo of tension released only by the final crisp chords at the end of each section. Such a reading is not only a triumph of the conducting art, but it also helps to reinforce one's conviction that Stravinsky never wrote a finer or more distinctive work than "The Rite."

With Beethoven as with Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux was completely in the vein. Nothing too fast, nothing too slow, no extreme of dynamics. The "long line" of Beethoven's structure was there, and although no detail was slighted, everything was subordinated to proper style and a conception of the Symphony as a whole. If Mr. Monteux' gestures were relaxed, so was his interpretation. Wagner's Overture received the same treatment. Thus out of thorough understanding, out of technical authority and an instinctive good taste came eloquence mellow, unflawed and stirring.

Incidentally, Mr. Monteux had changed the seating of the orchestra back to the classical plan of first violins at the left, front, and seconds on the right; cellos behind first violins, and viola on the other side.

THEATRE AND CONCERT TODAY

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux, once the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, returns as guest to offer the following program: Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." At 8:30.

"CYRANO DE BERGERAC"—Majestic Theatre Stanley Kramer's film version of the Rostand romantic drama, with Jose Ferrer in the title role. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"TARTUFFE"—Brattle Theatre, Cambridge. Biles Malleson's free adaptation of the Brattle Theatre Company, starring Sam Jaffe. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"WHERE'S CHARLEY?"—Shubert Theatre. Ray Bolger is starred in the musical show based on the famous Brandon Thomas farce, "Charley's Aunt." At 2:30 and 8:30.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 28 1951

Mrs. Roosevelt Speaks

RCA-Victor has made available the Tanglewood performance of "Peter and the Wolf," last Summer, when Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt took the role of the Narrator in Prokofieff's popular work. She did a good job; too, in a kindly and grandmotherly tone, although I still prefer the original of Richard Hale. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony, so musically this is first rate. LM-45. The good and informal notes are by Boston's Rudy Elie.

Since choral music is still a matter of specialist appeal in this country, Poulenc's brief Mass in G and Britten's "A Ceremony of Carols," may find a limited number of record buyers. But RCA-Victor's LM-1088 is highly recommended, for it contains both works in excellent performance by Robert Shaw's Chorale. You'll find the music very interesting, too.

JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
GREENVILLE, S. C.
NEWS
JAN 28 1951

ARTHUR FIEDLER TO BE DIRECTOR

World-Renowned Musical Organization Booked For NBC Network

The world-renowned Boston Pops Orchestra will be heard on the NBC network on Monday evenings starting tomorrow (10 p. m., WFBC) Charles C. Barry, vice president in charge of radio programming, announced today.

Arthur Fiedler will direct the concerts.

Negotiations were completed by Barry, and George [illegible], manager of the Boston Symphony [illegible] ton, Pops Orchestra. Barry said the concerts would extend into the regular Spring season of the Boston Pops, and the broadcasts would be continued during the regular Symphony Hall public concerts.

MONDAY SCHEDULE INTACT

Arturo Toscanini's return to the podium and the moving of the NBC Symphony Orchestra to a Saturday broadcast period have made it possible to add the Boston Pops program [illegible] NBC's music schedule, Barry pointed out.

The addition of the Boston Pops Orchestra to the weekly schedule of NBC will keep the Monday evening of music schedule intact. The programs which precede this on the air on Monday nights are "The Railroad Hour" at 8 p. m., "The Voice of Firestone" at 8:30 p. m., "The Telephone Hour" at 9 p. m. and Cities Service Band of America" at 9:30 p. m., [illegible] all heard over WFBC.

The Boston Pops Orchestra, composed of members of the Boston Symphony, has been heard by millions all over the world through radio broadcasts and through their many RCA Victor recordings. Fiedler became conductor of the Boston Pops in 1930, and has held that post ever since then. Fiedler was born in Boston and received his musical training in Europe and the U. S. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a violinist in 1915.

The Boston Pops Orchestra has become an institution in its home city. Its concerts in Symphony Hall are sold out every season. Fiedler also has achieved wide renown as guest conductor of other orchestras, including the NBC Symphony.

The series on Monday nights will offer the music that has made the orchestra so popular. The shorter classics, novelties and new works will be heard in the hour-long concerts each week.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1951

To Present Boston Pops Orchestra

April 19, Patriot's Day, has been selected as the date for the second annual appearance here of Arthur Fiedler and 60 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who will present a pops concert sponsored by Rev. James F. O'Reilly division, Ancient Order of Hibernians, and its auxiliary.

Last April 12, under similar auspices, the Fiedler-led musicians attracted an audience of 1,400 persons at Central Catholic High School Auditorium where the second program will be presented.

When the curtain goes up at 8:30 p. m., Greater Lawrence patrons of music will be seated at 142 tables. The committee has arranged for ten guests to each table. Light refreshments will be served.

Heading the committee are Trial Justice Charles W. Twombly, general chairman; Mrs. William O'Neil, co-chairman; Thomas F. Galvin, executive manager; Eugene Sullivan, program chairman; Clement J. Connor, treasurer; Elizabeth A. Murphy, ticket chairman; Atty. Donald H. Sullivan, secretary.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 14th program of [illegible] Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violin. The program:

Suite from "Dardanus"	Rameau
Violin Concerto	Rivier
Baal Shem	Bloch
Symphony No. 4 in G, Op. 88	Dvorak

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Ruth Posselt Day at the Symphony yesterday afternoon as Miss Posselt, clearly one of our foremost women violin virtuosi, played two widely contrasted works on the same program. It was also Dvorak's day, too, but of that later.

As it happened Miss Posselt, who was in the top of her form, chose for one of her concertos a work of rather slim merit. This was the Concerto of Jean Rivier, a contemporary French composer who appears to have taken his cue, from the point of view of economy of means, from Satie. No doubt it is the way he wanted it, but few concertos enjoy such meager a background for the solo instrument.

Nor, to my way of hearing, was the musical substance related by the solo violin of any particular urgency. It was neither forward, nor backward-looking, merely neutral and abstract. The first movement, light in character, offered some interesting textural contrasts between violin and the skimpy but amusing orchestral support; the slow movement seemed often tenuous and prolonged, and the finale, properly vivacious in quality, called upon the full range of the virtuoso violinist. It was well received, but I think more as a performance than as a valuable addition to the repertoire.

Different Matter

Bloch's "Baal Shem" is quite a different matter. It is not perhaps so expressive as his "Schelomo" in the same vein, but it is nonetheless an utterance at once profound and beautiful, exploiting throughout the most sombre, most eloquent tones of the violin. Even in its moments of animation it is deeply colored with emotional stress. Although Miss Posselt, in the Rivier, had a tendency to attack the G string with some roughness, she was superb in the Bloch. Here her virtuosity was unleashed but under control, and she produced singing tones of great radiance. She was given, incidentally, a very warm reception by the audience.

Mr. Munch, whose taste in unearthing long neglected music is becoming increasingly notable, began the concert with a suite by Rameau that cannot be described as anything but enchanting. Although taken from an opera by this early 18th century French composer, it was interesting to note most of the movements derive from his keyboard pieces. The Rondeau gai is if I recall (and spell) aright, known as "Les Niais de Sologne;" I can't remember the others. In any case they were exquisite, and exquisitely done, too.

While Arthur Fiedler and the Macdowell Club performed the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak as recently as 1938, it doesn't seem possible this splendid symphony hasn't been done at these concerts since 1892. To be sure, it is not quite the equal to the threadbare Fifth in the inevitability of its structure and the cogency of its thematic material, but it is nonetheless a symphony informed with virility, nobility of spirit, and poetic imagination of a very high order.

Contrast of Mood

Listening to Mr. Munch recreate this work, it occurred to me that perhaps even Dvorak himself, when he directed the first performance, had failed to find in it the power of expression, the contrast of mood, and the sonorous climaxes Mr. Munich did. At any rate, the work, which contains melodic inspirations, rhythmic fancies, and orchestral textures of an extremely persuasive character, suddenly came alive and gave us all, I am sure, a most gratifying experience. Save for some over-driven climaxes and a rough spot at the very end (not the orchestra's fault, I think), it was a marvelous performance, with a special mention here for the solo flute playing of Georges Laurent.

The program next week offers Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' 2d Piano Concerto, with Nicolle Henroit as the soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Munch Revives Dvorak Fourth at Symphony; Ruth Posselt is Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

The notable facts about the Boston Symphony concerts this week are quickly told: Conductor Charles Munch revives the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, and Ruth Posselt is violin soloist in a new and wearisome Concerto by Jean Rivier, and Bloch's "Baal Shem." The program begins with a Suite from Rameau's opera "Dardanus."

One can only admire Miss Posselt's courage and enterprise in working up this Concerto by Rivier, a composer little known here. As someone in the audience dubiously asked: "How often can she hope to play it?" It is not that the solo part is dry and mechanistic in the two outside movements; it is not that the slow movement, though sustained melodic writing, is on the cold side; it is not that the orchestration is frequently coarse.

It is just that, for my money, here is music which has nothing to say, and, apart from the slow movement, is not at all effective for the solo instrument. If a violin is made to caper rather than to sing, its caperings ought to have color and be spectacular. Here they are merely strenuous, even in the formidable cadenza of the finale. It is not often that one derives absolutely nothing from a new composition, but here is one case where the score (pun intended) is zero to zero.

Bloch's "Baal Shem," performed in the orchestral version the composer made 12 years ago, is an entirely different matter. Here you have sustained beauty, an abundance of color, spirit and feeling; in short, music. Miss Posselt played it in superb fashion; her phrasing was a marvel of delicate grace, and here her fine sense of rhythm counted for something. As usual, Miss Posselt, gowned in a beautiful, striking blue, was most cordially received.

It is little wonder that Dvorak's Fourth Symphony should have gone unplayed at these concerts since 1892. It is not only old-fashioned, but it is far from the best and most distinctive Dvorak. But it does have its moments, in all four movements, and when it is played in so vital and passionate a manner as Mr. Munch did it, revival is justified.

From time to time you sense a full Czech flavor, melodically and in the dancing rhythms. In fact my companion, a compatriot of Dvorak, sensibly observed: "Just as noisy as a Czech inn on Sunday, when the people are 'round drinking beer. That's where Dvorak got his inspiration."

The substance of this G major Symphony is genuine and pure. What is lacking is the mature sense of proportion and form; the direct, expert treatment that you find in the "New World" Symphony. In the Fourth, Dvorak was still influenced by Brahms.

MUSIC

Pierre Monteux, Guest Conductor of Symphony, Plays "Rite of Spring"

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nearly 27 years had passed since he had left that stage as the orchestra's regular conductor, but in the audience were many who had sat before him then. They promptly rose in greeting and stood applauding, as Mr. Monteux first appeared. Others soon followed and a graceful gesture on the part of old friends became a general tribute to one of the first-rank technicians among all conductors.

The program, which Mr. Monteux will repeat tonight and tomorrow afternoon, contained music by two of his three favorite composers: "The Flying Dutchman" Overture, by Wagner, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. His third favorite is Brahms. But what some of us younger ones were waiting for was that huge and cruelly difficult score of Stravinsky, "The Rite of Spring." Mr. Monteux had introduced it to Boston exactly 27 years and one day before, and 11 years previous to that—25, 1924, he had given the premiere of the work as a ballet in Paris.

Everyone knows the scandal it created in 1913, and the considerable amount of disapproval it raised when new here (although there were a good many who liked it at first hearing.) Yesterday a few score people walked out between the two sections, and some others voiced their ire in more or less vocal words. But for the big majority "The Rite" was enormously exciting, and especially so in Mr. Monteux' performance. There was a long after round of cheers.

I doubt that anyone can conduct "The Rite" so well as Mr. Monteux. He has the whole score in his head (the Wagner and Beethoven, too, for that matter) and he makes it sound like music. I have heard Mr. Koussevitzky's more tonally opulent version and Leonard Bernstein's more nervous and jumpy version, but never had I heard those driving rhythms, with their complicated accents, come out with such controlled but powerful effect. Nor had I ever heard so many details so clearly in "The Rite."

Mr. Monteux could have played it faster and louder, as others have done, but his special knowledge of this score, and his fabulous accuracy with the changing rhythmic meters, count for much more than speed and ardor. This performance was a long double crescendo of tension released only by the final crisp chords at the end of each section. Such a reading is not only a triumph of the conducting art, but it also helps to reinforce one's conviction that Stravinsky never wrote a finer or more distinctive work than "The Rite."

With Beethoven as with Stravinsky, Mr. Monteux was completely in the vein. Nothing too fast, nothing too slow, no extreme of dynamics. The "long line" of Beethoven's structure was there, and although no detail was slighted, everything was subordinated to proper style and a conception of the Symphony as a whole. If Mr. Monteux' gestures were relaxed, so was his interpretation. Wagner's Overture received the same treatment. Thus out of thorough understanding, out of technical authority and an instinctive good taste came eloquence mellow, unflawed and stirring.

Incidentally, Mr. Monteux had changed the seating of the orchestra back to the classical plan of first violins at the left, front, and seconds on the right; cellos behind first violins, and violas on the other side.

THEATRE AND CONCERT TODAY

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux, once the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, returns as guest to offer the following program: Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." At 8:30.

"CYRANO DE BERGERAC"—Majestic Theatre. Stanley Kramer's film version of the Rostand romantic drama, with Jose Ferrer in the title role. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"TARTUFFE"—Brattle Theatre, Cambridge. Biles Malleson's free adaptation of the Brattle Theatre Company, starring Sam Jaffe. At 2:30 and 8:30.

"WHERE'S CHARLEY?"—Shubert Theatre. Ray Bolger is starred in the musical show based on the famous Brandon Thomas farce, "Charley's Aunt." At 2:30 and 8:30.

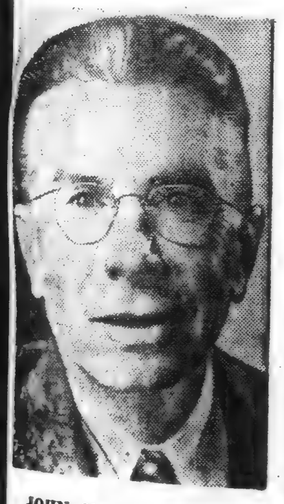
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
JAN 28 1951

Mrs. Roosevelt Speaks

RCA-Victor has made available the Tanglewood performance of "Peter and the Wolf," last Summer, when Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt took the role of the Narrator in Prokofieff's popular work. She did a good job, too, in a kindly and grandmotherly tone, although I still prefer the original of Richard Hale. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony, so musically this is first rate. LM-45. The good and informal notes are by Boston's Rudy Elie.

Since choral music is still a matter of specialist appeal in this country, Poulenc's brief Mass in G and Britten's "A Ceremony of Carols," may find a limited number of record buyers. But RCA-Victor's LM-1088 is highly recommended, for it contains both works in excellent performance by Robert Shaw's Chorale. You'll find the music very interesting, too.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA
TIMES
1/28/51



JOHN N. BURK, who divides his time between study and studio, is a combination editor-author of the week for the "Letters of Richard Wagner," which he has edited and for which he has supplied the essential connecting material. But he has been exclusively an author on previous occasions, when he wrote "Clara Schumann: A Romantic Biography" and "The Life and Works of Beethoven." Born in California, a graduate of Harvard in 1916, he has been for 15 years program annotator of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
GREENVILLE, S. C.
NEWS
JAN 28 1951

ARTHUR FIEDLER TO BE DIRECTOR

World-Renowned Musical Organization Booked For NBC Network

The world-renowned Boston Pops Orchestra will be heard on the NBC network on Monday evenings starting tomorrow. (10 p. m., WFBC) Charles C. Barry, vice president in charge of radio programming, announced today.

Arthur Fiedler will direct the concerts.

Negotiations were completed by Barry, and George [redacted] manager of the Boston Symphony [redacted] Boston Pops Orchestra. Barry said the concerts would extend from the regular Spring season of the Boston Pops, and the broadcasts would be continued during the regular Symphony Hall public concerts.

MONDAY SCHEDULE INTACT

Arturo Toscanini's return to the podium and the moving of the NBC Symphony Orchestra to a Saturday broadcast period have made it possible to add the Boston Pops program [redacted] music scheduled Barry announced.

The addition of the Boston Pops Orchestra to the weekly schedule of NBC will keep the Monday evening of radio schedule intact. The programs which precede this on the air on Monday nights are "The Railroad Hour" at 8 p. m., "The Voice of Firestone" at 8:30 p. m., "The Telephone Hour" at 9 p. m., and "Cities Service Band of America" at 9:30 p. m., all heard over WBBC.

The Boston Pops Orchestra, composed of members of the Boston Symphony, has been heard by millions all over the world through radio broadcasts and through their many RCA Victor recordings. Fiedler became conductor of the Boston Pops in 1930, and has held that post ever since then. Fiedler was born in Boston and received his musical training in Europe and the U. S. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a violinist in 1915.

The Boston Pops Orchestra has become an institution in its home city. Its concerts in Symphony Hall are sold out every season. Fiedler also has achieved wide renown as guest conductor of other orchestras, including the NBC Symphony.

The series on Monday nights will offer the music that has made the orchestra so popular. The shorter classics, novelties and new works will be heard in the hour-long concerts each week.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1951

To Present Boston Pops Orchestra

April 19, Patriot's Day, has been selected as the date for the second annual appearance here of Arthur Fiedler and 60 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who will present a pops concert sponsored by Rev. James T. O'Reilly division, Ancient Order of Hibernians, and its auxiliary.

Last April 12, under similar auspices, the Fiedler-led musicians attracted an audience of 1,400 persons at Central Catholic High School Auditorium where the second program will be presented.

When the curtain goes up at 8:30 p. m., Greater Lawrence patrons of music will be seated at 142 tables. The committee has arranged for ten guests to each table. Light refreshments will be served.

Heading the committee are Trial Justice Charles W. Twombly, general chairman; Mrs. William O'Neil, co-chairman; Thomas F. Galvin, executive manager; Eugene Sullivan, program chairman; Clement J. Connor, treasurer; Elizabeth A. Murphy, ticket chairman; Atty. Donald H. Sullivan, secretary.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 14th program of [redacted] Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violin. The program:

Suite from "Dardanus" ..... Rameau
Violin Concerto ..... Rivier
Baal Shem ..... Bloch
Symphony No. 4 in G, Op. 88 ..... Dvorak

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Ruth Posselt Day at the Symphony yesterday afternoon as Miss Posselt, clearly one of our foremost women violin virtuosi, played two widely contrasted works on the same program. It was also Dvorak's day, too, but of that later.

As it happened Miss Posselt, who was in the top of her form, chose for one of her concertos a work of rather slim merit. This was the Concerto of Jean Rivier, a contemporary French composer who appears to have taken his cue, from the point of view of economy of means, from Satie. No doubt it is the way he wanted it, but few concertos enjoy such meager a background for the solo instrument.

Nor, to my way of hearing, was the musical substance related by the solo violin of any particular urgency. It was neither forward, nor backward-looking, merely neutral and abstract. The first movement, light in character, offered some interesting textural contrasts between violin and the skimpy but amusing orchestral support; the slow movement seemed often tenuous and prolonged, and the finale, properly vivacious in quality, called upon the full range of the virtuoso violinist. It was well received, but I think more as a performance than as a valuable addition to the repertoire.

Different Matter

Bloch's "Baal Shem" is quite a different matter. It is not perhaps so expressive as his "Schelomo" in the same vein, but it is nonetheless an utterance at once profound and beautiful, exploiting throughout the most sombre, most eloquent tones of the violin. Even in its moments of animation it is deeply colored with emotional stress. Although Miss Posselt, in the Rivier, had a tendency to attack the G string with some roughness, she was superb in the Bloch. Here her virtuosity was unleashed but under control, and she produced singing tones of great radiance. She was given, incidentally, a very warm reception by the audience.

Mr. Munch, whose taste in unearthing long neglected music is becoming increasingly notable, began the concert with a suite by Rameau that cannot be described as anything but enchanting. Although taken from an opera by this early 18th century French composer, it was interesting to note most of the movements derive from his keyboard pieces. The Rondeau gai is, if I recall (and spell) aright, known as "Les Niais de Sologne;" I can't remember the others. In any case they were exquisite, and exquisitely done, too.

While Arthur Fiedler and the Macdowell Club, performed the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak as recently as 1938, it doesn't seem possible this splendid symphony hasn't been done at these concerts since 1892. To be sure, it is not quite the equal to the threadbare Fifth in the inevitability of its structure and the cogency of its thematic material, but it is nonetheless a symphony informed with virility, nobility of spirit, and poetic imagination of a very high order.

Contrast of Mood

Listening to Mr. Munch recreate this work, it occurred to me that perhaps even Dvorak himself, when he directed the first performance, had failed to find in it the power of expression, the contrast of mood, and the sonorous climaxes Mr. Munich did. At any rate, the work, which contains melodic inspirations, rhythmic fancies, and orchestral textures of an extremely persuasive character, suddenly came alive and gave us all, I am sure, a most gratifying experience. Save for some over-driven climaxes and a rough spot at the very end (not the orchestra's fault, I think), it was a marvelous performance, with a special mention here for the solo flute playing of Georges Laurent.

The program next week offers Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' 2d Piano Concerto, with Nicolle Henroit as the soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Munch Revives Dvorak Fourth at Symphony; Ruth Posselt is Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

The notable facts about the Boston Symphony concerts this week are quickly told: Conductor Charles Munch revives the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, and Ruth Posselt is violin soloist in a new and wearisome Concerto by Jean Rivier, and Bloch's "Baal Shem." The program begins with a Suite from Rameau's opera "Dardanus."

One can only admire Miss Posselt's courage and enterprise in working up this Concerto by Rivier, a composer little known here. As someone in the audience dubiously asked: "How often can she hope to play it?" It is not that the solo part is dry and mechanistic in the two outside movements; it is not that the slow movement, though sustained melodic writing, is on the cold side; it is not that the orchestration is frequently coarse.

It is just that, for my money, here is music which has nothing to say, and, apart from the slow movement, is not at all effective for the solo instrument. If a violin is made to caper rather than to sing, its caperings ought to have color and be spectacular. Here they are merely strenuous, even in the formidable cadenza of the finale. It is not often that one derives absolutely nothing from a new composition, but here is one case where the score (pun intended) is zero to zero.

Bloch's "Baal Shem," performed in the orchestral version the composer made 12 years ago, is an entirely different matter. Here you have sustained beauty, an abundance of color, spirit and feeling; in short, music. Miss Posselt played it in superb fashion; her phrasing was a marvel of delicate grace, and here her fine sense of rhythm counted for something. As usual, Miss Posselt, gowned in a beautiful, striking blue, was most cordially received.

It is little wonder that Dvorak's Fourth Symphony should have gone unplayed at these concerts since 1892. It is not only old-fashioned, but it is far from the best and most distinctive Dvorak. But it does have its moments, in all four movements, and when it is played in so vital and passionate a manner as Mr. Munch did it, revival is justified.

From time to time you sense a full Czech flavor, melodically and in the dancing rhythms. In fact my companion, a compatriot of Dvorak, sensibly observed: "Just as noisy as a Czech inn on Sunday, when the people are 'round drinking beer. That's where Dvorak got his inspiration."

The substance of this G major Symphony is genuine and pure. What is lacking is the mature sense of proportion and form; the direct, expert treatment that you find in the "New World" Symphony. In the Fourth, Dvorak was still influenced by Brahms.

[230]

FRANCE AMERIQUE

ONI
FRANC

OBERS 535 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

NUMERO DU 4 FEVRIER 1951

. . Un concerto pour violon de Jean Rivier sera présenté au public new-yorkais par Charles Munch et la Symphonie de Boston le 17 février . .

This Clipping From
VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.
FEB 1 - 1951

Thousands of women are the stanchions of the symphony orchestras, of the community concerts. They, mainly because men think women have more time, are behind the drives for funds of the thirty major orchestras, of twenty-two lesser ones, and some four hundred minor orchestras. They are the majority of the subscribers, the listeners who go because they love music. They are also the will behind the fabulous industry of bringing soloists to two thousand communities each year. Primarily the women raise the concert money, and then their representatives go to New York to shop for musicians according to the amount of money raised. Thus many young or unknown artists receive their chance; older, known ones receive their due, and the ears of America sing with music.

JOFFÉ

In the Green Room at Boston's Symphony Hall: conductor Charles Münch at the piano, with Mrs. Frederic C. Church; standing, Georges Laurent, Richard Burgin, both of the orchestra.

Women make up the audience, raise funds for about 450 symphony orchestras and 2,000 community concerts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Munch Revives Dvorak Fourth at Symphony; Ruth Posselt is Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

The notable facts about the Boston Symphony concerts this week are quickly told: Conductor Charles Munch revives the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, and Ruth Posselt is violin soloist in a new and wearisome Concerto by Jean Rivier, and Bloch's "Baal Shem." The program begins with a Suite from Rameau's opera "Dardanus."

One can only admire Miss Posselt's courage and enterprise in working up this Concerto by Rivier, a composer little known here. As someone in the audience dubiously asked: "How often can she hope to play it?" It is not that the solo part is dry and mechanistic in the two outside movements; it is not that the slow movement, though sustained melodic writing, is on the cold side; it is not that the orchestration is frequently coarse.

It is just that, for my money, here is music which has nothing to say, and, apart from the slow movement, is not at all effective for the solo instrument. If a violin is made to caper rather than to sing, its caperings ought to have color and be spectacular. Here they are merely strenuous, even in the formidable cadenza of the finale. It is not often that one derives absolutely nothing from a new composition, but here is one case where the score (pun intended) is zero to zero.

Bloch's "Baal Shem," performed in the orchestral version the composer made 12 years ago, is an entirely different matter. Here you have sustained beauty, an abundance of color, spirit and feeling; in short, music. Miss Posselt played it in superb fashion; her phrasing was a marvel of delicate grace, and here her fine sense of rhythm counted for something. As usual, Miss Posselt, gowned in a beautiful, striking blue, was most cordially received.

It is little wonder that Dvorak's Fourth Symphony should have gone unplayed at these concerts since 1892. It is not only old-fashioned, but it is far from the best and most distinctive Dvorak. But it does have its moments, in all four movements, and when it is played in so vital and passionate a manner as Mr. Munch did it, revival is justified.

From time to time you sense a full Czech flavor, melodically and in the dancing rhythms. In fact my companion, a compatriot of Dvorak, sensibly observed: "Just as noisy as a Czech inn on Sunday, when the people are 'round drinking beer. That's where Dvorak got his inspiration."

The substance of this G major Symphony is genuine and pure. What is lacking is the mature sense of proportion and form; the direct, expert treatment that you find in the "New World" Symphony. In the Fourth, Dvorak was still influenced by Brahms.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony list might be described as a program of unfamiliar music, and the initial presentation of it yesterday afternoon suggested the summary: Minor music in major performance. On the issue of unfamiliarity there are two trifling exceptions, the Rigaudon from Rameau's "Dardanus," the third of a set of four excerpts from that ancient opera with which this program begins, and the "Nigun," of Ernest Bloch.

As to the last-named, Ruth Posselt is playing at these concerts in its entirety the Swiss composer's "Baal Shem," Three Pictures of Chassidic Life for violin and orchestra. With piano accompaniment the "Nigun," subtitled Improvisation, is not infrequently heard in recital. The other two are "Vidui" (Contrition) and "Simchas Torah" (Rejoicing), and the present performances of the set are the first at these concerts.

Even more of a novelty is Miss Posselt's other number, the Violin Concerto of Jean Rivier. This 54-year-old French composer is little known in this country but has nevertheless, appeared on a Boston Symphony program once before; in 1936, when Mr. Mitropoulos introduced him to us through an "Overture for a Don Quixote." And for the piece de resistance, Mr. Munch has resurrected the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, which had the curious fate of being performed at the Symphony Concerts in 1892, the year after it was published and neglected there ever since.

A little more than three years ago Mr. Munch showed us the "Dardanus" Suite and the first impression of it was renewed yesterday, namely, of music that is slight but charming.

It was tastefully performed yesterday by a small body of players. Following it, the Rivier suggested a continuous tradition in French music, though Rivier's means are different from those of his great predecessor. The Concerto proved a pleasing, if not profound work that gave Miss Posselt ample opportunity to display her superb virtuosity and musicianship. The orchestral form of the Bloch pieces was actually an afterthought, but a happy one, since their characteristic Jewish color is thereby enhanced. They might be said, however, to stand midway between salon music and the true symphonic variety.

Of course, the glowing performance of Dvorak's Symphony proved how unjust its long neglect had been. But we are used to that sort of thing. Once the "New World" Symphony appeared, conductors found it difficult to remember that Dvorak had written any other. There are in this G major many anticipations of its famous successor, even of the supposed Negro and Indian idiom of the latter, thus backing up those who maintain that the "New World" is far more Czech than American. There are suggestions of other composers, including Mahler, who had himself hardly got going when this Symphony was written, but in the main, it is true Dvorak, both thematically and in its orchestral coloring, now luminous, now brilliant. That the audience liked it was plain to be seen.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 7 - 19

Music

Boston Symphony Directed by Munch Presents Concert

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, presented the fourth concert of the current season here at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium in Providence last night. The program was brilliantly constructed, featuring an unusual work by the Hungarian composer Bela Bartok and a seldom heard symphony by Dvorak. A Strauss tone poem opened the concert.

The complete program outline:

Strauss ..... "Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Nikolaus Lenau), Op. 20
Bartok ..... Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta
I. Andante tranquillo
II. Allegro
III. Adagio
IV. Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

Dvorak ..... Symphony No. 4 in G major, Op. 88
I. Allegro con brio
II. Adagio
III. Allegretto grazioso
IV. Allegro ma non Troppo

The Bartok "Music for strings, percussion and celesta" proved to be one of those rare works where "the friends and enemies of modern music" get together on some sort of common ground. Judging by the audience applause, it was the most popular work of the evening. It was so complex that nobody understood all of it, but most people managed to find at least something worthwhile in it.

To begin with, it used an intriguing orchestra plan, with a grouping of strings on either side of the conductor and the percussion and celesta in front of him. In the first movement the string groups merged, but in the other movements they played against one another or in dialogue most of the time. The work divided itself into halves formally, with a fugue in the first movement and a fughetta in the second. Then the Adagio was lyric and the final Allegro used a peasant theme for melodic material. One could go on groping for ways to indicate the extent of the integration of the work, which even included social implications — merging eastern folk-art material with western orchestral tone color.

The rhythmic patterns were almost unbelievably involved, and in his handling of these and all the other items, Charles Munch was superb. The ease of his directing was magnificent.

The Dvorak symphony which followed was an ideal closing number. Equally fresh in being seldom heard, it was distantly related to the Bartok, ending in a rousing movement suggestive of the familiar "Slavonic Dances" by Dvorak. Taken strictly as a piece of music, it is not a great symphony, but in this particular case, it was excellent after the Bartok. The applause it received did not equal that given the performance of the more modern work, however.

"Don Juan" was not so stirring as it has seemed on occasion, through no fault of the conductor. Mr. Munch gave a new emphasis to certain lines in the brass and took some other places at great speed, and the orchestra responded perfectly to every request of the conductor, but the final effect missed being electric by a slight margin for some reason which is not clear. It isn't important anyway.

What seems to us to be the point of this concert was the response to the modern work of Bartok, which should encourage more performances of new works [illegible]

[231]

ONE
FRANC

FRANCE-AMERIQUE

OBERS 838 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

NUMERO DU 4 FEVRIER 1951

. Un concerto pour violon de Jean Rivier sera présenté au public new-yorkais par Charles Munch et la Symphonie de Boston le 17 février . .

This Clipping From
VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.
FEB 1 - 1951

Thousands of women are the stanchions of the symphony orchestras, of the community concerts. They, mainly because (we think) women have more time, are behind the drives for funds of the thirty major orchestras, of twenty-two lesser ones, and some four hundred minor orchestras. They are the majority of the subscribers, the listeners who do because they love music. They are also the will behind the fabulous industry of bringing soloists to two thousand communities each year. Primarily the women raise the concert money, and then their representatives go to New York to shop for musicians according to the amount of money raised. Thus many young or unknown artists receive their chance; older, known ones receive their due, and the ears of America sing with music.

JOFFÉ

In the Green Room at Boston's Symphony Hall: conductor Charles Münch at the piano, with Mrs. Frederic C. Church; standing, Georges Laurent, Richard Burgin, both of the orchestra.

Women make up the audience, raise funds for about 450 symphony orchestras and 2,000 community concerts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Munch Revives Dvorak Fourth at Symphony; Ruth Posselt is Soloist

By CYRUS DURGIN

The notable facts about the Boston Symphony concerts this week are quickly told: Conductor Charles Munch revives the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, and Ruth Posselt is violin soloist in a new and wearisome Concerto by Jean Rivier, and Bloch's "Baal Shem." The program begins with a Suite from Rameau's opera "Dardanus."

One can only admire Miss Posselt's courage and enterprise in working up this Concerto by Rivier, a composer little known here. As someone in the audience dubiously asked: "How often can she hope to play it?" It is not that the solo part is dry and mechanistic in the two outside movements; it is not that the slow movement, though sustained melodic writing, is on the cold side; it is not that the orchestration is frequently coarse.

It is just that, for my money, here is music which has nothing to say, and, apart from the slow movement, is not at all effective for the solo instrument. If a violin is made to caper rather than to sing, its caperings ought to have color and be spectacular. Here they are merely strenuous, even in the formidable cadenza of the finale. It is not often that one derives absolutely nothing from a new composition, but here is one case where the score (pun intended) is zero to zero.

Bloch's "Baal Shem," performed in the orchestral version the composer made 12 years ago, is an entirely different matter. Here you have sustained beauty, an abundance of color, spirit and feeling; in short, music. Miss Posselt played it in superb fashion; her phrasing was a marvel of delicate grace, and here her fine sense of rhythm counted for something. As usual, Miss Posselt, gowned in a beautiful, striking blue, was most cordially received.

It is little wonder that Dvorak's Fourth Symphony should have gone unplayed at these concerts since 1892. It is not only old-fashioned, but it is far from the best and most distinctive Dvorak. But it does have its moments, in all four movements, and given it is played in so vital and passionate a manner as Mr. Munch did it, revival is justified.

From time to time you sense a full Czech flavor, melodically and in the dancing rhythms. In fact my companion, a compatriot of Dvorak, sensibly observed: "Just as noisy as a Czech inn on Sunday, when the people are 'round drinking beer. That's where Dvorak got his inspiration."

The substance of this G major Symphony is genuine and pure. What is lacking is the mature sense of proportion and form; the direct, expert treatment that you find in the "New World" Symphony. In the Fourth, Dvorak was still influenced by Brahms.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony list might be described as a program of unfamiliar music, and the initial presentation of it yesterday afternoon suggested the summary: Minor music in major performance. On the issue of unfamiliarity there are two trifling exceptions, the Rigaudon from Rameau's "Dardanus," the third of a set of four excerpts from that ancient opera with which this program begins, and the "Nigun," of Ernest Bloch.

As to the last-named, Ruth Posselt is playing at these concerts in its entirety the Swiss composer's "Baal Shem," Three Pictures of Chassidic Life for violin and orchestra. With piano accompaniment the "Nigun," subtitled Improvisation, is not infrequently heard in recital. The other two are "Vidui" (Contrition) and "Simchas Torah" (Rejoicing), and the present performances of the set are the first at these concerts.

Even more of a novelty is Miss Posselt's other number, the Violin Concerto of Jean Rivier. This 54-year-old French composer is little known in this country but has nevertheless, appeared on a Boston Symphony program once before; in 1936, when Mr. Mitropoulos introduced him to us through an "Overture for a Don Quixote." And for the piece de resistance, Mr. Munch has resurrected the Fourth Symphony of Dvorak, which had the curious fate of being performed at the Symphony Concerts in 1892, the year after it was published and neglected there ever since.

A little more than three years ago Mr. Munch showed us the "Dardanus" Suite and the first impression of it was renewed yesterday, namely, of music that is slight but charming.

It was tastefully performed yesterday by a small body of players. Following it, the Rivier suggested a continuous tradition in French music, though Rivier's means are different from those of his great predecessor. The Concerto proved a pleasing, if not profound work that gave Miss Posselt ample opportunity to display her superb virtuosity and musicianship. The orchestral form of the Bloch pieces was actually an afterthought, but a happy one, since their characteristic Jewish color is thereby enhanced. They might be said, however, to stand midway between salon music and the true symphonic variety.

Of course, the glowing performance of Dvorak's Symphony proved how unjust its long neglect had been. But we are used to that sort of thing. Once the "New World" Symphony appeared, conductors found it difficult to remember that Dvorak had written any other. There are in this G major many anticipations of its famous successor, even of the supposed Negro and Indian idiom of the latter, thus backing up those who maintain that the "New World" is far more Czech than American. There are suggestions of other composers, including Mahler, who had himself hardly got going when this Symphony was written, but in the main, it is true Dvorak, both thematically and in its orchestral coloring, now luminous, now brilliant. That the audience liked it was plain to be seen.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 7 - 1951

Music

Boston Symphony Directed by Munch Presents Concert

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, presented the fourth concert of the current season here at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium in Providence last night. The program was brilliantly constructed, featuring an unusual work by the Hungarian composer Bela Bartok and a seldom heard symphony by Dvorak. A Strauss tone poem opened the concert.

The complete program outline:

Strauss ..... "Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Nikolaus Lenau), Op. 20

Bartok ..... Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta

I. Andante tranquillo
II. Allegro
III. Adagio
IV. Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

Dvorak ..... Symphony No. 4 in G major, Op. 88

I. Allegro con brio
II. Adagio
III. Allegretto grazioso
IV. Allegro ma non Troppo

The Bartok "Music for strings, percussion and celesta" proved to be one of those rare works where "the friends and enemies of modern music" get together on some sort of common ground. Judging by the audience applause, it was the most popular work of the evening. It was so complex that nobody understood all of it, but most people managed to find at least something worthwhile in it.

To begin with, it used an intriguing orchestra plan, with a grouping of strings on either side of the conductor and the percussion and celesta in front of him. In the first movement the string groups merged, but in the other movements they played against one another or in dialogue most of the time. The work divided itself into halves formally, with a fugue in the first movement and a fughetta in the second. Then the Adagio was lyric and the final Allegro used a peasant theme for melodic material. One could go on groping for ways to indicate the extent of the integration of the work, which even included social implications — merging eastern folk-art material with western orchestral tone color.

The rhythmic patterns were almost unbelievably involved, and in his handling of these and all the other items, Charles Munch was superb. The ease of his directing was magnificent.

The Dvorak symphony which followed was an ideal closing number. Equally fresh in being seldom heard, it was distantly related to the Bartok, ending in a rousing movement suggestive of the familiar, "Slavonic Dances" by Dvorak. Taken strictly as a piece of music, it is not a great symphony, but in this particular case, it was excellent after the Bartok. The applause it received did not equal that given the performance of the more modern work, however.

"Don Juan" was not so stirring as it has seemed on occasion, through no fault of the conductor. Mr. Munch gave a new emphasis to certain lines in the brass and took some other places at great speed, and the orchestra responded perfectly to every request of the conductor, but the final effect missed being electric by a slight margin for some reason which is not clear. It isn't important anyway.

What seems to us to be the real point of this concert was the response to the modern work of Bartok, which should encourage more performances of new works here.

[231]

NITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1951

Ruth Posselt Soloist with the Symphony

Violinist Heard in Works by Jean Rivier and Ernest Bloch

By Harold Rogers

Strikingly gowned in royal blue, playing with a command that few violinists possess, Ruth Posselt introduced two works to the Boston Symphony concerts this week end —a new concerto by Jean Rivier and Ernest Bloch's "Baal Shem, Three Pictures of Chassidic Life."

The other two works on Charles Munch's program, while familiar in styles hoary with years, are not too familiar at Symphony Hall. The opener — Rameau's stately suite from his opera, "Dardanus"—was introduced to Boston by Mr. Munch in November, 1947, when he was guest conductor with the Boston Symphony. Yesterday's performance was its first hearing since. Dvořák's Symphony No. 4 in G major has not been played by the Boston Symphony since Arthur Nikisch conducted it in 1892, the year of its publication.

But there is nothing strange about any of these strangers. Even M. Rivier's concerto, which was published in 1948, taxes neither the imagination nor the ear. It is a thoroughly ingratiating piece — witty, inventive, tinkling, Frenchy, out-and-out easy entertainment. It's as suave as the latest Parisian frock—completely modern and properly provocative.

But its immediate appeal does not imply that it was easily constructed or easily executed. The ranging melodies do not lie in conventional patterns, and the doublestops employ fourths and fifths more often than the usual thirds and sixths. The intricate cadenza in the last of the three movements is one of those passages where the composer throws the book at the fiddler.

Miss Posselt, however, met the challenge with complete aplomb. To a musician of her mettle there are no obstacles. She caught the spirit of M. Rivier's lilting wit and contagiously imparted it to all.

♪ ♪ ♪

The soloist infused her performance of Bloch's "Baal Shem" with the vibrant Hebraic emotion it requires. Written originally for violin and piano, the three sections express the moods of contrition, improvisation, and rejoicing.

The metamorphosis into the orchestral version both loses and gains. There is something very moving about a solitary violin when it sings Bloch's oriental melodies with only a piano in support. With orchestral support the violin is also moving, but in order to be so it must run some competition with Bloch's rather brilliant orchestral colors. The gain or loss in either case is a matter of personal taste. Miss Posselt leaned on the bow, producing a dark, rich vibrance that pulls at the heart with eloquence.

♪ ♪ ♪

Apparently the only previous revival of the Dvořák symphony in Boston since its 1892 performance was by the MacDowell Club, Arthur Fiedler conducting, in 1938. Mr. Munch's revival this week end is interesting for several reasons. It raises the question of whether Dvořák has deserved the neglect accorded him in recent years. It provides us with material for a new appraisal. It gives us a symphonic work that is filled with much entertaining material.

Though it obviously is a very good symphony, it falls short of greatness owing to the extensive use of romantic clichés—the floric and bombastic statement, the supercharged emotion, the quilte orchestration.

The Adagio takes on humor—unintentionally, perhaps, which is all the worse—by balancing one dramatic conversational sectio against another of balletic triviality. The most captivating movement is the Allegretto grazioso, a waltz that unleashes the fire o the fiddles. The final Allegro presents the Slavonic dance in roya costume, announced by dignifie fanfares from the trumpets.

But whatever the value of this plushy music, it is a worthy revival. Mr. Munch's reading a usual with a score of this kinc was intense and enthusiastic.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 4 1951

PHILADELPHIA FORUM

Boston Symphony Coming; Munch to Wield Baton

PHILADELPHIA music lovers will be treated to an evening of enchanting music when the Boston Symphony comes to the Academy of Music on Monday evening, Feb. 12, under the direction of the Alsatian conductor, Charles Munch, to play again for subscribers of the Philadelphia Forum and other fortunate enough to obtain reservations.

The thrill still lingers from the time when Dr. Munch brought the Orchestra National de la Radiodiffusion Francaise here on a tour of this country in 1948, the season before he took over the conductorship of the Boston Symphony. Since that time he has made a distinctive record conducting the Boston Symphony which has emphasized and underscored the notable reputation which preceded his arrival in this country.

All-French Program

Dr. Munch's presentation of an all-French program at the forthcoming concert should be particularly felicitous in this music as he made his most striking impression in this work. And what he has done with the masterful organization since he first wielded the baton over its members has received wholehearted endorsement of both musicians and audience. As someone remarked, "he conducts like a medium, identifies himself with the orchestra members and they in turn are immersed in his mood. It is as if he were a hypnotist who communicates his will by his presence and by the enthusiasm which takes possession of him."

Perhaps the reason for his success lies in his understanding of people, especially musicians. He has been too long on the playing side of the orchestra not to know what is necessary to get the ultimate in cooperation from his men.

Receives Great Response

In reply to a criticism that he treats his men with too much respect, the director cited an instance where a fine conductor from a musical standpoint, in rehearsing demanded that his men repeat the same few bars over and over again as a point of discipline. "It isn't funny to be treated like a school boy, because I know. I have been playing in orchestras for years and I know what can make the work pleasant and what makes it unbearable."

There are two kinds of conductors. One presents a carefully prepared piece with the men sometimes near the exhaustion point after strenuous rehearsals, and the other offers a more spontaneous and exciting performance with musicians fresh and alert to every cue, though details might be glossed over somewhat. Dr. Munch belongs to the latter group, only he managed to take care of the details too.

At the Forum's presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Lincoln's birthday, slim blonde Parisienne Nicole Henriot will be piano soloist. Since making her American debut in 1948 and she is still in her early twenties, she has already appeared with 38 orchestras on three continents.

Soloist Is Veteran

Miss Henriot made her first appearance with the Boston Symphony two years ago playing the Liszt E-flat Concerto, receiving applause that was triumphant for a young pianist.

Nicole started studying piano at seven and entered the Paris Conservatoire. At 15 she made her debut with the Pasdeloup Orchestra and later appeared with the Brussels Philharmonic and at Liege and Anvers. After the fall of France she continued her career as an innocent cover for the Underground. She still bears the scars when the Gestapo knocked her unconscious in her home the morning after D-Day, but not before she disposed of incriminating papers hidden by her brother, an active member of the Resistance. For this bit of heroism she was decorated with the Badge of the Commandos d'Afrique given only to some three dozen civilians.

As soloist with the Forum's presentation of the Boston Symphony at the Academy she will play Ravel's sparkling Concerto.

Novelty in Selections

The symphonic program opens with a first hearing in Philadelphia of Saint-Saens Overture to the one-act opera "La Princesse Jaune." Next comes two numbers of Ravel, "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and the piano concerto.

Closing the interesting program will be Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique" Op. 14-A, an episode in the life of an artist.

A few choice seats are still available and can be obtained at the Academy of Music box-office.

FEBRUARY 8, 1951

—Preview of Prokofiev Sixth

Nicole Henriot, soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts this week end in Brahms Second Piano Concerto in B-flat major. Miss Henriot also will give a Jordan Hall recital on Feb. 25.

Munch to Give Symphony First Boston Performance

By Klaus G. Roy

The Sixth Symphony by the great contemporary Russian composer Serge Prokofiev, banned in his own country, comes to us as a phenomenon which is bound to unleash much political as well as musical comment. It would be inappropriate and perhaps ostrich-like to refrain at its first Boston Symphony performance this week end from discussing the implications of this work in both these spheres.

In his recently published book "Old Friends and New Music" Nicolas Nabokov writes of his good friend Prokofiev that he had always seemed to him "to be a kind of big baby who must tell the truth on all occasions, and for whom to conceal his personal opinions is the most difficult thing in the world."

♪ ♪ ♪

How meekly, albeit subtly, a composer of such forthright character had to react to the devastating reception that his Sixth Symphony and other late works received when the big musical purge began in January, 1948, only a few months after the première of the Sixth, we can gather from his letter to Tikhon Khrennikov (which may be found in Nicolas Slonimsky's "Music Since 1900"). Khrennikov, head of the Russian Composers' Union, had strongly echoed the decrees laid down by Andrei Zhdanov, who had castigated the works of Shostakovitch, Prokofiev, and others for their "formalistic distortions, the antidemocratic tendencies in music, alien to the Soviet taste," and had exhorted the composers to espouse the style of Tchaikovsky!

It is hardly possible to explain in a few words what "undemocratic and formalistic music" means to the Central Committee of the party. Anything that is not liked, or not immediately understood, can be simply branded in this fashion, and the rhythmical asymmetry of Prokofiev's Sixth, some of its uncompromisingly dissonant sections, may well have aroused ire.

♪ ♪ ♪

Its occasional complexity in the working out of themes and its use of traditional structures like the sonata form may have laid this highly emotionally conceived work open to charges of "formalism." This term is merely the opposite of "realism," which in its simplicity, mass appeal, use of folk-song and dance material is required to fulfill a social function in painting an optimistic picture of Soviet life.

In the process, "realism" may with impunity disregard most of the principles of musical aesthetics and formal logic which it has taken western civilization more than a thousand years to establish. It will be most fascinating to observe to what extent Prokofiev's Sixth has had to succumb and adapt itself stylistically to these dictates of the party, and whether its failure to please the Central Committee has weakened or improved it for western musical ears.

♪ ♪ ♪

Prokofiev himself described his symphony in these words, when he was writing it in 1945-46: "The first movement, of agitated character, is lyrical at times and austere at others. The second movement, Largo, is brighter and full of song. The finale, rapid and major, is near in character to my Fifth Symphony, but for the austere reminiscences of the first movement."

His restatement of an intensely serious section from the opening movement is perhaps the most striking feature of the work: it suddenly and perhaps symbolically breaks in on the Rossini-like dance themes of the finale and never allows them to gain dominance again.

♪ ♪ ♪

In the unusual and dark key of E-flat minor, the symphony takes about 45 minutes to play. Curiously, the very large orchestra it employs is exactly the same as in the Fifth, except that a celesta is now added to the piano, the harp, and the colorful battery of percussion which augment the full symphonic complement.

The work was first performed in this country by Leopold Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic in November of 1949, and it has recently been recorded by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. After its initial New York hearings, Robert Sabin wrote in Musical America that "it should prove popular with audiences that do not have to keep a weather eye cocked at Central Committees."

[232]

First Boston Performance Conducted by Charles Munch

By Harold Rogers

Many of those who hear the first Boston performances this week of Prokofiev's Sixth Symphony will doubtless wonder why, when it was first performed in Leningrad and later in Moscow in 1947, it offended the Central Committee of the Communist Party. Does it not have melody? Does it not have harmony? Is it not rather conventional when considered as a whole—even at times a bit trite?

In order to determine where the symphony missed the mark, it may be helpful to review briefly the main rules of Soviet musical dogma, enforced by a resolution of the Central Committee on Feb. 10, 1948:

1. Music must employ memorable melodies.

2. Music must be harmonic. It must not be atonal. It must not use "ear-splitting combination of sounds."

3. Music must not employ forms developed by the capitalistic bourgeoisie. These are considered decadent. Forms developed by the revolutionary bourgeoisie, however, are acceptable. Beethoven and Moussorgsky have been cited as acceptable examples. "Decadent bourgeois formalism" deals with sensual and pathologically erotic moods, mysticism, urbanism, and primitivism. These are taboo.

4. Music should propagandize "socialist realism" by taking advantage of the richness of folk melodies, songs, refrains, and dance airs.

5. Music should have an immediate appeal to the working masses.

6. Music should be of high quality.

* * *

Now let us see how Prokofiev fulfilled these demands and how he fell short of them. Charles Munch's brilliant reading of the Sixth with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon revealed certain facts and left some definite impressions:

1. The three-movement symphony is extremely melodic from first to last, even romantically so. These melodies, if heard as often as a popular song, would become fixed in memory.

2. The symphony is composed in the unusual key of E-flat minor. There is a sense of tonality throughout. The rhythms are conventional. Although a solid harmonic basis is always present, Prokofiev uses considerable dissonance as spice.

3. The form is not radically different from the sonata form used by Beethoven. There is no clear definition of "formalistic decadence," no sensual or erotic moods, no mysticism, no primitivism. In the first movement, however, there are touches of urbanism, or sound effects derived from city life.

4. The melodies are strongly stamped with folk character, thereby promoting "socialist realism."

5. The symphony may or may not have an immediate appeal to the working masses. But to the seasoned concertgoer it is decidedly old-fashioned.

6. The quality is high, but not so high as Prokofiev can attain. One cannot submit to the demands of popularization and maintain high quality.

* * *

According to the foregoing analysis, Prokofiev was only slightly more than 15 per cent disobedient in that he used some dissonance, some urbanism, and may not have appealed to the masses. It is obvious in the Sixth Symphony that Prokofiev was leaning over backward to produce a popular work, even to such an extent that there are strong reminders of Tchaikovsky and Sibelius. But if it has been hushed in Russia, we can be grateful that it is not hushed elsewhere. The melodies — whether sweeping, poignant, or trivial—were delineated by Mr. Munch with verve and power.

In the last half of the program Nicole Henriot carried off the honors as soloist in Brahms' magnificent Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2 in B-flat minor. While she is the same brilliant technician now that she was when she made her Boston debut about three years ago, a deeper quality is appearing in her work—a quality which, when fully developed, will place her in a class with the great interpreters. At present she is a brilliant concerto pianist whose incisive touch speaks with independence. She need never fear that her playing will be overpowered by either a heavy orchestral texture or too much volume. Miss Henriot's dynamic drive makes certain of that.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 10 1951

MUSIC

Prokofieff Sixth at Symphony; Henriot Plays Brahms B-Flat Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch introduced the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff to Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. There was but one other piece on the program, Brahms' B-flat Piano Concerto, the soloist for which was Nicole Henriot, the young French musician already much admired here. This was an absorbing and pleasurable concert, heard by an audience who left few seats vacant, and which aroused considerable enthusiastic applause, both after symphony and concerto.

To those who follow the current trends in phonograph records, the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff already had been available. Between its preservation on discs and "live" concert performance there seemed to be only a difference of orchestral weight; that was more apparent, naturally, in the concert hall. This is a symphony structurally big, like its notable immediate predecessor, the Fifth. But where the Fifth was truly contemporary, the Sixth impresses me as looking backward. You could discern suggestions, if not actual reminiscences, of Prokofieff's own post, and even some echoes from a late romantic like Rachmaninoff.

Now this is no fault save that it is not the true, the pure Prokofieff, in all this other work that I know, a consistent modern. That orchestral weight aforementioned makes for a pretty thick texture, and obscures to some degree the spicy dissonance heretofore typical of the composer.

The Sixth Symphony, however, is not something to be assayed on brief acquaintance. It deserves repeated hearings, considering the stature of its creator and the large, rather formidable character of the score itself. Familiarity will tell us more than we now know about it.

Miss Henriot's appearance had been joyously anticipated, and her work yesterday aroused noisy approval. It may seem unfortunate, therefore, to spill some chilling rain into this tonal sunshine. But it seemed to me that the Brahms B-flat Concerto required a performance of broader style and more full-blown emotion than it received from either orchestra or soloist.

This was a decidedly pleasant performance, make no mistake, but episidic, and it seemed to reduce the work to miniature proportions, save in the slow movement, where Mr. Munch and Miss Henriot were at their best. In the other three movements, this seemed to be a concerto with, rather than for plane And to my ear, there were about two octaves upward from middle C, on the instrument Miss Henriot used, not of the best sonority.

These reservations are relative, however, and while neither Mr. Munch nor Miss Henriot realized their electrifying best, their work was by no means perfunctory or lacking vigor, Mr. Munch rightly singled out for applause the first cellist, Samuel Mayes, who had played the solo in the slow movement with absolute beauty of tone and phrasing.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 1 1951

MUSIC

Prokofieff Sixth at Symphony; Henriot Plays Brahms B-Flat Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch introduced the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff to Boston yesterday afternoon at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. There was but one other piece on the program, Brahms' B-flat Piano Concerto, the soloist for which was Nicole Henriot, the young French musician already much admired here. This was an absorbing and pleasurable concert, heard by an audience who left few seats vacant, and which aroused considerable enthusiastic applause, both after symphony and concerto.

To those who follow the current trends in phonograph records, the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff already had been available. Between its preservation on discs and "live" concert performance there seemed to be only a difference of orchestral weight; that was more apparent, naturally, in the concert hall. This is a symphony structurally big, like its notable immediate predecessor, the Fifth. But where the Fifth was truly contemporary, the Sixth impresses me as looking backward. You could discern suggestions, if not actual reminiscences, of Prokofieff's own post, and even some echoes from a late romantic like Rachmaninoff.

Now this is no fault save that it is not the true, the pure Prokofieff, in all this other work that I know, a consistent modern. That orchestral weight aforementioned makes for a pretty thick texture, and obscures to some degree the spicy dissonance heretofore typical of the composer.

The Sixth Symphony, however, is not something to be assayed on brief acquaintance. It deserves repeated hearings, considering the stature of its creator and the large, rather formidable character of the score itself. Familiarity will tell us more than we now know about it.

Miss Henriot's appearance had been joyously anticipated, and her work yesterday aroused noisy approval. It may seem unfortunate, therefore, to spill some chilling rain into this tonal sunshine. But it seemed to me that the Brahms B-flat Concerto required a performance of broader style and more full-blown emotion than it received from either orchestra or soloist.

This was a decidedly pleasant performance, make no mistake, but episidic, and it seemed to reduce the work to miniature proportions, save in the slow movement, where Mr. Munch and Miss Henriot were at their best. In the other three movements, this seemed to be a concerto with, rather than for plane And to my ear, there were about two octaves upward from middle C, on the instrument Miss Henriot used, not of the best sonority.

These reservations are relative, however, and while neither Mr. Munch nor Miss Henriot realized their electrifying best, their work was by no means perfunctory or lacking vigor, Mr. Munch rightly singled out for applause the first cellist, Samuel Mayes, who had played the solo in the slow movement with absolute beauty of tone and phrasing.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 10 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 16th program of the 75th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Nicolle Henriot, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 6 in E flat minor, Op. 111 . . . . Prokofieff
Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Op. 83 . . Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Two masterworks made yesterday's program notable, one that after 70 years still retains its place among the greatest concertos for the piano, the other new to Boston but displaying every sign of enduring.

The new one was the Sixth Symphony of Serge Prokofieff, the symphony that brought down the axe of the Central Committee of the Communist Party upon the composer and resulted in his famous letter of apology to the party—a letter, incidentally, that failed to prevent the composer's fall from grace apparently for good. It appears that the Party wanted Prokofieff to write music the good comrades could whistle on their way to the salt mines. Unfortunately Prokofieff, who has turned out many a whistling tune in his time (Peter's tune in "Peter and the Wolf," for one), felt his talents went a little beyond jocose ditties for the Red Pioneers.

As it turns out this was, and evidently still is, his personal tragedy, but it has enriched the world's music beyond measure. Yet there is no question in my mind, reflecting on the direction Prokofieff's music has taken both in this and the Fifth Symphony, that a great measure of his personal tragedy has crept into his late works.

It is true that there are suggestions, in the Sixth, of the Prokofieff of a happier day; the humor, the irony, the sophistication, the inventiveness and lyrical quality and power of expression. In the Sixth, indeed, there are fleeting reminiscences of everything from "Alexander Nevsky" (composed when Prokofieff had gone whole-heartedly back into the fold) to the urbane modulatory freedom of the Classical Symphony. Yet over the whole there is clearly an atmosphere of deeply introspective melancholy.

The first movement is especially bleak in this respect, yet the slow movement with all its lyrical feeling is dark and brooding, too. Even after the finale has broken out into its syncopated march-like rhythmical impetus, the mood is often broken with disquietingly tragic stresses. The Iron Curtain being what it is we have no way of knowing whether Prokofieff, who is an ill man in any case, has further symphonic plans; it well could be that this will prove to be his last big work. In any case, it will take many hearings to be properly evaluated though it certainly achieved considerable popular success yesterday afternoon in a powerful and devoted performance by conductor and orchestra.

Brahms' Concerto

In the Brahms' B-flat Piano Concerto Nicole Henriot returned to demonstrate for good and all that she has few equals among the women pianists of the day and none at all among those of her generation. A work to exhaust the bodies and try the souls of most male pianists, the B-flat, like its perhaps greater predecessor the D-minor, is nothing to be trifled with. Brahms' keyboard style is peculiarly difficult even in the lesser things; in the B-flat, which is more a symphony for piano and orchestra than a concerto intended to display mere virtuosity, extreme technical security must be combined with great musicianship, too.

These two qualities Mlle. Henriot had beyond a question. She had great physical strength to achieve dash and bravura where needed (and where this diminutive creature gets it is beyond me), but she had poetry, too, and seriousness of purpose. It might be charged that her tone production was occasionally harsh, but this charge is more rightly levelled at the piano. We seem to be plagued around here with pianos that are either out of tune or harshly voiced. A word for the orchestral accompaniment, which was generally superb, and for the solo 'cello, in the slow movement, of Samuel Mayes, which was always superb. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning under Richard Burgin on Feb. 23 to do Wolf's Italian Serenade, Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, and Brahms' G minor Quintet set for orchestra by Schoenberg.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening's Symphony Concert introduced to America a young French violinist of remarkable attainments, 20-year-old Michele Auclair. Miss Auclair is an artist of the stature of those other young women of postwar France, the late Ginette Neveu, whose violin playing was of a more strenuous order than Miss Auclair's, and the pianist, Nicole Henriot.

Add to this list the cellist, Pierre Fournier, who made his Boston debut at last week's concerts and will shortly be heard here in recital, and our debt to France is considerable.

For some reason, the young Latins are turning to Tcaikovsky. Not long ago Aldo Ciccolini made his local bow in the First Piano Concerto and Miss Auclair chose the Violin Concerto for her debut. Their treatment of him is more refined, more subtle and elegant than that of Russian or Russian-trained artists, and the music undergoes a certain transformation.

The finale of the Violin Concerto, that prompted Vienna's Hanslick to exclamations about coarse faces, bad brandy and music that offended the ear, sounded last evening almost Mendelssohnian in its grace and fluency. This is partly the passage of time, but it was also Miss Auclair's approach, in which she was seconded throughout the work by Mr. Munch and the orchestra.

Anyway, the Concerto, which has become somewhat shopworn of late, was in their combined hands a thing of beauty and rare delight. The performance of the slow movement was especially notable. Miss Auclair, who is blonde and slender almost to the point of fragility, was received by last evening's audience with the enthusiasm she deserved.

The evening began with Saint-Saens' charming and clever Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," which Mr. Munch added to the orchestra's repertory only last week, and concluded with a work that he has made particularly his own, the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

MUSIC

Michele Auclair Makes U. S. Debut at Symphony in Tchaikovsky Concerto

By CYRUS DURGIN

Michle Auclair made her American debut at Symphony Hall last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth concert of the Tuesday series. She played the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto. Charles Munch began the evening with Saint-Saens' quaint old quasi-Oriental Overture to "La Princesse Jaune," and ended it with Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symjhony.

Mlle. Auclair is a blonde Parisian only 20 years old, and so slender that she looks hardly strong enough to stand up to such a large Concerto. But already she is known through Europe and South America, and already she plays with a maturity far beyond her years.

She bows well, with security and poise. Her finger technic is exact, and no matter how big the leap, she will always land on a high harmonic right in the center of the pitch. Her chromatic chords are accurately intoned, even though she slides a bit getting them. But best of all, she plays with high intelligence and understanding of what she is about.

She did not perform the Tchaikovsky Concerto with any emphasis upon its spectacular elements: in fact, she was a bit subdued. But the fireworks were there, all the same, and fell naturally into place. She really "sang" the slow movement and within the comparatively small frame of her interpretation the proportion was right, the balance correct and details were neat and clear.

Here, obviously, is an unusual talent and it promises as much for the future as it already has accomplished. It would be nice to hear her again in a concert of her own. Last night Mlle. Auclair reaped generous and enthusiastic applause.

The big moments of the evening, so far as excitement went, occurred in Berlioz' wonderfully passionate "Fantastic" Symphony. Mr Munch has played this before and Symphony goers know full well the clarity, ardor and rich color that characterizes his reading. But every so often—perhaps when the stars are just right or something—you will hear a super-performance larger than life and 10 times more exciting. That was what happened last night and the work seethed and glowed, and, finally in the finale, exploded in a marvelous display of orchestral virtuosity. If you heard it you'll never forget it.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
FEB 10 1951

Lenscraft Photos

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, former conductor, shake hands just before Monteux began rehearsals of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printempts."

Up From Fiasco to Triumph

By Harold Rogers

"Le Sacre du Printemps," said Pierre Monteux recently, could easily have expired after he conducted its first performance at the Paris Théâtre de Champs Elysées on May 29, 1913, had it not been for one thing.

Following the fiasco (a riot too often described for repetition here) Monteux asked Stravinsky to prepare his score for performance as an orchestral piece so that the audience, undistracted by balletic action, could devote its attention to the music. Stravinsky agreed.

Monteux conducted this second performance on April 5, 1914, at the Casino de Paris—and with some success. Thus he rescued the "enfant terrible" and launched it on a career that was soon to establish it as a 20th-century musical giant, a stature it still possesses, after 38 years.

But as these first performances of "Le Sacre" are of historic importance, so also are the three recently conducted by Monteux in his triumphant return to Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. How fitting that this conductor, whose first performance of the work was all but drowned in a riptide of disapproval, should be the same man to see it enthusiastically accepted and acclaimed.

American Première

It took some time, however, for public response to progress from cold disdain to warm approval. "Le Sacre" did not reach London until 1921. The first American performance (not received too kindly) took place in 1922 with Leopold Stokowski conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra. While Pierre Monteux was regular conductor of the Boston Symphony (1919-1924) he gave the Boston and New York premières in January of 1924.

But even though these readings by Monteux received the sunniest critical acclaim, Stravinsky's halting rhythms, asymmetric phrases, modalities, and bitonalities still fell strangely on many an ear.

John Burk, whose scholarly notes have graced the Boston Symphony programs for some years, told me that Monteux's first Boston performance stirred up a great deal of controversy. The conductor had scheduled "Le Sacre" as an extra—"by general request"—following compositions by Franck, Chopin, and Berlioz. Nearly everyone stayed to hear it. Some, however, left the hall while it was being played.

"The work had a reputation, of course, before a note was heard," Mr. Burk said. "People became very excited. It made some angry; it thrilled others. Many were stunned or puzzled—it seemed pretty crazy on first hearing. Yet you felt its strength and were impressed by its innovations and the technical skill by which it was put together. There was much applause afterwards, mostly because of the feat Monteux had accomplished in playing it. It was quite a stunt."

Critics' Comments

Here are some of the critics' reactions to "Le Sacre" when Monteux played it 27 years ago. Warren Storey Smith made the following observation in the Boston Post:

"... in Boston there was no audible protest against Stravinsky's music either on Friday afternoon or on Saturday evening, although many in both audiences did 'walk out on it,' not only in the pauses between the two parts, but even while the music was in progress.

be sure, a few ear-splitting effects still stabbed the tympanum. But the human ear is a marvelously adaptable mechanism; indeed, the whole history of music is summed up in the unescapable fact that the dissonances of one generation are the consonances of the next."

Lawrence Gilman, writing in the New York Tribune after Monteux's first New York performance, wrote:

"What Stravinsky has made of this conception is one of the marvelous things of art—and we fancy it will remain so—a thing of gigantic strength, of terrifying intensity, of overwhelming imaginative veracity. Stravinsky may transcend it, may outgrow it, may disown it; but it will remain a lonely and incomparable achievement, an authentic masterpiece."

And H. T. Parker observed (in the Boston Evening Transcript) that "only the future may decide with finality which among the compositions so far written in the twentieth century has most of genuine significance. But regarded in the light of present knowledge there appears little reason to doubt that Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre du Printemps' has the strongest claim to that distinction."

What these critics wrote in 1924, has been confirmed 27 years later. After Monteux's recent performance of "Le Sacre" in Boston, Warren Storey Smith exclaimed: "This is it! This is the way it should be played!"

Nicolas Slonimsky, after hearing it the following evening, said that it was the finest performance he had ever heard. "The clarity was simply amazing," he said. "That's the way Stravinsky should be conducted—like Mozart!".

Mr. Monteux's performance was not only a staggering feat of memory, conducting as he did with no score. There was a satisfying sense of rightness in every detail among a multitude of details; this was a definitive reading. The music was not mauled, smeared, or twisted, but sensuously moving, sharply defined, dynamic in impact.

There were few dissenting opinions after this performance. Nearly all of the listeners stood at their seats, applauding, cheering, stamping the floor, shouting bravos, and recalling Monteux again and again to the podium.

A Welcome, Plus

Some of the applause doubtless expressed a warm welcome to Monteux upon his return to Boston. But Boston's concertgoers have now heard "Le Sacre" enough to know when it is superlatively played. They are also better prepared to appreciate it through having heard scores by Milhaud, Shostakovitch, Prokofiev, Messiaen, and other composers whose works have sounded Stravinskian overtones. Then, too, the Boston Symphony has now played "Le Sacre" 38 times.

Monteux's 1913 performance in Paris was recorded only in the controversy which surrounded it. But his 1951 performance—the definitive reading—was recorded in a more useful and tangible way by RCA Victor before the conductor returned to San Francisco. It will therefore be available to present and future generations of music lovers.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 11 1951

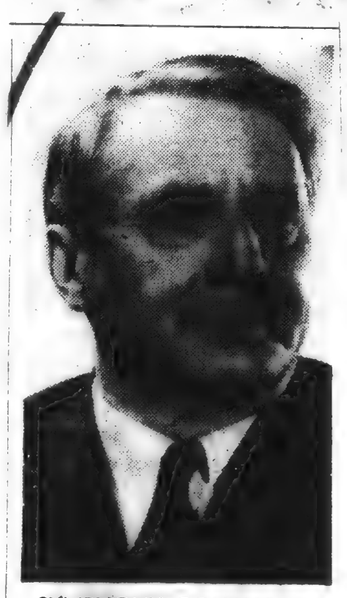
NICOLE HENRIOT,
Young French pianist, soloist with the Boston Symphony Tuesday night.

Nicole Henriot Symphony Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings a young pianist, Nicole Henriot, as soloist Tuesday night at 8:30 to Constitution Hall. The artist, now in her 25th year, made her New York debut under Munch 10 years ago with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Since then she appeared in recital and as soloist with major orchestral groups in this country and Canada, Cuba and South America. For the past three years Munch had her as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

After the fall of France, Miss Henriot used concertizing as a cover for her work with the underground. She still bears scars from wounds received the morning after D-Day in 1944. At that time the Gestapo raided her home and knocked her unconscious. She had managed to dispose of incriminating papers hidden by her brother, an active member of the resistance. She was decorated by the French government with the badge of the Commandos d'Afrique, an award made to only a few dozen civilians.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 11 1951



SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR
Charles Munch with Boston Symphony, Forum, coming to Academy, tomorrow.

This Clipping From
RALEIGH, N. C.
TIMES
FEB 12 1951

Music Lovers Air Grievances

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12 —(INS)— Washington music lovers are up in arms today over the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert March 31 in honor of French President Vincent Auriol.

Supporters of the National Symphony Orchestra insisted that the honor should have been given to the hometown musicians.

In a Sunday broadcast, Patrick Hayes, prominent music and civic figure, accused the State Department, which made the announcement, of "an affront to the people of Metropolitan Washington."

But the state department denied any complicity in the matter. All arrangements, a spokesman said, were made by the French Embassy.

Jean - Pierre Benard, Embassy first Secretary, said the initiative came from French-born Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

"It was an open date at Constitutional Hall," he explained, "and the Boston Symphony decided to fill it. The national Symphony didn't make any offer."

Hayes later admitted that the National Symphony did not offer to play, "but neither was it invited," he added.

Hayes took up the cudgels after Paul Hume, music critic of the Washington Post, first brandished the cause of native pride.

Some concert - goers, however, felt it wasn't that bad. On April 4, the National Symphony will perform Beethoven's ninth (choral Symphony, Mitchell conducting, in honor of the foreign ministers.

220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 173,817) (S 181,7[illegible])
This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D.C.
POST
FEB 11 1951

The Blightmore Question:

Who'll Play for M. Auriol?

By Paul Hume

BY the time for my appointment with Citronella Blightmore, the weather outside was so bad I thought she might not show up.

I should have known that neither rain nor sleet nor howling wind could stay a Blightmore in her flight, if she was flying to discuss any aspect of Washington's musical life. Right on the hour, Miss B. hove in sight, well furred and blowing as she came.

Even a Blightmore makes the customary comments on the weather but it didn't take long.

"BUT I didn't come here to discuss the weather," ended the subject. "Here is my agenda for our little conversation this afternoon." And out came the most detailed list of subjects, all connected with the National Symphony.

"May I compare them with mine?" I asked, getting out my list. The points were similar. (1) The present financial campaign. (2) Next year's sale of subscription tickets. (3) Plans for the summer, if any. (4) Is Wednesday the best night in the week for concerts, and should they all be on Wednesdays?

"Those should keep us talking for hours," I suggested.

"Not if we don't get started," Citry snapped. (Citry was an old nickname I had been furnished by a lifetime friend who wrote me recently. He suggested I ought to meet Pruny, too. He said Prunella was a younger and somewhat more tractable member of the family. I don't see what tractability has to do with it at all.)

"WELL, before we get into these," I interrupted, "there is a matter which has recently come up that I'd like to ask you about."

"If the President of France were coming to the United States to visit the President here in Washington, as he is in March," I began. "And if they wanted a symphony orchestra concert for him during his short stay here, what orchestra do you think would do the playing in the Nation's Capital?"

Blightmores spend their lives not being surprised. But the look on Miss C's face was not a usual one.

"Why, the National Symphony Orchestra, of course. It's the only orchestra in Washington, and it can be proud of its American conductor. And what's she rushed ahead. "It's good enough for any visitor, American or European."

SHE STOPPED for second. Then, with a suspicious tone, she said, "Mr. Hume, what makes you ask such a question? Why, Mr. Hume, I know for a fact that the State Department has asked the National Symphony to play the final concert on its Wednesday series, on April 4, for the meeting of Foreign Ministers who will be here then. And that's the concert featuring the Beethoven ninth symphony. And the State Department asked Mr. Mitchell to include an important American work with the Beethoven. And he is arranging to do that."

"Mr. Hume! You don't mean to tell me in the face of that, that the National Symphony would not be the orchestra to play for the President of France when he is here!"

"NO IT WON'T," I said. "The way things look now, the Nation's Capital, with its own great orchestra, its own native conductor, and its own musical life are going to be passed over, incredible as it seems.

"If the French President were going to Philadelphia or Boston, or Chicago, you can bet that the orchestra of that city would play for him. But in Washington, the President of France has been invited to hear a program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be brought nearly 500 miles for the occasion. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year has not played one iota better than the National Symphony."

I had run out of breath, and my voice had risen too far for politeness. But I wish you could have seen Citronella Blightmore right then. She was a gorgeous purple.

"MR. HUME, I have never heard of such a thing. Who is responsible for that kind of ridiculous planning? Why the Boston Symphony? True, they have a French conductor, but if he is to be honored, why cannot he conduct a part of a program with the National Symphony? Or else let him come here and be decorated or whatever they want to do, and let him and the French President and our own President hear a concert by our own orchestra. But the idea of passing over the National Symphony when a foreign President comes to Washington is too unthinkable to allow it to stand!"

Miss Blightmore took out her State Department phone book and began looking up names. "I have a few friends I am going to call," she said. "I don't know that it will do any good at all, but I am going to tell them what I think."

"Oh, but Miss Blightmore, you mustn't blame it on the State Department," I said. "They have no official connection with it at all."

"Official stuff!" she shot at me. "I am so burned up about this that I want everyone to know about it. And I don't think it is a bit too late to do something about it."

"MR. HUME, it has stopped snowing outside," she announced. "I am going out to visit some friends of mine in various offices. I am far too upset to discuss those other things we were going to talk about. If all the people who believe in the National Symphony Orchestra, and are supporting it so well in its financial campaign, see something like this other business going on, I should think they would have every right to feel that they were being shoved around. It's high time the National Symphony was given the recognition it deserves, and I am going to do what I can to blow this thing sky high!"

And with that, Citronella Blightmore departed.

Having agreed with everything she said, I decided other matters could wait for a while.

What do you think?

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 13 1951

DID NOT ARRANGE CONCERT

Washington, Feb. 12 (AP)—The State Department said today it had nothing to do with arrangements for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the capital during the forthcoming visit of French President Vincent Auriol.

The orchestra has scheduled a concert here March 31. Auriol is due for a three-day state visit on March 28.

The Boston Orchestra arranged the concert with the visit in view. The arrangement was criticized yesterday by Patrick J. Hays, local concert manager and former manager of Washington's National Symphony as a slap to the local group.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

You had to rub your eyes at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to convince yourself that Charles Munch and not Serge Koussevitzky was conducting this 15th program of the current Symphony series. There are only two numbers on this list, a favorite Koussevitzky trick, and one of them is the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff that Koussevitzky had once counted on introducing here. Not before had Mr. Munch conducted Prokofieff's music in Boston.

After Prokofieff came Brahms, as he will again tonight, by way of the Second Piano Concerto, with Nicole Henriot as the soloist. For the second time within a few weeks, a Brahms piano concerto has brought up the rear. It cannot happen again this season, since he wrote but two.

The Prokofieff Sixth, completed in 1947, is the work that incriminated Prokofieff in the eyes of Soviet officialdom and put his name at the head of the seven composers who were accused of concocting "confusing and neuropathic combinations of sounds." But do not get the idea that the Symphony fits this description. Quite the contrary.

There is a school of thought that holds that these composers were "purged," not because of their alleged devotion to "formalism" and decadent Western ideals, but because they were getting a bit too good, and the public was acquiring an affection for them that exceeded its love for its rulers. Be that as it may, the new Symphony proved melodious, easy to follow on a single hearing (though each of the movements is of considerable length) and, in the main, of a genuinely emotional content. The conspicuous and no doubt unintentional quoting of a motive associated with Amfortas in "Parsifal," in a recurring theme of the Largo, gives a clue to the general character of this movement, which is interrupted by a martial episode that suggests Shostakovitch. At first, the latter sometimes made you think of Prokofieff; and now it is getting to be the other way around.

The Symphony obviously pleased the audience, and Mr. Munch, who conducted it with devotion and understanding, could have felt well repaid. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration at the end, over Miss Henriot. But to tell the truth, the Brahms Concerto did not seem to be the dynamic French girl's particular dish. Nor Mr. Munch's for that matter. The first two movements just didn't ring true. The Andante, in which Miss Henriot was abetted by first cellist Samuel Mayes, went better and there was enough life and brilliance in the final Allegretto grazioso to precipitate the ovation mentioned above. One recalls more pleasantly Miss Henriot's performances of concertos by Liszt and Ravel.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 11 1951

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Orchestrally speaking, the present season has been a maker of records and a breaker of precedents. Orchestras from overseas are rare enough in any season and we have had two, the Royal Philharmonic of London and the Israel Philharmonic. Not until Koussevitzky came here in November had the immediately preceding Symphony conductor appeared in the role of guest-leader and to climax that, he was followed a few weeks later by his predecessor, Pierre Monteux. Only once before, in fact, had an ex-conductor made a guest-appearance and that was in 1931, at the beginning of the 50th season, when the original conductor, Sir George Henchel, directed the first pair of concerts. Besides having Koussevitzky with our orchestra, we also had him at one of the two concerts of the Israel Philharmonic, while the second one introduced to us Izler Solomon, one of the several young Americans who are taking the orchestras that once fell to, or, in the old days, would have fallen to Europeans. Finally, the British orchestra brought us what, by stretching a point, we might call an old friend, Sir Thomas Beecham.

* * *

Just to make a good story out of it and to show how rich and varied our orchestral life is, I might add that we have also heard the Conservatory Orchestra under Malcolm Holmes, the Civic Symphony under Paul Cherkassky, and, across the Charles, the Harvard and Radcliffe Orchestra under a young conductor of great promise, Boston's Russell Stanger. That we can produce conductors as well as orchestras in this country is a most hopeful sign. We have owed much to the Europeans, but there is no reason why some day we should not be able to get along without them. If the supposedly unmusical English have brought forth a Halle, a Wood, a Coates, a Barbirolli, a Boult, a Sargent, a Goossens, and a Beecham, we ought to do as well. The point is that if England had insisted on Continental conductors, these men wouldn't have had a chance to prove their worth.

* * *

Certainly there was nothing in Mr. Solomon's conducting, as one concert revealed it, to suggest that he was any less gifted or accomplished for having been born in St. Paul rather than in what then (1911) would have been St. Petersburg. The orchestra, which he had led on its home grounds and, incidentally, during the hostilities with the Arabs, was completely under his control. There could be no quarrelling with his interpretation of C. P. E. Bach, Mozart, Israeli's Lavry, or Brahms. In fact, the performance of the Brahms Second was outstanding, one of the most gratifying we have heard in recent years. Here, for a welcome change, was eloquence without distortion, a reading that was engrossing without violation of what we may assume to have been the composer's intentions. The gravely serious slow movement aside, this is essentially a serene work, one in which feverish excitements are out of place. One detail is worthy of mention: the syncopated second subject of the finale invites an irreverent and un-Brahmsian jazzing. Instead of this false jauntiness, Mr. Solomon gave it weight and dignity.

* * *

This proved one of the memorable performances of the season. Another and even more notable one, if only because of its historic associations, was that of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" under Mr. Monteux. Even if the distinguished guest had failed to disclose the full measure of the piece's significance, the mere fact that it was he who had introduced it to the world 38 years before, and to Boston and New York 11 years later, would have made the occasion a notable one. But the point is that, both from the standpoint of the conductor's approach and of the orchestra's response to his wishes, this performance may be looked upon as the definitive one. Fortunately for posterity, the Victor Company took advantage of this unique opportunity and made a recording that should turn out to be the most prized version to date, not excepting the composer's own. Interpretatively, Mr. Monteux sees eye-to-eye with Stravinsky in this matter. His reading of the monumental score had the complete objectivity that is here in order. Those who prefer the romantic version of Koussevitzky or the dithyrambic one of Bernstein are welcome to them. I will stay with Monteux.

The extraordinary clarity, the machine-like precision that the Boston Symphony exhibited in that historic performance would not have been possible under either of the temperamental leaders that succeeded Monteux. Truth to tell, he is not the most exciting of conductors. There was, at least on Friday, a certain lack of imagination in the projection of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, while the Beethoven Fourth, the remaining number on the program, was if anything too classic in feeling. But even here it was good for once to be free of conductorial frenzies and to know that everything would come off, that everything would be heard and in the right relation to everything else, and that come what might, we would not be blasted out of our seats.

* * *

At the Opera House this afternoon the New England Opera Theatre will present Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin." Dorothy Maynor, soprano, sings at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, plays at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

As part of its Festival of American Music, Boston University will give a free concert of chamber music at Jordan Hall tomorrow evening.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
FEB 13 1951

Music Row Explodes in Washington

(International News Service)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13—Washington music lovers are up in arms today over the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert March 31 in honor of French President Vincent Auriol.

Supporters of the National Symphony Orchestra insisted that the honor should have been given to the hometown musicians.

In a Sunday broadcast, Patrick Hayes, prominent music and civic figure, accused the state department, which made the announcement, of "an affront to the people of metropolitan Washington."

But the state department denied any complicity in the matter. All arrangements, a spokesman said, were made by the French embassy.

Jean-Pierre Benard, embassy first secretary, said the initiative came from French-born Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston orchestra.

"It was an open date at Constitution Hall," he explained. "When the Boston Symphony decided to fill it. The National Symphony didn't make any offer."

Hayes later admitted that the National Symphony did not care to play. "But neither was it invited," he added.

Hayes took up the cudgels after Paul Hume, music critic of the Washington Post, first brandished the cause of native pride.

Some concertgoers, however, felt it wasn't that bad. On April 4, the National Symphony will perform Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, Mitchell conducting, in honor of the foreign ministers.

[235]

220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. Chelsea 3-6960
Cir. (D 173,817) (S 181,7[illegible])
This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D.C.
POST
FEB 11 1951

The Blightmore Question:

Who'll Play for M. Auriol?

By Paul Hume

BY the time for my appointment with Citronella Blightmore, the weather outside was so bad I thought she might not show up.

I should have known that neither rain nor sleet nor howling wind could stay a Blightmore in her flight, if she was flying to discuss any aspect of Washington's musical life. Right on the hour, Miss B. hove in sight, well furred and blowing as she came.

Even a Blightmore makes the customary comments on the weather but it didn't take long.

"BUT I didn't come here to discuss the weather," ended the subject. "Here is my agenda for our little conversation this afternoon." And out came the most detailed list of subjects, all connected with the National Symphony.

"May I compare them with mine?" I asked, getting out my list. The points were similar. (1) The present financial campaign. (2) Next year's sale of subscription tickets. (3) Plans for the summer, if any. (4) Is Wednesday the best night in the week for concerts, and should they all be on Wednesdays?

"Those should keep us talking for hours," I suggested.

"Not if we don't get started," Citry snapped. (Citry was an old nickname I had been furnished by a lifetime friend who wrote me recently. He suggested I ought to meet Pruny, too. He said Prunella was a younger and somewhat more tractable member of the family. I don't see what tractability has to do with it at all.)

"WELL, before we get into these," I interrupted, "there is a matter which has recently come up that I'd like to ask you about."

"If the President of France were coming to the United States to visit the President here in Washington, as he is in March," I began. "And if they wanted a symphony orchestra concert for him during his short stay here, what orchestra do you think would do the playing in the Nation's Capital?"

Blightmores spend their lives not being surprised. But the look on Miss C's face was not a usual one.

"Why, the National Symphony Orchestra, of course. It's the only orchestra in Washington, and it can be proud of its American conductor. And what's she rushed ahead. "It's good enough for any visitor, American or European."

SHE STOPPED for second. Then, with a suspicious tone, she said, "Mr. Hume, what makes you ask such a question? Why, Mr. Hume, I know for a fact that the State Department has asked the National Symphony to play the final concert on its Wednesday series, on April 4, for the meeting of Foreign Ministers who will be here then. And that's the concert featuring the Beethoven ninth symphony. And the State Department asked Mr. Mitchell to include an important American work with the Beethoven. And he is arranging to do that."

"Mr. Hume! You don't mean to tell me in the face of that, that the National Symphony would not be the orchestra to play for the President of France when he is here!"

"NO IT WON'T," I said. "The way things look now, the Nation's Capital, with its own great orchestra, its own native conductor, and its own musical life are going to be passed over, incredible as it seems.

"If the French President were going to Philadelphia or Boston, or Chicago, you can bet that the orchestra of that city would play for him. But in Washington, the President of France has been invited to hear a program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be brought nearly 900 miles for the occasion. And the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year has not played one iota better than the National Symphony."

I had run out of breath, and my voice had risen too far for politeness. But I wish you could have seen Citronella Blightmore right then. She was a gorgeous purple.

"MR. HUME, I have never heard of such a thing. Who is responsible for that kind of ridiculous planning? Why the Boston Symphony? True, they have a French conductor, but if he is to be honored, why cannot he conduct a part of a program with the National Symphony? Or else let him come here and be decorated or whatever they want to do, and let him and the French President and our own President hear a concert by our own orchestra. But the idea of passing over the National Symphony when a foreign President comes to Washington is too unthinkable to allow it to stand!"

Miss Blightmore took out her State Department phone book and began looking up names. "I have a few friends I am going to call," she said. "I don't know that it will do any good at all, but I am going to tell them what I think."

"Oh, but Miss Blightmore, you mustn't blame it on the State Department," I said. "They have no official connection with it at all."

"Official stuff!" she shot at me. "I am so burned up about this that I want everyone to know about it. And I don't think it is a bit too late to do something about it."

"MR. HUME, it has stopped snowing outside," she announced. "I am going out to visit some friends of mine in various offices. I am far too upset to discuss these other things we were going to talk about. If all the people who believe in the National Symphony Orchestra and are supporting it so well in its financial campaign, see something like this other business going on, I should think they would have every right to feel that they were being shoved around. It's high time the National Symphony was given the recognition it deserves, and I am going to do what I can to blow this thing sky high!"

And with that, Citronella Blightmore departed.

Having agreed with [illegible] she said, I decided either [illegible] could wait for a while.

What do you think [illegible]

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 13 1951

DID NOT ARRANGE CONCERT

Washington, Feb. 12 (AP)—The State Department said today it had nothing to do with arrangements for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the capital during the forthcoming visit of French President Vincent Auriol.

The orchestra has scheduled a concert here March 31. Auriol is due for a three-day state visit on March 28.

The Boston Orchestra arranged the concert with the visit in view. The arrangement was criticized yesterday by Patrick J. Hays, local concert manager and former manager of Washington's National Symphony [illegible] to [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

You had to rub your eyes at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to convince yourself that Charles Munch and not Serge Koussevitzky was conducting this 15th program of the current Symphony series. There are only two numbers on this list, a favorite Koussevitzky trick, and one of them is the Sixth Symphony of Prokofieff that Koussevitzky had once counted on introducing here. Not before had Mr. Munch conducted Prokofieff's music in Boston.

After Prokofieff came Brahms, as he will again tonight, by way of the Second Piano Concerto, with Nicole Henriot as the soloist. For the second time within a few weeks, a Brahms piano concerto has brought up the rear. It cannot happen again this season, since he wrote but two.

The Prokofieff Sixth, completed in 1947, is the work that incriminated Prokofieff in the eyes of Soviet officialdom and put his name at the head of the seven composers who were accused of concocting "confusing and neuropathic combinations of sounds." But do not get the idea that the Symphony fits this description. Quite the contrary.

There is a school of thought that holds that these composers were "purged," not because of their alleged devotion to "formalism" and decadent Western ideals, but because they were getting a bit too good, and the public was acquiring an affection for them that exceeded its love for its rulers. Be that as it may, the new Symphony proved melodious, easy to follow on a single hearing (though each of the movements is of considerable length) and, in the main, of a genuinely emotional content. The conspicuous and no doubt unintentional quoting of a motive associated with Amfortas in "Parsifal," in a recurring theme of the Largo, gives a clue to the general character of this movement, which is interrupted by a martial episode that suggests Shostakovitch. At first, the latter sometimes made you think of Prokofieff; and now it is getting to be the other way around.

The Symphony obviously pleased the audience, and Mr. Munch, who conducted it with devotion and understanding, could have felt well repaid. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration at the end, over Miss Henriot. But to tell the truth, the Brahms Concerto did not seem to be the dynamic French girl's particular dish. Nor Mr. Munch's for that matter. The first two movements just didn't ring true. The Andante, in which Miss Henriot was abetted by first cellist Samuel Mayes, went better and there was enough life and brilliance in the final Allegretto grazioso to precipitate the ovation mentioned above. One recalls more pleasantly Miss Henriot's performances of concertos by Liszt and Ravel.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 11 1951

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Orchestrally speaking, the present season has been a maker of records and a breaker of precedents. Orchestras from overseas are rare enough in any season and we have had two, the Royal Philharmonic of London and the Israel Philharmonic. Not until Koussevitzky came here in November had the immediately preceding Symphony conductor appeared in the role of guest-leader and to climax that, he was followed a few weeks later by his predecessor, Pierre Monteux. Only once before, in fact, had an ex-conductor made a guest-appearance and that was in 1931, at the beginning of the 50th season, when the original conductor, Sir George Henchel, directed the first pair of concerts. Besides having Koussevitzky with our orchestra, we also had him at one of the two concerts of the Israel Philharmonic, while the second one introduced to us Izler Solomon, one of the several young Americans who are taking the orchestras that once fell to, or, in the old days, would have fallen to Europeans. Finally, the British orchestra brought us what, by stretching a point, we might call an old friend, Sir Thomas Beecham.

* * *

Just to make a good story out of it and to show how rich and varied our orchestral life is, I might add that we have also heard the Conservatory Orchestra under Malcolm Holmes, the Civic Symphony under Paul Cherkassky, and, across the Charles, the Harvard and Radcliffe Orchestra under a young conductor of great promise, Boston's Russell Stanger. That we can produce conductors as well as orchestras in this country is a most hopeful sign. We have owed much to the Europeans, but there is no reason why some day we should not be able to get along without them. If the supposedly unmusical English have brought forth a Halle, a Wood, a Coates, a Barbirolli, a Boult, a Sargent, a Goossens, and a Beecham, we ought to do as well. The point is that if England had insisted on Continental conductors, these men wouldn't have had a chance to prove their worth.

* * *

Certainly there was nothing in Mr. Solomon's conducting, as one concert revealed it, to suggest that he was any less gifted or accomplished for having been born in St. Paul rather than in what then (1911) would have been St. Petersburg. The orchestra, which he had led on its home grounds and, incidentally, during the hostilities with the Arabs, was completely under his control. There could be no quarrelling with his interpretation of C. P. E. Bach, Mozart, Israeli's Lavry, or Brahms. In fact, the performance of the Brahms Second was outstanding, one of the most gratifying we have heard in recent years. Here, for a welcome change, was eloquence without distortion, a reading that was engrossing without violation of what we may assume to have been the composer's intentions. The gravely serious slow movement aside, this is essentially a serene work, one in which feverish excitements are out of place. One detail is worthy of mention: the syncopated second subject of the finale invites an irreverent and un-Brahmsian jazzing. Instead of this false jauntiness, Mr. Solomon gave it weight and dignity.

* * *

This proved one of the memorable performances of the season. Another and even more notable one, if only because of its historic associations, was that of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" under Mr. Monteux. Even if the distinguished guest had failed to disclose the full measure of the piece's significance, the mere fact that it was he who had introduced it to the world 38 years before, and to Boston and New York 11 years later, would have made the occasion a notable one. But the point is that, both from the standpoint of the conductor's approach and of the orchestra's response to his wishes, this performance may be looked upon as the definitive one. Fortunately for posterity, the Victor Company took advantage of this unique opportunity and made a recording that should turn out to be the most prized version to date, not excepting the composer's own. Interpretatively, Mr. Monteux sees eye-to-eye with Stravinsky in this matter. His reading of the monumental score had the complete objectivity that is here in order. Those who prefer the romantic version of Koussevitzky or the dithyrambic one of Bernstein are welcome to them. I will stay with Monteux.

The extraordinary clarity, the machine-like precision that the Boston Symphony exhibited in that histor[illegible] performance would not have been possible under either of the temperamental leaders that succeeded Monteux. Truth to tell, he is not the most exciting of conductors. There was, at least on Friday, a certain lack of imagination in the projection of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, while the Beethoven Fourth, the remaining number on the program, was if anything too classic in feeling. But even here it was good for once to be free of conductorial frenzies and to know that everything would come off, that everything would be heard and in the right relation to everything else, and that come what might, we would not be blasted out of our seats.

* * *

At the Opera House this afternoon the New England Opera Theatre will present Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin." Dorothy Maynor, soprano, sings at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening and Arthur Rubinstein, pianist, plays at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

As part of its Festival of American Music, Boston University will give a free concert of chamber music at Jordan Hall tomorrow evening.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
FEB 13 1951

Music Row Explodes in Washington

(International News Service)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13—Washington music lovers are up in arms today over the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert March 31 in honor of French President Vincent Auriol.

Supporters of the National Symphony Orchestra insisted that the honor should have been given to the hometown musicians.

In a Sunday broadcast, Patrick Hayes, prominent music and civic figure, accused the state department, which made the announcement, of "an affront to the people of metropolitan Washington."

But the state department denied any complicity in the matter. All arrangements, a spokesman said, were made by the French embassy.

Jean-Pierre Benard, embassy first secretary, said the initiative came from French-born Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston orchestra.

"It was an open date at Constitution Hall," he explained, "and the Boston Symphony decided to fill it. The National Symphony didn't make any offer."

Hayes later admitted that the National Symphony did not offer to play. "But neither was it invited," he added.

Hayes took up the cudgels after Paul Hume, music critic of the Washington Post, first brandished the cause of native pride.

Some concertgoers, however, felt it wasn't that bad. On April 4, the National Symphony will perform Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, Mitchell conducting, in honor of the foreign ministers.

[235]

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1951

On the Aisle

Koussevitzky's Spirit Transfigures Israel Philharmonic

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

IF MUSIC is a colossus, it is a colossus of the spirit. Great conductors know this, their concerts communicate it. The discovery transfigures those who play and those who listen, and for a brief hour or two they meet in the shared glory of performance. To some, such music is the ultimate reality, to others it has the texture of a dream. It was such music we heard yesterday when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Israel Philharmonic in Orchestra hall.

A great conductor is in his way a warrior who must wrest victory from possible defeat. It is not enough for Koussevitzky to show us the Israel Philharmonic as it is now is the urgent, passionate need and fierce desire to show us the Israel Philharmonic as it must be. Into that ardent quest he poured the vast wealth of his skill, his experience, his indomitable energy, his rare humanity, his unconquerable spirit. In response the orchestra offered freely and gladly every drop of its heart's blood.

Just how extraordinary a concert this was did not quite occur to me during its playing. That came when I realized with a shock that not once after it began had I given the Boston orchestra a thought. Yet always before in Chicago Koussevitzky had been synonymous with the orchestra he made the most splendid in the world. It is out of the question that the Israel Philharmonic could have rivaled those memories of incomparable tone. But it was not out of the question, it was a fact, that with Koussevitzky as inspiration the Israel Philharmonic could mesmerize attention with a brilliant concert of its own.

Whatever its intensity, there is in all superior music making a sense of repose, tho you are often aware of it only as power unleashed or power in reserve. It is a major adjunct to virtuosity, and Koussevitzky's rare gift for imparting its special reassurance is one of the reasons why he can turn an orchestra into a virtuoso instrument without insisting that it is the instrument of a virtuoso.

Among the other reasons are his precise economy of style, his eloquent exuberance of recreative spirit. With him you take for granted that an orchestra has pinpoint clarity of attack, purity of line, true resonance, supple subtlety, and glorious singing tone.

So it was with the Israel Philharmonic. 'Our anthem had majestical overtones, and "Hatikvah" again was thanksgiving in sorrow. The psalm from Paul Ben-Haim's First Symphony touched the spirit we who admire from afar believe may be that of Israel. But the Fifth Prokofieff and the Fourth Tschaikowsky were splendors of sound streaked with orchestral lightning. It may be that the orchestra outplayed itself—no matter, so it played. And at the end the audience surged to its feet, cheering.

If you attended both concerts, perhaps you observed that the orchestra of this new land shifts the occupants of its first section chairs. If this is another way of having music for everyone, it reminds me of Koussevitzky's story of the first time he played the Prokofieff Fifth in Israel. Next day he took a walk and passed two men working in a ditch. One of them scrambled out to ask him how to pronounce the name of the Russian composer whose music he had played the night before. Koussevitzky told him and asked if he had heard the concert. "O yes," said the man, smiling, "I may miss a meal now and then, but not the music."

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 13 1951

Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Top Form at Academy

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its brilliant conductor, Charles Munch, was presented by the Philadelphia Forum in the Academy of music last night before a large and appreciative audience.

The occasion found the famous orchestra in top form, as Mr. Munch conducted an all-French program that included compositions by Saint-Saens, Ravel and Hector Berlioz.

As was to be expected, Mr. Munch found this program one that was immensely congenial to his considerable talents.

The evening began with what, as far as one knows, was a novelty for Philadelphia—the Overture to Saint-Saens' "La Princesse Jaune." This music is from an opera first performed at the Opera Comique in Paris on June 12, 1872, and it is charming. It also provided an attractive springboard for the rest of the concert.

Mr. Munch immediately demonstrated that conscientiousness, that dynamic quality and vitality, which have been characteristics of his previous appearances in this city.

Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" was given a wonderfully well-integrated performance, the Iberian languors of the music being well considered by the conductor, who did not neglect to project the more exciting moments of the score, including a thrilling moment in the finale.

Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra had as its soloist Mlle. Nicole Henriot. This unheralded 26-year-old pianist played her difficult assignment with immense aplomb, a large, brilliant, percussive tone which well became the music, and a sense of free-swinging authority in the jazz idioms and other modern features of the composition.

The concerto, rarely heard in this city, is an arresting piece of work, especially in its first and third movements. The second movement, adagio assai, is a long-winded, rather unimaginative passage, though Miss Henriot played the lengthy unaccompanied piano passage with much style.

The program ended with Mr. Munch's authoritative and beautifully conceived account of Berlioz's massive and utterly individual "Symphonie Fantastique." This score may not be everybody's meat but it remains one of the towering and isolated compositions in the entire range of musical endeavor.

If one realizes that Beethoven had only been dead three years when the Fantastique was composed, the music emerges even more remarkable.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
FEB 12 1951

State Dept. Scored in Snubbing D.C. Symphony for Its Concert

Boston Orchestra Picked to Play Here At Event Honoring President of France

The State department yesterday was accused of committing an "incredible breach of the amenities" by snubbing the National Symphony in scheduling an orchestral concert here March 31 for French President Vincent Auriol.

Author of a strong verbal attack on what he termed "an affront to the people of metropolitan Washington" was J. Patrick Hayes, prominent music and civic figure. Hayes' statement was made in a broadcast over station WGMS.

Pick Boston Symphony

It followed an anouncement by the State department that the Boston Symphony will play in Constitution Hall under conductor Charles Munch in a special concert for President Auriol.

The French president will be in Washington for four days beginning March 28.

Hayes said the State department's action has caused a "good deal of unrestful talk in musical circles" and is an "incredible breach of the amenities in the world of music."

"Clearly, the visit of such a dignitary is a state occasion and, equally clearly, the State department of the government has the responsibility either to initiate arrangements or to pass on and approve any arrangements which others might initiate," Hayes said.

"And so it will come to pass that the concert . . . will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra . . . with the French conductor Charles Munch on the podium.

"Face a Little Red"

"On the face of it, musically speaking, this is interesting and appropriate. The face of it gets a little red, however, when it is noted that resident orchestra was not invited to give such a program—that those concerned with the musical affairs of Washington were not consulted—and that therefore someone in the State department has set himself up as a musical arbiter for the nation.

"With the visit of the President of France, we had an opportunity to show that our city can hold its head high among the great capitals of the world in cultural as well as political fieds.

"Our State department has denied us the opportunity. I believe that this is an issue to be dealt with and that it would not be amiss if the subject were pursued further by letting the State department know your feelings."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 14 1951

Bostonians to Play for Auriol

Vincent Auriol, President of the French Republic, will be honored by a special visit to Washington on March 31 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. The concert, which will take place in Constitution Hall, will be in the nature of a welcome to President Auriol. President Truman and Mrs. Truman head the list of patrons of the concert.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1951

State Department Denies Asking Boston Symphony to Washington

Washington, Feb. 12.—(AP)—The State Department said today it had nothing to do with arrangements for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the capital during the forthcoming visit of French President Vincent Auriol.

The orchestra has scheduled a concert here Mar. 31. Auriol is due for a three-day state visit on Mar. 28.

The Boston orchestra arranged the concert with the visit in view. The arrangement was criticized yesterday by Patrick J. Hayes, local concert manager and former manager of Washington's National Symphony as a snub to the local group.

The State Department said it had advised the Boston orchestra that the department had "no objections" to the concert but that is as far as its connections went. Reporters were told by press officer Michael J. McDermott that this was true also of the French Embassy.

Hayes, in a broadcast, termed the arrangement "an incredible breach of the amenities in the world of music." He said, "Someone in the State Department has set himself up as the musical arbiter for the nation."

Charles Munch, Boston orchestra director, was described by McDermott as a distinguished French musician.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
FEB 13 1951

Capitol Miffed By Orchestra 'Invasion'

Washington — (INS) — Washington music lovers are up in arms over the scheduled appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a concert [illegible] honor of French President Vincent Auriol.

Supporters of the National Symphony Orchestra insisted that the honor should have been given to the hometown musicians.

In a broadcast, Patrick Hayes, prominent music and civic figure, accused the State Department, which made the announcement, of "an affront to the people of metropolitan Washington."

• • •

BUT THE State Department denied any complicity in the matter. All arrangements, a spokesman said, were made by the French embassy.

Jean-Pierre Benard, embassy first secretary, said the initiative came from French-born Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

"It was an open date at Constitutional Hall," he explained, "and the Boston Symphony decided to fill it. The National Symphony didn't make any offer."

Hayes later admitted that the National Symphony did not offer to play. "But neither was it invited," he added.

• • •

HAYES TOOK UP the cudgels after Paul Hume, music critic of the Washington Post, first brandished the cause of native pride.

The buck-passing left Hayes unconvinced.

"Now," he remarked, "we know where our friends are."

Some concert-goers, however, felt it wasn't that bad. On Apr. 4, the National Symphony will perform Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony in honor of the foreign ministers.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FEB 14 1951

Nicole Henriot Was a Nice Antidote for Bela Bartok

The Boston Symphony program at Constitution Hall last night had the audience alternately bewildered and bewitched. But it certainly indicated by its applause that it wasn't bothered.

The bewilderment came when Charles Munch conducted the Bela Bartok music for strings, percussion and celesta. Was it music? Did it mean anything? It was generally agreed that this angular music that depended more on pulsations and rhythmic changes for effect than upon melodic (?) line was "interesting," anyway. And the slow movement encompassed some of the finest haunted house music ever written.

The Liszt E-flat major piano concerto that followed found the audience completely bewitched by Paris-born soloist, Nicole Henriot.

This slim, blond 25-year-old girl bit into the opening chords with a power worthy of husky Jorge Bolet. Her fingers are like well-tempered steel and they imparted to the concerto all the metallic brightness the work so richly deserves.

Judgment on whether the charming Miss Henriot is a really top-ranking pianist will have to wait until she is heard in something that demands more than fleet fingers and strong muscles.

MILTON BERLINER

This Clipping From
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
FEB 15 1951

Boston Symphony Plays for French President

BOSTON, Feb. 15—A special visit to Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play in honor of Vincent Auriol, President of the French Republic, was announced in the program when this orchestra performed in the nation's capital. Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director, will lead the orchestra in Constitution hall on Saturday evening, March 31, and thus extend a welcome to his eminent countryman on his pending visit to the United States.

The list of distinguished patrons includes: The President and Mrs. Truman, The Ambassador of Norway and Madame Munthe de Morgenstierne, The Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson, Hon. and Mrs. Robert Wood Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dewey, Mrs. Reginald C. Foster, Justice and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter, Hon. and Mrs. Joseph C. Grew, Hon. and Mrs. Christian Herter, Hon. and Mrs. John W. McCormack, Mme. Charles Munch, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Perkins, Senator and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mr. and Mme. Pierre Paul Schweitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Jouett Shouse, Mr. and Mrs. John Simmons, John S. Thacher, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Edwin M. Watson, Mrs. Matthew Whitehall, Hon. and Mrs. Richard B. Wigglesworth.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 14 1951

Boston Concert

Large Hall Difficult for Bartok Music

By Paul Hume

Bela Bartok's Music for strings, percussion and celesta has been heard twice in Washington in two and a half weeks.

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it last night on the final concert of the regular series in Constitution Hall. Several weeks earlier, Howard Mitchell and the National Symphony Orchestra played the great score in the Music Room of Dumbarton Oaks.

Many wondered if it would sound to advantage in large Constitution Hall.

Bartok designated the work as for small orchestras. Certainly it does not balance properly when you hear it with full orchestral strings against only one harp, one piano and one celesta. The strings help to give it needed sonority in our regular symphony halls. But the incredible magic and imagination of Bartok's coloring is lost when the celesta, piano and harp are lost in the maze of tone.

Not Designed for Music

True, Constitution Hall is a thousand seats larger than Boston's Symphony Hall, or New York's Carnegie Hall. And it is not designed for musical occasions.

We were grateful for the greater distance between our ears and the instruments in some of the fullest passages. But those who heard it there cannot yet be said to have heard the true shape or immaculate clarity of the piece.

You may or may not like it, but you will hear it more and more in the next decade.

Munch gave it a sound reading, though he speeds the first movement too much for its marking and for the character of the contrapuntal writing. The rest was of virtuoso stature.

Nicole Henriot was soloist in the E Flat Concerto of Liszt. Neither she nor the orchestra played this tired old piece in the only style it can bear. Miss Henriot frequently seriously misused the pedal.

Amazing Striking Power

The beautiful young French pianist has amazing striking power. Her tone is large, but forced. Her touch is brittle. These factors, coupled with the fact that for several measures in the middle of the concerto the piano and orchestra were not together and the general lack of true breadth in the piece, made it a trial in ways.

Nevertheless, it won a tremendous ovation. The concert opened with Schumann's overture to Genoveva. From its overture we can understand why Schumann's opera failed. It is one of the greatest bores we have ever heard.

Since the intermission did not begin until 9:50 we were unable to hear Dvorak's beautiful fourth symphony which ended the evening. Things did not used to be this way with the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 14 1951

News of Music

Munch Directs Varied Program, With Gifted Nicole Henriot as Soloist

By Alice Eversman

Charles Munch arranged a varied program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he directed in Constitution Hall last night. It cannot be said that it was completely satisfactory from the point of interest, although it introduced locally a gifted pianist, Nicole Henriot, as soloist. Nevertheless, there was the usual stormy applause from the capacity audience, with a special ovation for Miss Henriot after her performance of the Liszt "Concerto in E flat Major, No. 1."

The two novelties of the program, as far apart as the poles, were placed at the beginning. The Overture to Schumann's only opera, "Genoveva," cannot be counted among his best works, yet a great deal of his beautiful lyricism is present. The writing for the orchestra is awkward and it has little of the resume qualities and the dramatic highlights usually included in an overture. But it was music in a familiar vein, which Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" was not.

It is questionable whether "music" is the right term to apply to the Bartok selection, for with the exception of the last two movements, it supplies more for the musical mentality than for the ear. It is stern and barren with great complexities in its structure. Much of the latter lies in its rhythmic variations. The general tone of the work is set in a limited range, especially in the first two sections, and the gloom is enhanced by the almost constant use of muted strings. Often these are occupied with recurring scale passages, played pizzicato, one after the other.

Atmosphere is achieved in the Adagio and the finale expands under the influence of a dance motif to an enlivened climax. In these two movements some of the earlier Bartok is visible, although the severity and starkness is not entirely dissipated. On the whole, hard work and doggedness in accomplishing a task is more in evidence than inspiration. Perhaps other impressions would result from another type of reading. Mr. Munch gave an accurate delivery, which is saying a good deal of this difficult work, but the embellishment that comes from the vision the composer evidently left to his interpreters was not forthcoming.

In fact, accent on rhythmic precision was the keynote of the program. It was felt also in Miss Henriot's performance of the Liszt "Concerto." The charming young pianist won the interest of the audience immediately. Slender, blond and dressed in a simple, highnecked, long sleeved white gown, she moved to her place at the piano with swift grace. She proved her technical resources and control at once with the first measures and later, an astonishing fluency and power. Her carefree handling of the abounding difficulties of the work was of virtuoso character.

The presentation, however, was very literal. The quality of her tone is metallic, though clear, and as yet she does nothing to enrich it with warmth, or to color it further than what results from a careful observance of soft and loud. In spite of the almost metronomic exactness of her delivery, the continuity of idea was not sustained. What the performance disclosed was the extent of her talent, which from the mechanical side is highly developed but which needs the seasoning that maturity and thought brings. The acclaim was spontaneous and the young artist was called out time and again.

The program concluded with Dvorak's "Symphony No. 4" in which the Orchestra did some of its best playing. Mr. Munch is an energetic conductor but not a great stickler for finesse. While the massed sound of the group was of its customary richness and fullness, the strings were not always uniformly accurate in pitch. Nor does the conductor strive for the clarification of the orchestral sections but tends to stress the over-all effect. This cannot matter in works such as the Dvorak, where the music carries its own appeal, but it did affect the appreciation of the Schumann and an understanding of the Bartok works.

Munch, Boston Group Triumph In Bartok Work

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The most exciting orchestral composition brought to hearing this season is Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta," played last night in Constitution hall by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch.

Also it is the most complicated modern page of many seasons, despite the limited means employed. Bartok has used a double string orchestra, various types of percussion, plus piano, sometimes involving two players, and harp. The richness of sound is further increased by ponte 'cello effects for which he has displayed a fondness in his string quartets.

Bewildering, Fascinating

The rhythms are vastly complicated. So is the contrapuntal texture which starts with a fughetta and continues with freer use of contrasting melodies. The resulting sound is bewildering but fascinating.

It made an immediate impression, at first, perhaps because of its evident difficulty, but finally by reason of its spiritual power. Conductor and orchestra, in the end, were given an ovation by the same public that had mildly applauded Schumann's unproblematical "Genoveva" overture.

One may doubt that even this great orchestra would have given so meaningful an interpretation of the Bartok work under another conductor. Munch is alert and alive and at ease, even when most vigorously engaged. His power, like that of the Bartok music, is spiritual and his sympathies are catholic so that the naive poetry of Schumann and of Dvorak's Fourth symphony is realized with complete sincerity and often with the greatest beauty of tone.

This great concert profited further by the art of the gifted French pianist, Nicole Henriot. Her assignment was the Liszt E flat Concerto, another great page.

Maintain Their Place

It, too, is a masterpiece of melodic inspiration and development. Its logic, its beauty, and its undeniable eloquence slowly have won and maintained their rightful place despite generations of anti-Liszt propaganda.

Miss Henriot is a typical French artist—competent, logical, incapable of a breach of taste and keenly alive to the poetic and dramatic values of this noble work.

Movies

'Of Men and Music' Stars Great Concert Artists

By ALTON COOK.

"Of Men and Music" is a series of informal visits with some of our greatest concert artists. For an hour and a half or so at the Park Avenue, your gracious hosts are Artur Rubinstein, Nadine Conner, Jan Peerce, Jascha Heifetz and Dmitri Mitropoulos.

Most of the time is devoted, of course, to their music. The programs have been kept light and fairly familiar without ever slipping into the hackneyed or banal.

We come across Rubinstein in a recording studio and with the camera accompany him home. He explains a mural that pictures all the houses he has lived in and then plays a brief concert of Mendelsohn's "Spinning Song," a Chopin Waltz and Polonaise and other works of similar caliber.

Sing for Watchman.

Jan Peerce and Nadine Conner return to the theater to pick up some forgotten music. Touched by the night watchman's devotion to music, they sing for him until plane time. They include arias from "L'Africanna" and "Don Pasquale" and a duet from Lucia.

After a brief visit with Heifetz and his family, in their California home, the camera follows him through the rigorous training regime in which he prepares for his annual concert tour. We hear several musical fragments and then a Bach Partita and Auer's "Paganini Caprice," among other things.

Pretentious Venture.

The Mitropoulos session is a rehearsal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony playing the final movement of Liszt's "Faust" symphony. We are permitted to stare into the mobile and highly expressive face of the conductor as he leads the orchestra.

This is the most pretentious venture Hollywood ever has made into concert music. It is a completely successful one—with a special bow due the technicians responsible for the recording.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
FEB 15 1951

Bostonians Will Play For President Auriol

WASHINGTON—Vincent Auriol, president of the French Republic, will be honored by a special visit here on March 31 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. The concert, which will take place in Constitution Hall, will be in the nature of a welcome to President Auriol. President Truman and Mrs. Truman head the list of patrons of the concert.

This Clipping From
EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES
FEB 18 1951

Boston Symphony To Honor Auriol

Special to EL PASO TIMES

Boston, Mass.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a special concert on March 31 in Constitution Hall, Washington, in honor of Vincent Auriol, president of France.

Charles Munch will lead the orchestra.

This Clipping From TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
FEB 1[illegible]

Boston Ensemble Will Honor Auriol

BOSTON, Feb. 17.—A special visit to Washington by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to play in honor of Vincent Auriol, the president of the French republic, has been announced. Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director, will lead the orchestra in Constitution hall March 31, and thus extend a welcome to his eminent countryman on his pending visit to the United States.

Munch and Boston Orchestra Give Stimulating Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

QUITE an unusual program added an extra fillip to the usual stimulation of a Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

Munch chose to begin unconventionally with Strauss' "Don Juan," to feature Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta," and to end with Dvorak's Fourth Symphony. Both the concert and the order aroused interest.

If Strauss prepared the way for Bartok through the kinship of orchestration Bartok became linked to Dvorak through their exposition of folk influence. This unity of succession was intensified by a series of virtuoso performances full of vitality and veracity.

It was an ardent Don Juan, definitely on the make, that Munch fashioned in his recreation of the Strauss score. He stamped his individuality on the performance with incandescent splendor, achieving almost unbelievable detail in the process of incendiary pursuit.

The orchestra responded magnificently so that the work gleamed with the freshness of a different approach.

Bartok's venture into the magical atmosphere of orchestrated sound generated an undercurrent of excitement in Munch's masterful exposition of its kaleidescopic coloring.

The changeable quality, rhythmic life, and fascinating texture of this music may still sound strange to ears unaccustomed to this work, but to those who have made its acquaintance it never ceases to be an extraordinary revelation of genius.

After these works the Dvorak symphony sounded naive and a bit old-fashioned. The charm of its simplicity and the vigor of its folk origins found understanding and lusty realization in performance.

The orchestra played brilliantly, persuasively, graciously, and vitally in most illuminating fashion, showing how alert it is to Munch's kindling intensity.

There was indeed no lack of stimulation at this concert.

[237]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
1951

CONCERT AND RECITAL

* * *

The Bostonians

By Francis D. Perkins

Charles Munch, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in the fourth concert of its evening series at Carnegie Hall, placed Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" between two differing examples of late nineteenth century romanticism, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and Antonin Dvorak's fourth symphony, in G major. The Bartok work can not yet be regarded as familiar, although it has had several performances here during the five-and-a-half years since the composer's death; there were none in New York during his lifetime after its introduction by the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1937.

It is music, indeed, which deserves repetition, not only on account of Bartok's remarkable and masterly use of his chosen instrumental resources, but also for its imaginative content and expressive range; the contrast between the reflective first and third parts and the propulsive, strongly rhythmic second and fourth sections, which have their suggestions of Hungarian folk music. In the first movement, the reviewer's fourth hearing no longer gave the sense of aggressive dissonance which had marked his first acquaintance with the work; the initial germinative musical idea gradually spread through the string choir with remarkable subtle variations of harmonic color. The interpretation under Mr. Munch, telling of expressive understanding of the music, had an admirable and necessary lucidity, a thorough revelation of detail which had not always been present in the performance of "Don Juan."

Dvorak's symphony in G major, his fourth in order of publication and eighth in order of composition, is outspokenly melodious throughout; the Czech savor which marks most of its tunes gives it a freshness which offsets certain derivative impressions of the influence of earlier German romantic composers such as Mendelssohn and Schumann. This frank, straightforward music was presented in an appropriate vein by Mr. Munch's Bostonians, with lyric sweep, momentum and richness of instrumental color.

Columbia Student Composers

A program of first performances by student composers from Columbia University's Music Department was the fare at MacMillin Theater last night. The concert was part of the American Music Festival broadcast over Station WNYC.

Among the eight young composers were Roy Travis, represented by a Piano Sonata; Julius Epstein, by Fantasy for Violin and Piano, Alfred Grant Goodman, by a Divertimento for Three Saxophones; Russell Smith, by a Duo for Oboe and Bassoon, and Walter Blum and Ezra Laderman who contributed a Quartet for Woodwind and a Symphony for Ten Winds, respectively.

To judge by the works on this program, the two others, Judith Dvorkin and Donald Keats, are the two most gifted composers—the former presenting a Song Cycle of unusual charm and joyousness, and the latter a delicately and imaginatively written String Trio.

Goodman's saxophone piece was not without a certain rhythmic whimsy and wit, though for its more lyrically expressive content it leaned a bit far toward the cliches of the jazz saxophonic world.

Laderman, in his Symphony for Ten Winds, attempted the most—though his intentions were only partly realized, chiefly it seemed, because he had assembled an orchestral mass of instruments then proceeded to misuse their real potency by draining them out in solo driblets. The musical ideas clearly called for fuller attack and volume for their effective definition.

P. G-H.

Soprano at Town Hall

Charlotte Beit, soprano, gave a recital in Times Hall last night. Coenraad V. Bos was the pianist. The vocal list was confined to songs and arias with German texts. It included two arias by Handel, "Suesse Stille" and "Das zitternde Glaenzen," which had trio accompaniment, performed by Mr. Bos along with Stefan Frenkel, violinist, and Leo Rostal, cellist. The trio combination also assisted Miss Beit in four songs by Robert Kahn. Lieder of Mendelssohn, Grieg and Schumann completed the vocal list, which was supplemented by Boccherini's Sonata in A major, played by Messrs. Rostal and Bos.

A few traces of an inherent prettiness in Miss Beit's voice failed to redeem her singing, which had, on the whole, a rather unprofessional character. Her performance was tentative and insecure, and her tones lacked the breath support necessary to sustain and project them. A. B.

Eighth 'Faust'

Gounod's "Faust" had its eighth performance of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, when Giuseppe Valdengo sang Valentin for the first time in this theater. Richard Tucker sang the title role, with Nadine Conner as Marguerite, Jerome Hines as Mephistopheles and Anne Bollinger as Siebel. Fausto Cleva conducted.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 16 1951

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Brilliant in Performance of Berlioz's 'Fantastic Symphony'

BY CHARLES HAUFLER

It was another high for the local music season at the Mosque last night, with the Boston Symphony seeming once more to outdo itself in its second visit to town this season under Griffith Foundation auspices. A large audience was on hand and loudly applauded the celebrated orchestra for one of its more brilliant performances here.

Under the baton of their regular conductor, Charles Munch, the Bostonians gave a display of virtuosity of an order not often seen hereabouts. Listeners were fairly startled by their tremendous power and crashing climaxes and fascinated by the unusual tonal effects they produced.

Skill, Fire

This took place for the most part in a performance of the featured number, Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." It is an offering that only the best orchestras have the temerity to essay, orchestrated in a scintillating manner and full of bizarre moments. But Dr. Munch and the orchestra, expanded even beyond its normal large number, were more than equal to the occasion, projecting the piece with incredible skill and a fire that almost bowled over the audience.

The composition outdoes most modern music in unusual coloring and provocative dynamics and it was a rare treat to hear it done with maximum effectiveness, its rushing crescendos, novel sounds and other intriguing features emerging clearly and impressively. It was, to be sure, mostly a technical feat, the music having no profound depth, but it was a performance to remember.

Particularly striking was its macabre March to the Gallows episode and its Witches' Sabbath, with the brass and tympani having a field day and its strings in breathtaking flights. Mr. Munch held things together with almost magical control and got every last ounce of effect out of the novel music.

For music of a more soul satisfying order the program offered Schumann's First Symphony, usually labelled the "Spring" Symphony, a work of his early and happy days. It is a composition every section of which is inspired, rich and bright, enjoyable to the full. Apparently sensitive to every sentiment and nuance, the conductor and his men gave the composition a performance that warmed the hearts of listeners.

The program contained another number, also by Schumann, the overture to his only opera, "Genoveva." It is doubtful if the piece ever has been heard in this section. It turned out to be of a dramatic cast, running to solid tonal effects and, opening the concert, brought to light at once the fine tone, compactness and perfect balance of the great Boston organization.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 17 1951

Symphony Rivalry

I did not believe that your eminent Music Critic Paul Hume and the celebrated Patrick Hayes could both be so stupid as to compare the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and its brilliant Conductor Munch with our own National Symphony Orchestra and its brand-new Conductor Mitchell! Isn't it true that we (the United States of America) as a Nation should exhibit our best to visiting Presidents, especially from foreign countries such as France, where there is such a wealth of music? And certainly that best is the Boston Symphony, next, of course, to Toscanini's orchestra.

THOMAS LYNCH.
Washington.

I sympathized with Paul Hume when he received the famous letter from the President. I am not sympathetic to his unsympathetic review of the Boston Symphony concert of last Tuesday. It seems distinctly biased against Charles Munch, the French conductor, and especially against the French soloist, Nicole Henriot.

Mr. Hume could not stay for the last number, "Dvorak's beautiful fourth symphony." This was the orchestral highlight of the evening.

Mr. Hume has been leading the hue and cry against the choice of Munch and the Boston Symphony, rather than the National Symphony, for the concert in honor of President Auriol of France. Perhaps music critics as well as Presidents sometimes write under the impulse of emotion rather than of true spirit of criticism.

SIDNEY S. ALDERMAN.
Washington.

This Clipping From
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
DAILY RECORD
FEB 17 1951

2nd Concert In Newark By Boston Group

NEWARK — The world famous Boston Symphony made its second appearance of the season here this week in the Mosque Theatre under the sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation.

Dr. Charles Munch the orchestra's regular conductor was on the podium and this great musical organization gave a fine rendition of music not often heard by any symphonic unit. The orchestra gave evidence of power plus the fascinating tonal effects that have made this unit internationally renowned.

The program included two works by Schumann, the "First Symphony" better known as "the Spring Symphony" and the overture to his only opera the "Genoveva". In both these works Dr. Munch and the orchestra brought out the inspired rich and bright effects as conceived by the composer.

The highlight of this delightful program of excellent music came when the "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz was heard. It was in this number that the orchestra brought forth the crescendos plus all the novel sounds that has made this "Fanatastic Symphony" a favorite the world over. The technique and the real interpretation by Dr. Munch and the orchestra was really evident by the applause of the audience.

That the conductor, Dr. Munch, was in complete command throughout was more conclusive by the ability and confidence of the orchestra as it played the entire program with brilliance and agility. The audience was very warm in its praise as it rose to its feet and applauded enthusiastically when the concert was finished. Dr. Munch was forced to come from the stage wing many many times in a truly great ovation to him by the music lovers in the theatre.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 15 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WORK BY BARTOK

Munch Leads the Orchestra in Concert at Carnegie Hall—Straus Tone Poem Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

The height of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Charles Munch was the performance of Bartok's "music for stringed instruments, percussion and celesta." Mr. Munch gave this richly colored and originally designed music the full measure of his own passionate temperament and responsiveness to Bartok's idiom. The idiom and style of this music are no longer strange to us, or less than eloquent, while the score appears as one of the strongest, closest knit and effectively instrumentated of all Bartok's orchestral works.

The curious instrumentation is no wanton experiment with special orchestral timbres. Rather it is an instrumental scheme of a character peculiarly representative of the composer's thought. With this orchestra of strings and percussive instruments, which include the piano and the harp (when was a harp a percussion instrument?), as well as the celesta, xylophone, drums, gong and cymbals, Bartok achieves a unique color scheme that is an outward token of the profoundly Hungarian spirit of the music.

There are four movements, but there is no orthodoxy. The opening movement consists of a single short lyrical phrase, developed fugally to a climax of singular intensity. The intensity is not only contrapuntal tension, but emotional experience. Between the movements that follow there is considerable thematic relation, though the subjects are so transformed in rhythm and harmonic treatment that the metamorphoses might easily escape attention.

The plucking of the strings in the scherzo movement, punctuated by the sharp brilliant asymetrical chord of the piano, and by the strange, rumbling fugato of the middle part is a strange business, belonging not to the West; and there could be no better characterization of the third movement than the late Lawrence Gilman's words, "a mystical nocturne, elemental and earthborn." The finale is a wild kermesse. The effective contrasts between the movements, which nevertheless balance and complete each other by their contents and their changing moods, make a symphonic fabric of a rarely original texture.

The other works on the program were Richard Strauss' early—and magnificent—tone-poem, "Don Juan," and one of the symphonies of Dvorak, which is rarely heard today, a Fourth Symphony in G major. It says much for Mr. Munch that he could turn from the modernities and the exotic colorings of Bartok to the "native woodnotes wild" of Dvorak's naive symphony. This symphony has adorable melodies, and is not particularly compact or formal. One thinks of Dvorak, with his plenitude of melodies, just sitting down without very much calculation and pouring it out. The symphony could perhaps best be enjoyed by going out into the woods on a Czech holiday.

In the performance of Strauss' tone-poem Mr. Munch was not as fortunate as he might have been. He ran away with himself. There was a loss of distinctness and even of the most effective articulation of the themes. The final climax lost its grandeur and the full measure of dramatic affirmation because it was hurried. There was one moment of extraordinary effect, that of the celebrated A minor chord at the end which is pierced by the F natural as by a sword-thrust. Most conductors make this literal in effect. With Mr. Munch it was the true interpretation of Strauss' thought—life turned to ashes and emptiness; "and this is the end of every man's desire." Here was a distinctive touch in an imperfect performance.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 17 1951

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Charles Munch Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert at the Academy

The program which Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at the Academy of Music last evening certainly belonged in the category of the unhackneyed. Of the four works performed, one was a first performance and the other three are not likely to be encountered by the average concert-goer more than once in half a dozen seasons. Welcome as this "change of pace" music was, we don't believe that any of it could stand too frequent performance.

The concert started off with the Overture to Robert Schumann's only opera, "Genoveva." Though it gained considerable popularity in its day, the opera is now all but forgotten, as its Overture—and deservedly so. For this is weak, inconsequential Schumann, not nearly up to the standards of his well-known "Manfred" Overture. One could not cavil with the performance, however; it was warm, polished and in the proper romantic vein.

LAST CONCERT

Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest living conductors, performs tonight what may be his last concert. The maestro, who will be 84 on March 25, has been advised by his doctor to cancel all his scheduled engagements and take an "indefinite rest."

Soprano Lotte Lehmann sang her farewell recital last night at Town Hall. Miss Lehmann, who will be 63 Feb. 27, planned to complete her current concert tour with two recitals in Madison, Wis., next week, then return to her home in Santa Barbara, Calif., for retirement.

Violinist Ruth Posselt Is Soloist

The fine American violinist, Ruth Posselt, was the soloist in the first New York presentation of the Violin Concerto by the contemporary Frenchman, Jean Rivier. This is essentially lightweight but pleasant music, modern-sounding, yet conventional enough to be inoffensive. Its thematic content is easily recognizable and is handled more or less along classical lines.

The three-movement work is short, concise and often witty in the French manner. It was given a stunning interpretation by Miss Posselt, who played the first movement with smoothness and a touch of appropriate nonchalance, the slow movement with a beautiful singing quality, and the finale, including a spirited cadenza, with fire and verve. She was given perfect support by M. Munch and the orchestra, who provided a precise and delicate background. Here is a little concerto which may eventually find its way into the permanent repertoire.

Bloch's Birthday Honored

The two sections from Ernest Bloch's "Baal Shem" for violin and orchestra, which followed, were undoubtedly played in honor of the composer's recent 70th birthday. Both of these movements, "Vidui" ("Contrition") and "Nigun" ("Improvisation"), are more familiar and more suitable in their original settings for violin and piano, in which form they frequently appear on recital programs. Bloch's orchestral arrangement of the accompaniment does little or nothing for the music. Besides, the soloist and conductor seemed last night to be out of sympathy with the spirit of the work, for their performance was often dry and perfunctory and lacking in focus and the necessary Hebraic passion.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major, with which the program concluded, can be a long and ponderous work, even in the hands of an Austrian conductor—who is supposed to understand best the music of his mystical countryman. It was, therefore, a most pleasant surprise to hear M. Munch's Gallic approach to the symphony. By lightening its texture and speeding up its tempi, he was able to make the work seem shorter and decidedly more palatable.

Contributing mightily to the success of this interpretation was the refined playing of the orchestra, particularly the strings and woodwinds. After two seasons, it looks as if M. Munch has finally succeeded in restoring the polish and finesse which the orchestra lost during the first months of his tenure. All he needs to do now is soften and refine the brasses—especially the trumpets, which continue to offend the ears with their blatant sounds.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 20 1951

Symphony Rivalry

The Washington Post readers appreciate the loyalty that Paul Hume has shown for the National Symphony and its struggle for survival. The outlandish comparisons he makes between it and the Boston Symphony, however, make one question the validity of all Mr. Hume's criticisms.

LOUISE V. SCHOFIELD.
Alexandria.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 18 1951

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY [illegible]ESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Bruckner's Seventh

Concert yesterday afternoon under the direction of Charles Munch with Ruth Posselt as violin soloist. The program:

Violin Concerto..... Rivier
(First New York performance)
Vidui; Nigun from "Baal Shem".....Bloch
Symphony No. 7, E major.....Bruckner

Mr. Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a peculiarly constructed one, the only first-rate music on it being the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner which occupied its second half, with the first half beginning with the fast-aging "Genoveva" Overture. The problem of finding a short work to start a symphonic program is not an easy one and conductors frequently turn to opera overtures, more often than not to those of Weber, for this purpose. And it mus tbe said that overworked as they are, Weber's works in this form as still the most viable of the pre-Wagnerian, Romantic overtures, and preferable to less hackneyed, but far less arresting products of their kind of which the "Genoveva" Overture is an example. Everything in it has been said more cogently by Schumann in other similar works such as the "Manfred" and "Faust" Overtures.

Rivier's Violin Concerto, which was given its first local hearing, is hardly likely to become a permanent addition to the slender literature of worth-while concertos for this instrument. Its central slow movement, modal in its melodic substance, is less arid than the two corner movements in which the unrewarding thematic material is treated in a manner productive of the devil-may-care mood inherent in so much contemporary French music; music in which the harmonic acerbities lead to no inner tensions and serve only to reveal the composer's inherent poverty of resources. The long cadenza which brings the final movement to an end is tiresome and ineffectual in its meaningless sequences. Miss Posselt played it admirably and the orchestra supplied a carefully adjusted accompaniment but this is hardly music worthy of the attentions of so gifted a violinist or of a conductor of Mr. Munch's caliber. Although Bloch's "Baal Shem" is not in any way a first-rate composition, the two excerpts Miss Posselt played from it so expressively, the rhapsodic "Vidui" and "Nigun" have at least the touch of sincerity to recommend them.

The interpretation of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony" was not, excepting as sheer sound, genuinely impressive. It would be difficult to imagine a more silken, shimmering tonal investiture than that accorded it. But the inwardness and intensity essential to a telling realization of the Austrian master's ideas were not forthcoming. The pacing, particularly that of the middle-part of the slow movement, was too often injudiciously fast, so that the solemn mood of the music was disturbed, and particularly disaffecting was Mr. Munch's huge cut in the finale which brought it to a sudden, anti-climactic close and resulted only in the shattering of its massive structure.

'Goetterdaemmerung' at Met

Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" had its second performance of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon, when Helen Traubel was the Brünnhilde. Except for Miss Traubel, and Gerhard Pechner, who sang Alberich, the cast under Fritz Stiedry's direction was the same as last Thursday's, including Set Svanholm as Siegfried, Herbert Janssen as Gunther, Dezso Ernster as Hagen, Regina Resnik as Gutrune and Margaret Harshaw as Waltraute. This marked the first time that the four music dramas of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" have been broadcast from the Metropolitan on consecutive Saturdays, and also the first time that this cycle has been heard by the Metropolitan's radio audience within a single season.

F. D. P.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
FEB 24, 1951

Bernstein to Take Sabbatical Leave

Leonard Bernstein will take a prolonged "sabbatical" next season. The young Boston conductor who will head the Israel Philharmonic in its concert here March 10, wants to take next season off "to take stock and gather inner substance."

He probably wants to let Bernstein, the composer, have time with ruled paper. He has refused conducting offers from La Scala, Tanglewood, Salzburg and elsewhere.

The orchestra, which will appear here at State Fair Auditorium under Hadassah and Council of Jewish Women auspices, has scheduled three farewell concerts in New York, March 18, 19 and 20.

This Side of Angels, It's Boston Symphony

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

In keeping with past generosity, the Boston Symphony, headed by Charles Munch, came to town last night bearing many valentines.

First, there was the orchestra itself, which the Carnegie crowd recognized at once, in the opening bars of Strauss's "Don Juan," as the country's orchestra which, in tone and polish, comes nearest to perfection this side of the angels.

Mr. Munch was certainly in the vein last night—which added to the good things brought down from Boston. The Strauss tone-poem was read like the manifesto of a new Munch—a Munch with a power to set fire to a whole orchestra.

Alive and Vibrant.

I don't recall a recent performance of "Don Juan" so alive and vibrant from beginning to end. The score sighed and panted like something human and when it gave a final gasp it was really the disillusioned Don breathing his last. It made "Tristan und Isolde" sound like a park-bench courtship by comparison.

Next came "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" by the late Hungarian master, Bela Bartok. This was an incredibly beautiful performance of a composition that grows with every hearing. Mr. Munch evidently believed in every moment of it.

There wasn't a tiny detail that was overlooked in the intense scrutiny of the reading. Mr. Munch seemed to feel that the whole fabric would fall apart with the slightest flaw. Each movement was woven together with watchful intensity.

Lean, Spectral Rhythms.

It is mysterious music, this, with its weirdly refined melodic moods embedded in a mass of lean, special rhythms. Bartok came closest of all to fathoming the soul of rhythm, and his researches made exciting news in last night's performance.

I have rarely heard such good pizzicati from any string section, and the percussive effects came through with the crispness of forest sounds on an autumn night. Those who thought they didn't like Bela Bartok began revising their ideas last night.

Dvorak was caught in the circle of last night's magic, the Fourth Symphony looming a bit larger than reality, perhaps, thanks to Mr. Munch's ability to brighten the dullest page.

He made the poor stuff of the symphony sound good, and the good stuff betteer.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 17 1951

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Charles Munch Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert at the Academy

The program which Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at the Academy of Music last evening certainly belonged in the category of the unhackneyed. Of the four works performed, one was a first performance and the other three are not likely to be encountered by the average concert-goer more than once in half a dozen seasons. Welcome as this "change of pace" music was, we don't believe that any of it could stand too frequent performance.

The concert started off with the Overture to Robert Schumann's only opera, "Genoveva." Though it gained considerable popularity in its day, the opera is now all but forgotten, as its Overture—and deservedly so. For this is weak, inconsequential Schumann, not nearly up to the standards of his well-known "Manfred" Overture. One could not cavil with the performance, however; it was warm, polished and in the proper romantic vein.

Violinist Ruth Posselt Is Soloist

The fine American violinist, Ruth Posselt, was the soloist in the first New York presentation of the Violin Concerto by the contemporary Frenchman, Jean Rivier. This is essentially lightweight but pleasant music, modern-sounding, yet conventional enough to be inoffensive. Its thematic content is easily recognizable, and is handled more or less along classical lines.

The three-movement work is short, concise and often witty in the French manner. It was given a stunning interpretation by Miss Posselt, who played the first movement with smoothness and a touch of appropriate nonchalance, the slow movement with a beautiful singing quality, and the finale, including a spirited cadenza, with fire and verve. She was given perfect support by M. Munch and the orchestra, who provided a precise and delicate background. Here is a little concerto which may eventually find its way into the permanent repertoire.

Bloch's Birthday Honored

The two sections from Ernest Bloch's "Baal Shem" for violin and orchestra, which followed, were undoubtedly played in honor of the composer's recent 70th birthday. Both of these movements, "Vidui" ("Contrition") and "Nigun" ("Improvisation"), are more familiar and more suitable in their original settings for violin and piano, in which form they frequently appear on recital programs. Bloch's orchestral arrangement of the accompaniment does little or nothing for the music. Besides, the soloist and conductor seemed last night to be out of sympathy with the spirit of the work, for their performance was often dry and perfunctory and lacking in focus and the necessary Hebraic passion.

Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony in E Major, with which the program concluded, can be a long and ponderous work, even in the hands of an Austrian conductor—who is supposed to understand best the music of his mystical countryman. It was, therefore, a most pleasant surprise to hear M. Munch's Gallic approach to the symphony. By lightening its texture and speeding up its tempi, he was able to make the work seem shorter and decidedly more palatable.

Contributing mightily to the success of this interpretation was the refined playing of the orchestra, particularly the strings and woodwinds. After two seasons, it looks as if M. Munch has finally succeeded in restoring the polish and finesse which the orchestra lost during the first months of his tenure. All he needs to do now is soften and refine the brasses—especially the trumpets, which continue to offend the ears with their blatant sounds.

LAST CONCERT

Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest living conductors, performs tonight what may be his last concert. The maestro, who will be 84 on March 25, has been advised by his doctor to cancel all his scheduled engagements and take an "indefinite rest."

Soprano Lotte Lehmann sang her farewell recital last night at Town Hall. Miss Lehmann, who will be 63 Feb. 27, planned to complete her current concert tour with two recitals in Madison, Wis., next week, then return to her home in Santa Barbara, Calif., for retirement.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 20 1951

Symphony Rivalry

The Washington Post readers appreciate the loyalty that Paul Hume has shown for the National Symphony and its struggle for survival. The outlandish comparisons he makes between it and the Boston Symphony, however, makes one question the validity of all Mr. Hume's criticisms.

LOUISE V. SCHOFIELD.
Alexandria.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 18 1951

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CARNEGIE HALL

Bruckner's Seventh

Concert yesterday afternoon under the direction of Charles Munch with Ruth Posselt as violin soloist. The program:

Violin Concerto..... Rivier
(First New York performance)
Vidui; Nigun (from "Baal Shem"..... Bloch
Symphony No. 7, E major..... Bruckner

Mr. Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was a peculiarly constructed one, the only first-rate music on it being the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner which occupied its second half, with the first half beginning with the fast-aging "Genoveva" Overture. The problem of finding a short work to start a symphonic program is not an easy one and conductors frequently turn to opera overtures, more often than not to those of Weber, for this purpose. And it mus tbe said that overworked as they are, Weber's works in this form as still the most viable of the pre-Wagnerian, Romantic overtures, and preferable to less hackneyed, but far less arresting products of their kind of which the "Genoveva" Overture is an example. Everything in it has been said more cogently by Schumann in other similar works such as the "Manfred" and "Faust" Overtures.

Rivier's Violin Concerto, which was given its first local hearing, is hardly likely to become a permanent addition to the slender literature of worth-while concertos for this instrument. Its central slow movement, modal in its melodic substance, is less arid than the two corner movements in which the unrewarding thematic material is treated in a manner productive of the devil-may-care mood inherent in so much contemporary French music; music in which the harmonic acerbities lead to no inner tensions and serve only to reveal the composer's inherent poverty of resources. The long cadenza which brings the final movement to an end is tiresome and ineffectual in its meaningless sequences. Miss Posselt played it admirably and the orchestra supplied a carefully adjusted accompaniment but this is hardly music worthy of the attentions of so gifted a violinist or of a conductor of Mr. Munch's caliber. Although Bloch's "Baal Shem" is not in any way a first-rate composition, the two excerpts Miss Posselt played from it so expressively, the rhapsodic "Vidui" and "Nigun" have at least the touch of sincerity to recommend them.

The interpretation of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony" was not, excepting as sheer sound, genuinely impressive. It would be difficult to imagine a more silken, shimmering tonal investiture than that accorded it. But the inwardness and intensity essential to a telling realization of the Austrian master's ideas were not forthcoming. The pacing, particularly that of the middle-part of the slow movement, was too often injudiciously fast, so that the solemn mood of the music was disturbed, and particularly disaffecting was Mr. Munch's huge cut in the finale which brought it to a sudden, anti-climactic close and resulted only in the shattering of its massive structure.

'Goetterdaemmerung' at Met

Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" had its second performance of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon, when Helen Traubel was the Brünnhilde. Except for Miss Traubel, and Gerhard Pechner, who sang Alberich, the cast under Fritz Stiedry's direction was the same as last Thursday's, including Set Svanholm as Siegfried, Herbert Janssen as Gunther, Dezso Ernster as Hagen, Regina Resnik as Gutrune and Margaret Harshaw as Waltraute. This marked the first time that the four music dramas of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" have been broadcast from the Metropolitan on consecutive Saturdays, and also the first time that this cycle has been heard by the Metropolitan's radio audience within a single season.

F. D. P.

This Side of Angels, It's Boston Symphony

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

In keeping with past generosity, the Boston Symphony, headed by Charles Munch, came to town last night bearing many valentines.

First, there was the orchestra itself, which the Carnegie crowd recognized at once, in the opening bars of Strauss's "Don Juan," as the country's orchestra which, in tone and polish, comes nearest to perfection this side of the angels.

Mr. Munch was certainly in the vein last night—which added to the good things brought down from Boston. The Strauss tone-poem was read like the manifesto of a new Munch—a Munch with a power to set fire to a whole orchestra.

Alive and Vibrant.

I don't recall a recent performance of "Don Juan" so alive and vibrant from beginning to end. The score sighed and panted like something human and when it gave a final gasp it was really the disillusioned Don breathing his last. It made "Tristan und Isolde" sound like a park-bench courtship by comparison.

Next came "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" by the late Hungarian master, Bela Bartok. This was an incredibly beautiful performance of a composition that grows with every hearing. Mr. Munch evidently believed in every moment of it.

There wasn't a tiny detail that was overlooked in the intense scrutiny of the reading. Mr. Munch seemed to feel that the whole fabric would fall apart with the slightest flaw. Each movement was woven together with watchful intensity.

Lean, Spectral Rhythms.

It is mysterious music, this, with its weirdly refined melodic moods embedded in a mass of lean, special rhythms. Bartok came closest of all to fathoming the soul of rhythm, and his researches made exciting news in last night's performance.

I have rarely heard such good pizzicati from any string section, and the percussive effects came through with the crispness of forest sounds on an autumn night. Those who thought they didn't like Bela Bartok began revising their ideas last night.

Dvorak was caught in the circle of last night's magic, the Fourth Symphony looming a bit larger than reality, perhaps, thanks to Mr. Munch's ability to brighten the dullest page.

He made the poor stuff of the symphony sound good, and the good stuff betteer.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
FEB 24 1951

Bernstein to Take Sabbatical Leave

Leonard Bernstein will take a prolonged "sabbatical" next season. The young Boston conductor who will head the Israel Philharmonic in its concert here March 10, wants to take next season off "to take stock and gather inner substance."

He probably wants to let Bernstein, the composer, have time with ruled paper. He has refused conducting offers from La Scala, Tanglewood, Salzburg and elsewhere.

The orchestra, which will appear here at State Fair Auditorium under Hadassah and Council of Jewish Women auspices, has scheduled three farewell concerts in New York, March 18, 19 and 20.

This Clipping From
SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
FEB 18 1951

The World of Music

Plans have been announced for the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's new music director, will be at Tanglewood this Summer for the first time and will share with Serge Koussevitzky, retired leader of the Bostonians, in conducting the concerts in the Tanglewood music shed.

Koussevitzky, continuing as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, will open the festival with three week-ends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22, devoting the programs to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. The festival will close on Aug. 12.

The New York City Opera Company will open its Spring season at the City Center on March 14 with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the successful new production of last Fall and the first Wagnerian opera essayed by the organization since the 1945 production of "The Flying Dutchman." The season will close on April 22.

New to the repertory will be Massenet's "Manon," second of the operatic works based on the Abbe Prevost novel to be offered at City Center. The company previously revived the Puccini "Manon Lescaut," with Dorothy Kirsten in the title role, in the first New York production in approximately 20 years.

The repertory will include at least three works from the French wing, "Manon," "Faust" and "Carmen"; the Prokofieff satire, "The Love for Three Oranges"; the Wagnerian high comedy and the two Mozart works, "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," representing the German wing; and from the Italian wing, "La Boheme," "Madame Butterfly," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci" and "La Traviata." "The Love for Three Oranges" and "The Marriage of Figaro" will be sung in English, as usual.

Twenty-eight instrumental soloists are announced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for its 1951-52 season. Seven will be heard with the orchestra for the first time, including the Greek pianist Gina Bachaeur, who made a highly successful New York recital debut this season.

The list of instrumental soloists follows:

Pianists: Gina Bachaeur, Jean Casadesus, Robert Casadesus, Aldo Ciccolini, Clifford Curzon, Rudolf Firkusny, Frank Glazer, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Grant Johannesen, Constance Keene, Oscar Levant, William Masselos, Hortense Monath, Guiomar Novaes, Rudolf Serkin, Artur Schnabel and the duo pianists—Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe.

Violinists: Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz, Frances Magnes, Nathan Milstein, Erica Morini, Michael Rabin and Isaac Stern.

Violincellists: Gregor Piatigorsky and Leonard Rose.

The curriculum includes coaching in vocal and instrumental repertoire, theory, composition, conducting and program-making and is under the direction of Max Helfman.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 19 1951

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CARNEGIE HALL

Bruckner's Seventh

Concert yesterday afternoon under the direction of Charles Munch with Ruth Posselt as violin soloist. The program:

Violin Concerto..... Rivier
(First New York performance)
Vidui; Nigun from "Baal Shem".....Bloch
Symphony No. 7, E major.....Bruckner

Mr. Munch's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon was a peculiarly constructed one, the only first-rate music on it being the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner which occupied its second half, with the first half beginning with the fast-aging "Genoveva" Overture. The problem of finding a short work to start a symphonic program is not an easy one and conductors frequently turn to opera overtures, more often than not to those of Weber, for this purpose. And it mus tbe said that overworked as they are, Weber's works in this form as still the most viable of the pre-Wagnerian, Romantic overtures, and preferable to less hackneyed, but far less arresting products of their kind of which the "Genoveva" Overture is an example. Everything in it has been said more cogently by Schumann in other similar works such as the "Manfred" and "Faust" Overtures.

Rivier's Violin Concerto, which was given its first local hearing, is hardly likely to become a permanent addition to the slender literature of worth-while concertos for this instrument. Its central slow movement, modal in its melodic substance, is less arid than the two corner movements in which the unrewarding thematic material is treated in a manner productive of the devil-may-care mood inherent in so much contemporary French music; music in which the harmonic acerbities lead to no inner tensions and serve only to reveal the composer's inherent poverty of resources. The long cadenza which brings the final movement to an end is tiresome and ineffectual in its meaningless sequences. Miss Posselt played it admirably and the orchestra supplied a carefully adjusted accompaniment but this is hardly music worthy of the attentions of so gifted a violinist or of a conductor of Mr. Munch's caliber. Although Bloch's "Baal Shem" is not in any way a first-rate composition, the two excerpts Miss Posselt played from it so expressively, the rhapsodic "Vidui" and "Nigun" have at least the touch of sincerity to recommend them.

The interpretation of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony" was not, excepting as sheer sound, genuinely impressive. It would be difficult to imagine a more silken, shimmering tonal investiture than that accorded it. But the inwardness and intensity essential to a telling realization of the Austrian master's ideas were not forthcoming. The pacing, particularly that of the middle-part of the slow movement, was too often injudiciously fast, so that the solemn mood of the music was disturbed, and particularly disaffecting was Mr. Munch's huge cut in the finale which brought it to a sudden, anti-climactic close and resulted only in the shattering of its massive structure.

'Goetterdaemmerung' at Met

Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" had its second performance of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House Saturday afternoon, when Helen Traubel was the Brünnhilde. Except for Miss Traubel, and Gerhard Pechner, who sang Alberich, the cast under Fritz Stiedry's direction was the same as last Thursday's, including Set Svanholm as Siegfried, Herbert Janssen as Gunther, Dezso Ernster as Hagen, Regina Resnik as Gutrune and Margaret Harshaw as Waltraute. This marked the first time that the four music dramas of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" have been broadcast from the Metropolitan on consecutive Saturdays, and also the first time that this cycle has been heard by the Metropolitan's radio audience within a single season.

F. D. P.

Sylvia Muehling, Pianist

Sylvia Muehling, pianist, who made her New York debut at Town Hall last season, appeared at that hall again Saturday afternoon in a program of sold, exacting music, notable for its lack of frills. She chose works of only four composers: two Brahms Intermezzi and a Capriccio, Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 110, Bach's G major French Suite and Hindemith's Sonata No. 3.

Miss Muehling is a patient musician, since she attempts to let the music unfold itself, without crowding. Occasionally she has a big, round somber tone, although quite often the dark color of her playing becomes merely murkiness. Her continual habit of languishing over the ends of phrases and subphrases dissipated the intensity of line that might have accumulated to give her work formal sense. The Adagio of the Beethoven Sonata became especially amorphous under this dissolving treatment, and Brahms also suffered.

T. M. S.

William Kapell, Pianist

William Kapell, pianist, was the soloist in Saturday night's performance of Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2, in C minor, at Carnegie Hall. Leonard Bernstein, fulfilling a two-week engagement with the New York Philharmonic Symphony, was the conductor, and the remainder of the program duplicated Thursday's offerings, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasy and Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps."

Mr. Kapell's natural capacities, as is well known, are eminently suited to music in the Russian manner. He has the fingers for it, the heart, too, and he never failed to make the Rachmaninoff concerto a garden of color. Saturday night, what with the excessively animated Mr. Bernstein mishandling cues and tempi, there were moments when Mr. Kapell's usual and imperturbable calm was somewhat shaken, but his performance had as its basic ingredients all the elements of good taste, warmth and technical perfection which continue to make his playing a lasting pleasure and an all-round delight.

J. S. H.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 19 1951

Toscanini At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

There was a hushed atmosphere in Carnegie Hall early last Saturday night. A spirit of dedication permeated the hall. If this was to be Toscanini's final appearance with the NBC Symphony, the occasion was one of tribute expressed only through the medium of music.

That Toscanini conducted as he always has with that inimitable recreative touch goes without further reporting. In the haunting beauty of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," in the brilliant orchestration of Respighi's "Fountains of Rome," and in the personal expressivity of Elgar's "Enigma" variations, he was quite at home.

The performances reflected both his greatness and that which he always inspires in other musicians.

By coincidence he found himself playing Elgar's notable tribute to friendship in this special moment. As he infused the music with that enkindling warmth and spirit which prompted Elgar to write of his friends, Toscanini unconsciously revealed himself as a great friend to man.

There is of course no way of telling how final this moment was. Forced to curtail his NBC concerts, he has said nothing of retirement. Almost 84, he is still young enough to stage a comeback.

* * *

Boston Matinee

Charles Munch gave the Boston Symphony matinee audience a full measure of music in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. Little of it was familiar, most of it was entertaining, and some of it was absorbing.

If the lush romanticism of Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" sounded old-fashioned, the empty modernism of Rivier's violin concerto in its first New York performance sounded overnew. Bloch's "Baal Shem" sounded just right. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony made a strong bid for increasing recognition.

Munch and the orchestra were in excellent form throughout this long program.

Ruth Posselt was the able soloist. She negotiated the Rivier expertly and the Bloch feelingly.

* * *

Three Meet

Ten minutes of glamorous dancing brought together Maria Tallchief, Nora Kaye, and Andre Eglevsky at the City Center last night.

Joined in Balanchine's "Pas de Trois," new to the New York City Ballet, they brought down the house with a happy combination of graceful lyricism and brilliant virtuosity.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
FEB 24 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program presented yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, under the baton of Richard Burgin, opened with Beethoven's Overture to Egmont. A more powerful curtain raiser can hardly be found. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra handled with authority the profoundly tragic yet triumphant composition, one of the few pieces in this class of symphonic overtures possessing more than sound and fury.

Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, studded with brilliant technical devices and symphonic complexities, was the middle work of the concert. The first movement is melodically the most interesting; the second depends on rhythmical tricks for effectiveness; the episodic third movement is the weakest of the four; the last movement, in contrast, is inordinately tense. The music is meticulously worked out and only rarely does the composer's virtuosity get in the way of the music. Not heard here for some years, the Symphonic Dances should take their place beside Mathis der Mahler in our symphonic repertory.

An arrangement of the Quartet in G minor for piano and strings by Johannes Brahms, transcribed in 1937 for large orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg, appeared last on the program. Schoenberg took particular pains to employ typically Brahmsian sonorities in the instrumentation, and the transcription in consequence sounds like a new symphonic work of the composer. In its new dress the Quartet both loses and gains something. To anyone familiar with the original setting, the themes in this transcription sound a bit out of place. The first movement, one of the most grandly tragic works ever written in that tragic key, G minor, in this arrangement seems inflated and disjointed, as it does not in the original. I suspect that there is more of the Gurrelieder here than Brahms. However, the last movement gains by the larger orchestral color. The Gypsy Rondo, with its flashes of fire and color, and its intensely rhythmic gypsy swing, belongs to the dance as well as the concert hall.

Richard Burgin conducted with style and feeling. The orchestra played with resultant precision and elan.

TUCKER KEISER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BEST—A special arts section in the fifth anniversary issue of Holiday magazine picks the 10 best symphony orchestras of the nation, placing the Boston Symphony as No. 1. Here are conductor Charles Munch, first cellist Samuel Mayes and concert master Richard Burgin looking over a special bound copy of the issue.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 22 1951

Public Bequests of $500,000 in Richardson Will

SALEM, Feb. 21—Public bequests amounting to more than $500,000 are included in the will of William King Richardson, late of Nahant, former Boston lawyer, which was allowed in Essex County Probate Court today.

Richardson, who died Jan. 28, left real estate worth $40,000 and personal property valued at $2,500,000.

The will gives outright bequests of $50,000 to the Parish of the Advent, Brimmer st., Boston, as an endowment fund, $5000 to the parish for a memorial in his memory and $40,000 to Harvard College for two annual classical scholarships of $500 each.

Bequests of $5000 each are directed to two cousins, Mrs. Mary King Richardson and Mrs. Anita Woodard, and to Dorothy Phalon, for many years the attorney's secretary.

Richardson, uncle of former State Treasurer Laurence Curtis, directs that domestic servants, gardeners and chauffeurs in his employ 20 years be given $3000 each, 10 years $2000 each, five years $1000 each, and those in his employ for shorter periods be given $500 apiece.

Real estate at 306 Beacon st., Boston, and 58 Winter st., Nahant, and all tangible personal property is given to a sister, Mrs. Grace Tuckerman, Boston.

A $800,000 trust fund is set up for another sister, Mrs. Fannie L. Curtis, Brookline, with a nephew, Louis Curtis, and Albert M. Lyons, Newton, as trustees. Mrs. Curtis is to receive the income for life and on her death one-half of the principal is to be given outright to her issue.

The other half of the trust then is to be disposed of as follows: $50,000 to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, $25,000 to the Nashotah House, Nashotah, Wis., $10,000 each to the Family Welfare Society of Boston and the Morgan Memorial Co-Operative Industries and Stores, Inc., $15,000 to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation of the District of Columbia, and $5000 each to the Russian Theological Academy Fund of New York, the Church Home Society for the Care of Children of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Boston, the Boston Dispensary, Co-Operative Workrooms, Inc., St. Monica's Home, Boston, St. Andrews School, St. Andrews, Tenn., and the Order of Poor Brethren of St. Francis of the American Congregation of Franciscans, Mt. Sinai, N. Y.

The remainder of the trust fund capital is to be given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Four-sevenths of the residue is given to the two nephews, Louis Curtis and Laurence Curtis. Two-sevenths is bequeathed to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, preferably for purchase of 15th and 16th century paintings. The other seventh is given to the Order of the Holy Cross, West Park, N. Y.

Ex-State Treasurer Curtis and Albert M. Lyons were appointed by Judge John V. Phelan as executors of the will, which was signed Sept. 23, 1948.

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
FEB 27 1951

BOSTON. — (UP) — A pretty young North Adams soprano was named to-day to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it plays for the first time a work by Composer Franz Schubert. Conductor Charles Munch said Miss Christine Cardillo, about 25, would appear Friday and Saturday in Schubert's Mass No. 2 in G minor at Symphony Hall. Munch said Miss Cardillo, whose brother Pasquale plays the clarinet in the orchestra, was selected as result of auditions given several singers.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 21 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BEST—A special arts section in the fifth anniversary issue of Holiday magazine picks the 10 best symphony orchestras of the nation, placing the Boston Symphony as No. 1. Here are conductor Charles Munch, first cellist Samuel Mayes and concert master Richard Burgin looking over a special bound copy of the issue.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 18 1951

MUNCH CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruckner's Seventh, Rivier's Violin Concerto Presented —Ruth Posselt Is Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, with Ruth Posselt, violinist, as soloist, was heard in a strangely devised program yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The schedule comprised the Overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony as its purely orchestral offerings. Between them, Miss Posselt appeared in the Violin Concerto by Jean Rivier and in two excerpts from Bloch's "Baal Shem."

Only the overture to Schumann's sole opera, "Genoveva," comes to occasional performance, the rest of the work, which was doomed from the first by its undramatic content, being virtually forgotten despite its many pages of pronounced beauty.

But the overture itself sounded dated yesterday, much more so in fact than many other overtures of Schumann's time including his own to "Manfred." Mr. Munch invested every measure of it with ravishing sound, read the slow introduction with the requisite melancholy, made the rest of the score duly impassioned and brought the whole to a brilliantly exultant termination.

He then turned his attention to the Rivier concerto, which received its New York première. This amorphous, empty composition by the 55-year-old French composer, became most articulate in its central slow section, but all of it was fragmentary, episodic and restless, with constantly changing orchestral combinations that had no relation to one another or to the tricky solo part.

Lean, bizarre and ineffectual, with fuzzy rhythms and a long conventional cadenza that had nothing to do with the modernistic nature of the work as an entity, it was curiously lacking in personality.

Miss Posselt played it with the care and virtuosity awaited from her. But her talents found worthier outlet in the "Vidui" and "Nigun" from Bloch's three pictures of Chassidic life, "Baal Shem."

How real and impressive these well-known pieces sounded after the trivialities of the violin concerto! How rich and pleasing the orchestration, how essentially direct and explicit every measure of the music! Miss Posselt evoked their devout, fervent moods in telling fashion, presenting their solo part with a skill and depth of poetry that was well matched by the orchestra, in its fine support.

With the Bloch pieces and the Schumann overture the concert found most to impart. For if Mr. Munch's presentation of the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner was a constant revelation of gloriously beautiful tone, his conception of the masterpiece failed to disclose its inherent profundity and intensity of feeling, its monumental power.

The interpretation was marked by a refinement and transparency deserving special mention. But Bruckner demands greater weightiness, a more leisurely pace, to make the content achieve moving eloquence. The rapid tempo employed in the "Moderato" sections of the Adagio was one of many instances of too hurried an approach to this expansive opus, and by making a long cut just before the close of the finale the final climactic section of the work fell apart and lost all of its emphasis.

It was difficult to understand why Mr. Munch waited until the end of the symphony to make his first and only cut, which saved very few minutes in time and yet damaged the reading badly. There were many fine details and well contrived climaxes in performance, much that was lyric and tender, but the true grandeur of the four movements was missing in spite of the marvelous smoothness of all of the playing, even the tuba quintet boasting an almost unbelievable mellowness.

N. S.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 23 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEST IN LAND—Conductor Charles Munch (left) Samuel Mayes, first cellist, and Concert Master Richard Burgin (right) look over the fifth anniversary issue of Holiday magazine which lists the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the best in the nation.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 19[illegible]

THE Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, gave a concert at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday of last week. Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," Bartók's "Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta," and Dvořák's Symphony No. 4 were the works presented. It was an enjoyable concert, with interest centered on the Bartók selection, which, although it is by no means unfamiliar to local concertgoers, lent a somewhat fresh tone to the proceedings. Also, its performance was the best of the evening.

The Boston Symphony provides its subscribers with booklets containing rather detailed program notes, and as I was looking through one, before the music started, I ran into a [illegible] discussion of Dvořák's Symphony No. 4, which began: "This symphony published as the Fourth (the [illegible] the Symphony from the New World, published in 1893), was [illegible] the eighth of the symphonies [illegible], four symphonies earlier than published five having been [illegible] forth." There was an aste[illegible] I didn't pursue it to the [illegible] the bottom of the page; instead [illegible] wondering whether even [illegible] notes and dated chitchat [illegible] tre programs weren't prefe[illegible] such stuff as this.

I PAID a second visit to the modernized Double B[illegible] night and was impressed a[illegible] by the sinuous and fascinati[illegible] ance Miss Delia Rigal gives [illegible] "Pagliacci." A couple of [illegible] been made in the casts of t[illegible] "Cavalleria Rusticana," [illegible] of little consequence. Alex[illegible] Rigal's Nedda, Richard T[illegible] voiced Turiddu, in "Cav[illegible] cana," was outstanding.

—Do[illegible]

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 22 1951

Public Bequests of $500,000 in Richardson Will

SALEM, Feb. 21—Public bequests amounting to more than $500,000 are included in the will of William King Richardson, late of Nahant, former Boston lawyer, which was allowed in Essex County Probate Court today.

Richardson, who died Jan. 28, left real estate worth $40,000 and personal property valued at $2,500,000.

The will gives outright bequests of $50,000 to the Parish of the Advent, Brimmer st., Boston, as an endowment fund, $5000 to the parish for a memorial in his memory and $40,000 to Harvard College for two annual classical scholarships of $500 each.

Bequests of $5000 each are directed to two cousins, Mrs. Mary King Richardson and Mrs. Anita Woodard, and to Dorothy Phalon, for many years the attorney's secretary.

Richardson, uncle of former State Treasurer Laurence Curtis, directs that domestic servants, gardeners and chauffeurs in his employ 20 years be given $3000 each, 10 years $2000 each, five years $1000 each, and those in his employ for shorter periods be given $500 apiece.

Real estate at 30½ Beacon st., Boston, and 58 Winter st., Nahant, and all tangible personal property is given to a sister, Mrs. Grace Tuckerman, Boston.

A $200,000 trust fund is set up for another sister, Mrs. Fannie L. Curtis, Brookline, with a nephew, Louis Curtis, and Albert M. Lyons, Newton, as trustees. Mrs. Curtis is to receive the income for life and on her death one-half of the principal is to be given outright to her issue.

The other half of the trust then is to be disposed of as follows: $50,000 to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, $25,000 to the Nashotah House, Nashotah, Wis., $10,000 each to the Family Welfare Society of Boston and the Morgan Memorial Co-Operative Industries and Stores, Inc., $15,000 to the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Foundation of the District of Columbia, and $5000 each to the Russian Theological Academy Fund of New York, the Church Home Society for the Care of Children of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Boston, the Boston Dispensary, Co-Operative Workrooms, Inc., St. Monica's Home, Boston, St. Andrews School, St. Andrews, Tenn., and the Order of Poor Brethren of St. Francis of the American Congregation of Franciscans, Mt. Sinai, N. Y.

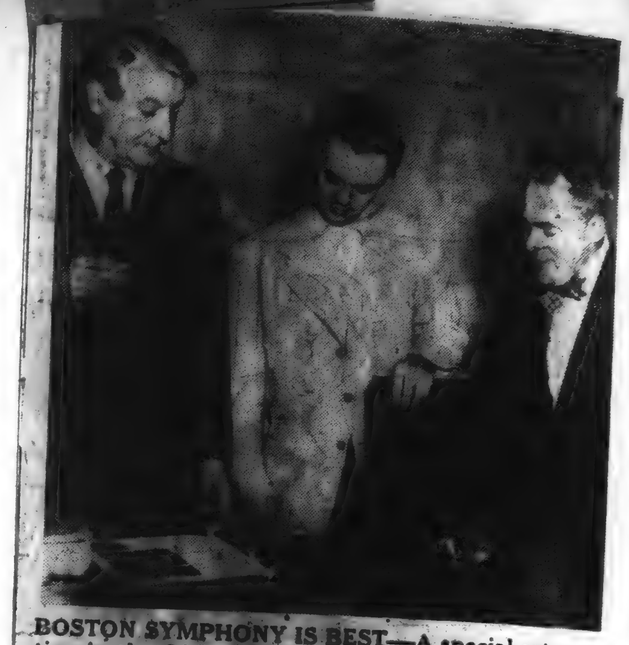
The remainder of the trust fund capital is to be given to the Boston Symphony [illegible]

Four-sevenths of the residue is given to the two nephews, Louis Curtis and Laurence Curtis. Two-sevenths is bequeathed to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, preferably for purchase of 15th and 16th century paintings. The other seventh is given to the Order of the Holy Cross, West Park, N. Y.

Ex-State Treasurer Curtis and Albert M. Lyons were appointed by Judge John V. Phelan as executors of the will, which was signed Sept. 23, 1948.

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
FEB 27 1951

BOSTON. — (UP) — A pretty young North Adams soprano was named to-day to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it plays for the first time a work by Composer Franz Schubert. Conductor Charles Munch said Miss Christine Cardillo, about 25, would appear Friday and Saturday in Schubert's Mass No. 2 in G minor at Symphony Hall. Munch said Miss Cardillo, whose brother Pasquale plays the clarinet in the orchestra, was selected as result of auditions given several singers.



BOSTON SYMPHONY IS BEST—A special arts section in the fifth anniversary issue of Holiday magazine picks the 10 best symphony orchestras of the nation, placing the Boston Symphony as No. 1. Here are conductor Charles Munch, first cellist Samuel Mayes and concert master Richard Burgin looking over a special bound copy of the issue.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 18 1951

MUNCH CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Bruckner's Seventh, Rivier's Violin Concerto Presented —Ruth Posselt Is Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Charles Munch, with Ruth Posselt, violinist, as soloist, was heard in a strangely devised program yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The schedule comprised the Overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony as its purely orchestral offerings. Between them, Miss Posselt appeared in the Violin Concerto by Jean Rivier and in two excerpts from Bloch's "Baal Shem."

Only the overture to Schumann's sole opera, "Genoveva," comes to occasional performance, the rest of the work, which was doomed from the first by its undramatic content, being virtually forgotten despite its many pages of pronounced beauty.

But the overture itself sounded dated yesterday, much more so in fact than many other overtures of Schumann's time including his own to "Manfred." Mr. Munch invested every measure of it with ravishing sound, read the slow introduction with the requisite melancholy, made the rest of the score duly impassioned and brought the whole to a brilliantly exultant termination.

He then turned his attention to the Rivier concerto, which received its New York premiere. This amorphous, empty composition by the 55-year-old French composer, became most articulate in its central slow section, but all of it was fragmentary, episodic and restless, with constantly changing orchestral combinations that had no relation to one another or to the tricky solo part.

Lean, bizarre and ineffectual, with fuzzy rhythms and a long conventional cadenza that had nothing to do with the modernistic nature of the work as an entity, it was curiously lacking in personality.

Miss Posselt played it with the care and virtuosity awaited from her. But her talents found worthier outlet in the "Vidui" and "Nigun" from Bloch's three pictures of Chassidic life, "Baal Shem."

How real and impressive these well-known pieces sounded after the trivialities of the violin concerto! How rich and pleasing the orchestration, how essentially direct and explicit every measure of the music! Miss Posselt evoked their devout, fervent moods in telling fashion, presenting their solo part with a skill and depth of poetry that was well matched by the orchestra, in its fine support.

With the Bloch pieces and the Schumann overture the concert found most to impart. For if Mr. Munch's presentation of the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner was a constant revelation of gloriously beautiful tone, his conception of the masterpiece failed to disclose its inherent profundity and intensity of feeling, its monumental power.

The interpretation was marked by a refinement and transparency deserving special mention. But Bruckner demands greater weightiness, a more leisurely pace, to make the content achieve moving eloquence. The rapid tempo employed in the "Moderato" sections of the Adagio was one of many instances of too hurried an approach to this expansive opus, and by making a long cut just before the close of the finale the final climactic section of the work fell apart and lost all of its emphasis.

It was difficult to understand why Mr. Munch waited until the end of the symphony to make his first and only cut, which saved very few minutes in time and yet damaged the reading badly. There were many fine details and well centrived climaxes in performance, much that was lyric and tender, but the true grandeur of the four movements was missing in spite of the marvelous smoothness of all of the playing, even the tuba quintet boasting an almost unbelievable mellowness.

N. S.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
FEB 23 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEST IN LAND—Conductor Charles Munch (left) Samuel Mayes, first cellist, and Concert Master Richard Burgin (right) look over the fifth anniversary issue of Holiday magazine which lists the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the best in the nation.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 24 1951

THE Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, gave a concert at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday of last week. Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," Bartók's "Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta," and Dvořák's Symphony No. 4 were the works presented. It was an enjoyable concert, with interest centered on the Bartók selection, which, although it is by no means unfamiliar to local concertgoers, lent a somewhat fresh tone to the proceedings. Also, its performance was the best of the evening.

The Boston Symphony provides its subscribers with booklets containing rather detailed program notes, and as I was looking through one, before the music started, I ran into a racy discussion of Dvořák's Symphony No. 4, which began: "This symphony, published as the Fourth (the Fifth being the Symphony 'From the New World,' published in 1893), was actually the eighth of the symphonies of Dvořák, four symphonies earlier than [illegible] published five having been since brought forth." There was an asterisk there, but I didn't pursue it to the footnote at the bottom of the page; instead I fell to wondering whether even the fashion notes and dated chitchat found in theatre programs weren't preferable to such stuff as this.

I PAID a second visit to the Met's modernized Double Bill the other night and was impressed all over again by the sinuous and fascinating performance Miss Delia Rigal gives as Nedda in "Pagliacci." A couple of changes had been made in the casts of both this and "Cavalleria Rusticana," but they were of little consequence. Along with Miss Rigal's Nedda, Richard Tucker's full-voiced Turiddu, in "Cavalleria Rusticana," was outstanding.

—Douglas Watt

[241]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 24 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 17th concert of the 71th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Egmont," Op. 84...Beethoven
Symphonic Dances.....Hindemith
Quartet in G minor, Op. 25 ....Brahms-Schoenberg

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The question in considering yesterday's symphony concert, excellently conducted by Richard Burgin, incidentally, is this: Is the transcribing of chamber music for orchestra an artistic process and to be encouraged?

THE ANSWER to this is very clearly "yes." It depends, however, on who does the transcribing and how he approaches the work to be transcribed. The case in point in this week's concerts is Brahms G minor Piano Quartet as arranged for full orchestra, xylophone and all, by Arnold Schoenberg. The Quartet is, in the first place, a strikingly beautiful and effective piece and one that in its original form is virtually never heard in concert. (Indeed, to reflect on the vast quantities of chamber music that is nowadays seldom if ever performed in public is pretty disheartening . . . though it must be said the smaller recording companies are rapidly filling the breach.)

In the second place this Quartet is a big work in every sense of the word. That its character is changed by transcription to the orchestra goes without saying, but its essence is not distorted too far out of the composer's intention. It retains its bigness of style in the orchestra, but gains in color, in tonal variety and even in subtlety of mood: the magical little coda of the Intermezzo, for example, and the first cadenza of the marvelous gypsy Rondo, here given to the clarinet.

THE CLARINET'S role in the transcription, and indeed of the entire woodwind section, is Schoenberg's trump. Nobody could have more truly captured the special sound of Brahms' own woodwinds than he in this; the oboes and clarinets are perfectly disposed throughout. While there are moments here and there that suggest the Strauss orchestral palette it is exceedingly close approximation of the Brahms orchestra in spirit as well as sound. Thus it always comes back to the artistic integrity and technical capacity of the transcriber, and whatever else one may say about Arnold Schoenberg, he has these qualities in heroic quantities.

As for the matter of transcription, it must be remembered that Brahms himself transcribed this and many other chamber pieces for piano duet, that Bach transcribed his own and others' music right and left (his D minor concerto for two violins, to name but one of a hundred things, occurs as a two-piano concerto in a different key), and that up until recent times composers wrote music that could be played by any instruments that happened to turn up. The question, in fine, is always "Who is doing the transcription?" In this case, with Schoenberg doing it, it is right and it is good. I wish more transcriptions of this sort were performed—and there are many available.

THE CONCERT began with Beethoven's familiar Overture to "Egmont," and found Mr. Burgin conducting for the first time in my experience with a baton. I found this a notable improvement in his conducting, too, giving him additional clarity and authority and contributing as well to the visual aspects of his work. Baton or no, he was at his very best in the Hindemith Symphonic Dances, which he read with exactitude but with admirable freedom of nuance, with force but without being domineering.

The dances themselves are Hindemith in his best vein with massive utterances in the heavy brass and percussion and with unfaltering melodic inspiration and motor force throughout. I felt they continued after they had made their point and I felt, too, that they were all of a color, that the contrasts were either black or white. Nonetheless they are contemporary music at its very best and Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, who had a couple of ups and downs in the Brahms, did them in a brilliant and exciting fashion.

Mr. Munch returns next week to do Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Nabokov's "La Vita Nova" for soprano, tenor and orchestra, and Schubert's Mass in G major with a chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
FEB 24 1951

The Big Ten

"One of the most exciting cultural advantages of the past half century," writes the noted music critic, Deems Taylor, in the March issue of Holiday magazine, "has been the extraordinary rise of the American orchestra. In 1900 we had seven major symphony orchestras. Today, there are at least 25 orchestras of first rank, orchestras that are the peer of anything that Europe has produced."

In evaluating these orchestras, Mr. Taylor selects what he terms "The Ten Finest"—the nation's very best orchestras. Opinion is virtually unanimous, he says, that the Big Three are the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra. "And here," he continues, "are the remaining seven. Suppose we consider them as tied for second place."

Included in the seven is the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, which shares honors with the Chicago Symphony, the Cincinnati Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Minneapolis Symphony, the St. Louis Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony—all from cities considerably larger than Indianapolis. Of the Indianapolis orchestra, Mr. Taylor notes: "Founded in 1930. This is the youngest of the Big Ten. In his 13 years as conductor, Fabien Sevitzky has produced astonishing results."

Indianapolis, obviously, can—and should—take pride in its orchestra. And it can show its appreciation by oversubscribing the $110,000 campaign of the Indiana State Symphony Society, in order to assure that the Indianapolis Symphony will continue to uphold its present high standard.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program presented yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, under the baton of Richard Burgin, opened with Beethoven's Overture to Egmont. A more powerful curtain raiser can hardly be found. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra handled with authority the profoundly tragic yet triumphant composition, one of the few pieces in this class of symphonic overtures possessing more than sound and fury.

Hindemith's Symphonic Dances, studded with brilliant technical devices and symphonic complexities, was the middle work of the concert. The first movement is melodically the most interesting; the second depends on rhythmical tricks for effectiveness; the episodic third movement is the weakest of the four; the last movement, in contrast, is inordinately tense. The music is meticulously worked out and only rarely does the composer's virtuosity get in the way of the music. Not heard here for some years, the Symphonic Dances should take their place beside Mathis der Mahler in our symphonic repertory.

An arrangement of the Quartet in G minor for piano and strings by Johannes Brahms, transcribed in 1937 for large orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg, appeared last on the program. Schoenberg took particular pains to employ typically Brahmsian sonorities in the instrumentation, and the transcription in consequence sounds like a new symphonic work of the composer. In its new dress the Quartet both loses and gains something. To anyone familiar with the original setting, the themes in this transcription sound a bit out of place. The first movement, one of the most grandly tragic works ever written in that tragic key, G minor, in this arrangement seems inflated and disjointed, as it does not in the original. I suspect that there is more of the Gurrelieder here than Brahms. However, the last movement gains by the larger orchestral color. The Gypsy Rondo, with its flashes of fire and color, and its intensely rhythmic gypsy swing, belongs to the dance as well as the concert hall.

Richard Burgin conducted with style and feeling. The orchestra played with resultant precision and elan.

TUCKER KEISER.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
FEB 24 1951

MUSIC

Burgin Conducts Pieces by Beethoven, Hindemith and Brahms at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Time was when a wholly German program at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts meant a classical afternoon. That is no longer so, for while the list that Richard Burgin conducts this week is wholly Teutonic in origin, there is but one-third classic about it. The first number is Bethoven's "Egmont" Overture, substituted for the previously announced Italian Serenade by Hugo Wolf. This is followed by Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestration of Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet.

Hindemith's music, introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky in 1938, wears well, although perhaps it is too long for its essential substance. The style is that of the "Mathis der Maler" period in Hindemith's career, and in fact there were numerous reminiscences from the three well-known orchestra excerpts from that opera. The long, somewhat restless melodic lines, the dissonant counterpoint, the sustained brisk rhythms and the frequent punctuation by heavy chords; those procedures and mannerisms are all present in the Symphonic Dances.

The word "dances" should not be taken literally by those making acquaintance with the score, for the relationship between Hindemith's music and the dance is slight. The emphasis lies wholly on the first half of the title: "symphonic." The work is prevailingly idea music, and on that ground its worth is evident and considerable. Sensuous beauty came next in the composer's purpose.

Just why Mr. Schoenberg, the respected adventurer in the 12-tone system, and a leading musical theoretician of our time, should have found it advisable to orchestrate Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet is a question which finds no ready answer. It is one thing to orchestrate Bach chorale-preludes which, by reason of their creation for organ, otherwise would be seldom heard by the large public.

But to trick up, and decorate, and fuss over, and inflate a familiar chamber work is another matter. Purely as orchestral technique this transcription has its merits, although it is mostly pretty heavy. But it completely alters the musical character of Brahms' Quartet and makes of it what comes near being an artistic hodge-podge. Brahms' idiom had an intimate relationship to the medium in which he expressed himself. That of Bach, generally speaking, was more objective, less persnoal. A Bach organ work, well arranged for orchestra, is still Bach; Brahms' Quartet gains nothing and loses its soul by the transference.

The good points of Mr. Burgin's conducting: clarity, a flair for the style and the complexities of modern music, were pleasurably apparent in Hindemith and Schoenberg-Brahms. The "Egmont" Overture, however, went perfunctorily.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 24 1951

MUSIC

Burgin Conducts Pieces by Beethoven, Hindemith and Brahms at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Time was when a wholly German program at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts meant a classical afternoon. That is no longer so, for while the list that Richard Burgin conducts this week is wholly Teutonic in origin, there is but one-third classic about it. The first number is Bethoven's "Egmont" Overture, substituted for the previously announced Italian Serenade by Hugo Wolf. This is followed by Hindemith's Symphonic Dances and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestration of Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet.

Hindemith's music, introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky in 1938, wears well, although perhaps it is too long for its essential substance. The style is that of the "Mathis der Maler" period in Hindemith's career, and in fact there were numerous reminiscences from the three well-known orchestra excerpts from that opera. The long, somewhat restless melodic lines, the dissonant counterpoint, the sustained brisk rhythms and the frequent punctuation by heavy chords; those procedures and mannerisms are all present in the Symphonic Dances.

The word "dances" should not be taken literally by those making acquaintance with the score, for the relationship between Hindemith's music and the dance is slight. The emphasis lies wholly on the first half of the title: "symphonic." The work is prevailingly idea music, and on that ground its worth is evident and considerable. Sensuous beauty came next in the composer's purpose.

Just why Mr. Schoenberg, the respected adventurer in the 12-tone system, and a leading musical theoretician of our time, should have found it advisable to orchestrate Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet is a question which finds no ready answer. It is one thing to orchestrate Bach chorale-preludes which, by reason of their creation for organ, otherwise would be seldom heard by the large public.

But to trick up, and decorate, and fuss over, and inflate a familiar chamber work is another matter. Purely as orchestral technique this transcription has its merits, although it is mostly pretty heavy. But it completely alters the musical character of Brahms' Quartet and makes of it what comes near being an artistic hodge-podge. Brahms' idiom had an intimate relationship to the medium in which he expressed himself. That of Bach, generally speaking, was more objective, less persnoal. A Bach organ work, well arranged for orchestra, is still Bach; Brahms' Quartet gains nothing and loses its soul by the transference.

The good points of Mr. Burgin's conducting: clarity, a flair for the style and the complexities of modern music, were pleasurably apparent in Hindemith and Schoenberg-Brahms. The "Egmont" Overture, however, went perfunctorily.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
FEB 25 1951

Two Presidents Will Hear Boston Symphony Concert

President Truman and President Vincent Auriol of France will attend the concert at Constitution Hall the evening of March 31, when French conductor Charles Munch brings his great American orchestra, the Boston Symphony, to Washington. The two presidents will face each other across Constitution Hall, seated in flag-draped boxes.

The President and Mrs. Truman, the Ambassador of Norway and Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne, and the Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson head the list of distinguished sponsors for the March 31 concert.

A group from the French Embassy taking boxes for the concert include the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet, the Minister and Mme. Jean Pierre Benard, Minister Counselor Jean Daridan, Counselor Pierre Siraud and Gen. de Corps d'Armee, Paul Ely.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 27 1951

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

Programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been announced from Boston. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct three weekends of chamber-proportioned orchestra on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of July 7-8, 15-16 and 22-23. The full Boston Symphony will make its first appearance in the Music Shed on July 26. Series A and two of the concerts of series B will be directed by Charles Munch with the second program of series B conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct all of the series C programs and will also serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall on July 7-8 will be devoted to music by Bach; July 15-16 to Haydn; and July 22-23 to Mozart.

The series A program under Mr. Munch will include Thursday evening, July 26, Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann Fourth Symphony and Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony." The Saturday evening, July 28 program will include the Piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist and the Prokofieff Sixth Symphony. The Sunday afternoon, July 29 program will consist of the Overture to "The School for Scandal," Barber; "Quiet City," Copland; Fifth Symphony, Mennin; and Franck Symphony in D minor.

The series B programs will open Thursday evening, Aug. 2 with Mr. Munch conducting the Haydn "Drum Roll" symphony; "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Ravel; "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; and the Third Symphony by Roussel. Mr. de Carvalho will conduct the Saturday evening, Aug. 4 program including the Second Symphony, Guarnieri; Second Piano Concerto by Prokofieff with Jorge Bolet as soloist; and "Pictures at an Exhibition," Mossorgsky-Ravel. Mr. Munch will conduct the Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5 program including the Handel Water Music, Music for Strings and Percussion, Bartok, and the Third Symphony (with organ) by Saint-Saens.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open series C with a performance of the "Missa Solemnis," Beethoven, on Thursday evening, Aug. 9. His Saturday evening, Aug. 11 program will include the Beethoven Sixth Symphony (Pastorale) and the Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony (Pathetique). He will close the festival on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12, with the Honegger Fifth Symphony and the Brahms Second Symphony.

Local programs this week will be the Schubert Club concert at Union College Memorial Chapel Friday at 8:30 p.m. and the Schenectady Symphony youth program at the Plaza theater Saturday at 10 a.m.

Paul King, baritone, will be the assisting artist for the Schubert program which will be directed by Dr. Elmer A. Tidmarsh. Anthony R. Stefan will conduct the children's program.

Gertrude Neidlinger, concert comedienne, will present a program at the Albany Institute of History and Art on March 5 under the sponsorship of the Monday Musical Club of Albany. Mrs. Louis Gedrow of 11 South Pine avenue, Albany, is serving as chairman.

Miss Neidlinger began her career as a serious concert recitalist but her gift of musical satire has become her professional preference. Her program includes re-enactments of embarrassing moments that have actually happened on the concert stage to great and would-be prima donnas.

The March issue of "Holiday" has devoted five illustrated articles to music in this country. Written by H. W. Heinsheimer, Deems Taylor and Joseph Wechsberg, they include "This Land of Great Music," "Small Town Symphony," "The Instruments" and an article including musicians selected for a "Dream Orchestra" and one picking the "ten finest orchestras" of the country.

Walter Hampden, distinguished actor, will share the spotlight with Nelson Eddy, baritone, for Monday's "Telephone Hour" broadcast at 9 p.m. Hampden will present a special narration written for the diamond jubilee of the invention of the telephone.

The Pablo Casals Music Festival dates have been changed. Originally announced for June 10 to July 5 the festival has been postponed and will be held from July 7 to 26 at Perpignan, Pyrenees Orientales, France.

Soloists will include Rudolf Serkin, Dame Myra Hess, Isaac Stern, Jennie Tourel, William Primrose, Doda Conrad, Helene Fahrni, Clara Haskil, Mieczyslaw Horszowski, Eugene Istomin, Yvonne Lefebure, Leopold Mannes, Erica Morini, Alexander Schneider, Marcel Tabuteau and John Wummer.

Works of Bach, Beethoven and Mozart will be performed and the festival will be held in the palace of the Kings of Mallorca.

R. Lloyd Adams, organist-pianist of Pomona, Calif., has won the W. W. Kimball award of $100 for a musical setting of Helen Field Watson's poem, "In June." The contest was sponsored by the Chicago Singing Teachers Guild and had 103 entrants from the United States and Canada. Mr. Adams is organist at Trinity Methodist Church in Pomona.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 26 1951

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the Sunday afternoon series yesterday. Patricia Travers, violinist was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" ..... Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin and orchestra, D Major ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 6 in E Flat Minor ..... Prokofieff

Violinist Patricia Travers, who bears a striking resemblance to screen star Wendy Hiller, was the soloist yesterday in the Symphony's fourth concert of the Sunday afternoon series. The Brahms Concerto in D Major, which has somehow come down to us characterized mainly by von Bulow's uninspired epigram as a "concer against the violin," provided t lovely and formidable setti for her considerable talents.

Forceful and vigorous, M Travers revealed intellect penetration as she compassed difficult work. Complete cont of the bow arm gave her a si ing legato line, but even more the point created a structu where principles of variety a balance contrasted against ea other. Bravura gypsy fiddling a lyricism are easily confused; s can toss one off as blithely she can concentrate on the de cate tonal shadings of the oth

She was at her best, perha in the first and third movemer where her rhythmic power show to advantage. The repose a serenity of the adagio were le satisfactory; overtones of urgen tinged the section slightly thou its lyric qualities were not i nored entirely. The first mov ment, however, came off wi emotional intensity as well as t third, and Miss Travers' entire a pearance was full of sound wor manship and technical proficienc Ralph Gomberg assisted han somely as the oboist carrying t main theme in the adagio.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
FEB 24 1951

Frankie Carle comes to Loew's Globe with his nationally popular dance band for continuous performances Monday afternoon and night.

Passing Show

—By Fred Russell

Serge Koussevitsky will conduct Beethoven's "Micsa Solemnis" at the Berkshire Festival, it was announced yesterday when the programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the shed on the three major weekends of the festival were made public. Charles Munch, who will be conducting at Tanglewood for the first time, will begin the festival Thursday evening, July 26.

His first program will consist of Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. At his second concert, July 28, Mr. Munch will lead Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. Claudio Arrau will appear with him as soloist in a piano concerto still to be announced. Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Mennin's Fifth Symphony and Franck's symphony will make up the third program on July 29.

Mr. Munch's fourth concert on Aug. 2 will include Haydn's "Drum Roll" Symphony, Ravel's Rhapsodie Espagnole, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Eleazar de Carvalho, who will conduct the Aug. 4 concert, will direct Guarnieri's Second Symphony. Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, with Jorge Bolet as the soloist, and the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Munch's fifth and last concert on Aug. 5 will have Handel's Water Music. Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion and Saint-Saen's Third Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the final weekend. His performance of the Beethoven Mass will be on Aug. 9. On Aug. 11 he will lead Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" and, on Aug. 12, Honegger's Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Second.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
FEB 26 1951

Trumans On Patrons List

The President and Mrs. Truman, the dean of the diplomatic corps, Norwegian Ambassador Wilhelm Munthe de Morgenstierne and Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne, and the Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson are among the patrons for the Boston Symphony concert at Constitution hall on March 31 at which the President of France, Vincent Auriol, will be present.

Charles Munch, French-born conductor of the Boston symphony, will be on the podium.

Other patrons for the concert are Associate Justice and Mrs. Frankfurter, Sen. and Mrs. Saltonstall, Rep. and Mrs. Wigglesworth, the Chief of Protocol and Mrs. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Grew, Mr. and Mrs. Jouett Shouse, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. Matthew Whittall and many many more.

Among those from the French embassy who have booked boxes for the concert are the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet, Minister Counselor Daridan, Counselor Siraud, and First Secretary and Mme. Benard.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Charles Munch returned to the podium yesterday afternoon from a brief mid-season vacation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fourth concert in the Sunday afternoon series. The program consisted of a musical bon-bon—one of the greatest violin concertos ever written, and an excellent new symphony now on the banned list in Russia.

Discussing the program in reverse order, let us consider the case of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, completed in 1947. Shortly after its first performance the composer's music was attacked and accused of "confusing and neuropathic combinations which turn music into cacophany and a chaotic accumulation of sounds." The above criticism just doe NOT apply to the Sixth Symphony. Despite the fact that the first movement is the least interesting of the three movements, the form is not at all difficult to follow and the sounds are well ordered. The second movement, one of the most pleasant pieces written during the last 25 years, is slow and song-like in character. The third and final movement is as clear and tuneful as a score by Rodgers and Hammerstein—and about as obvious. If the Soviet cultural arbiters hear chaos in this symphony, it is probably due to the fact that their sense of hearing has been dulled by listening to so much of their hysterical propaganda.

Patricia Travers was the soloist in the Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major. Miss Travers, who appears to be still this side of 20, has a good solid technique. Her tone is not a large one, but it has a beauty found too rarely in our younger violinists.

Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" served as the opening number. The overture to this nearly forgotten opera is excellent "Pops" material—cute, colorful and Gilbert and Sullivanish.

'S ONE Y
FRANCE
FRANCE AMERIQUE
L POBERS 535 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

● Musique: Bilan d'une semaine: Gregor Piatigorsky est revenu après une longue retraite au cours de laquelle il n'a perdu aucune de ses belles qualités . . . 4ème concert de Munch et ses "Bostoniens" avec au programme: première audition d'un concerto de Jean Rivier... Pierre Fournier au Town Hall, fidèle à lui-même, c'est-à-dire excellent . . . A part ça, les Français ne sont pas une race de musiciens. Wagner dixit.

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
FEB 25 1951

THE WORLD OF MU

Plans have been announced for the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's new music [illegible] tor, will be at Tanglewood this Summer for the first time and will share with Serge Koussevitzky, retired leader of the Bostonians, in conducting the concerts in the Tanglewood music shed.

Koussevitzky, continuing as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, will open the festival with three week-ends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22, devoting the programs to the music of Bach, Mozart an Haydn.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. The festival will close on Aug. 12.

[243]

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 27 1951

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

Programs for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been announced from Boston. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct three weekends of chamber-proportioned orchestra on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of July 7-8, 15-16 and 22-23. The full Boston Symphony will make its first appearance in the Music Shed on July 26. Series A and two of the concerts of series B will be directed by Charles Munch with the second program of series B conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct all of the series C programs and will also serve as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

Programs in the Theatre-Concert Hall on July 7-8 will be devoted to music by Bach; July 15-16 to Haydn; and July 22-23 to Mozart.

The series A program under Mr. Munch will include Thursday evening, July 26, Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva;" Schumann Fourth Symphony and Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony." The Saturday evening, July 28 program will include the Piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist and the Prokofieff Sixth Symphony. The Sunday afternoon, July 29 program will consist of the Overture to "The School for Scandal," Barber; "Quiet City," Copland; Fifth Symphony, Mennin; and Franck Symphony in D minor.

The series B programs will open Thursday evening, Aug. 2 with Mr. Munch conducting the Haydn "Drum Roll" symphony; "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Ravel; "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; and the Third Symphony by Roussel. Mr. de Carvalho will conduct the Saturday evening, Aug. 4 program including the Second Symphony, Guarnieri; Second Piano Concerto by Prokofieff with Jorge Bolet as soloist; and "Pictures at an Exhibition," Mossorgsky-Ravel. Mr. Munch will conduct the Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5 program including the Handel Water Music, Music for Strings and Percussion, Bartok, and the Third Symphony (with organ) by Saint Saens.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open series C with a performance of the "Missa Solemnis," Beethoven, on Thursday evening, Aug. 9. His Saturday evening, Aug. 11 program will include the Beethoven Sixth Symphony (Pastorale) and the Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony (Pathetique). He will close the festival on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12, with the Honegger Fifth Symphony and the Brahms Second Symphony.

Local programs this week will be the Schubert Club concert at Union College Memorial Chapel Friday at 8:30 p.m. and the Schenectady Symphony youth program at the Plaza theater Saturday at 10 a.m.

Paul King, baritone, will be the assisting artist for the Schubert program which will be directed by Dr. Elmer A. Tidmarsh. Anthony St. Stefan will conduct the children's program.

Gertrude Neidlinger, concert comedienne, will present a program at the Albany Institute of History and Art on March 5 under the sponsorship of the Monday Musical Club of Albany. Mrs. Louis Gedrew of 11 South Pine avenue, Albany, is serving as chairman.

Miss Neidlinger began her career as a serious concert recitalist but her gift of musical satire has become her professional preference. Her program includes re-enactments of embarrassing moments that have actually happened on the concert stage to great and would-be prima donnas.

The March issue of "Holiday" was devoted five illustrated articles to music in this country. Written by H. W. Heinsheimer, Deems Taylor and Joseph Wechsberg, they include "This Land of Great Music," "Small Town Symphony," "The Instruments" and an article including musicians selected for a "Dream Orchestra" and one picking the "ten finest orchestras" of the country.

Walter Hampden, distinguished actor, will share the spotlight with Nelson Eddy, baritone, for Monday's "Telephone Hour" broadcast at 9 p.m. Hampden will present a special narration written for the diamond jubilee of the invention of the telephone.

The Pablo Casals Music Festival dates have been changed. Originally announced for June 10 to July 5 the festival has been postponed and will be held from July 7 to 26 at Perpignan, Pyrenees Orientales, France.

Soloists will include Rudolf Serkin, Dame Myra Hess, Isaac Stern, Jennie Tourel, William Primrose, Doda Conrad, Helene Fahrni, Clara Haskil, Mieczyslaw Horszowski, Eugene Istomin, Yvonne Lefebure, Leopold Mannes, Erica Morini, Alexander Schneider, Marcel Tabuteau and John Wummer.

Works of Bach, Beethoven and Mozart will be performed and the festival will be held in the palace of the Kings of Mallorca.

R. Lloyd Adams, organist-pianist of Pomona, Calif., has won the W. W. Kimball award of $100 for a musical setting of Helen Field Watson's poem, "In June." The contest was sponsored by the Chicago Singing Teachers Guild and had 103 entrants from the United States and Canada. Mr. Adams is organist at Trinity Methodist Church in Pomona.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
FEB 26 1951

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the Sunday afternoon series yesterday. Patricia Travers, violinist was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" ..... Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin and orchestra, D Major ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 6 in E Flat Minor ..... Prokofieff

Violinist Patricia Travers, who bears a striking resemblance to screen star Wendy Hiller, was the soloist yesterday in the Symphony's fourth concert of the Sunday afternoon series. The Brahms Concerto in D Major, which has somehow come down to us characterized mainly by von Bulow's uninspired epigram as a "concer against the violin," provided t lovely and formidable setti for her considerable talents.

Forceful and vigorous, M Travers revealed intellectu penetration as she compassed t difficult work. Complete cont of the bow arm gave her a sir ing legato line, but even more the point created a structu where principles of variety a balance contrasted against ea other. Bravura gypsy fiddling a lyricism are easily confused; s can toss one off as blithely she can concentrate on the de cate tonal shadings of the oth

She was at her best, perha in the first and third movemen where her rhythmic power show to advantage. The repose a serenity of the adagio were le satisfactory; overtones of urgen tinged the section slightly thou its lyric qualities were not nored entirely. The first mov ment, however, came off wi emotional intensity as well as t third, and Miss Travers' entire a pearance was full of sound wor manship and technical proficienc Ralph Gomberg assisted han somely as the oboist carrying t main theme in the adagio.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
FEB 24 1951

Frankie Carle comes to Loew's Globe with his nationally popular dance band for continuous performances Monday afternoon and night.

Passing Show

—By Fred Russell

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" at the Berkshire Festival, it was announced yesterday when the programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the shed on the three major weekends of the festival were made public. Charles Munch, who will be conducting at Tanglewood for the first time, will begin the festival Thursday evening, July 26.

His first program will consist of Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva" and Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. At his second concert, July 28, Mr. Munch will lead Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. Claudio Arrau will appear with him as soloist in a piano concerto still to be announced. Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Mennin's Fifth Symphony and Franck's symphony will make up the third program on July 29.

Mr. Munch's fourth concert on Aug. 2 will include Haydn's "Drum Roll" Symphony, Ravel's Rhapsodie Espagnole, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Eleazar de Carvalho, who will conduct the Aug. 4 concert, will direct Guarnieri's Second Symphony, Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, with Jorge Bolet as the soloist, and the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Munch's fifth and last concert on Aug. 5 will have Handel's Water Music, Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion and Saint-Saen's Third Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the final weekend. His performance of the Beethoven Mass will be on Aug. 9. On Aug. 11 he will lead Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" and, on Aug. 12, Honegger's Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Second.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
FEB 26 1951

Trumans On Patrons List

The President and Mrs. Truman, the dean of the diplomatic corps, Norwegian Ambassador Wilhelm Munthe de Morgenstierne and Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne, and the Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson are among the patrons for the Boston Symphony concert at Constitution hall on March 31 at which the President of France, Vincent Auriol, will be present.

Charles Munch, French-born conductor of the Boston symphony, will be on the podium.

Other patrons for the concert are Associate Justice and Mrs. Frankfurter, Sen. and Mrs. Saltonstall, Rep. and Mrs. Wigglesworth, the Chief of Protocol and Mrs. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph C. Grew, Mr. and Mrs. Jouett Shouse, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. Matthew Whittall and many many more.

Among those from the French embassy who have booked boxes for the concert are the Ambassador and Mme. Bonnet, Minister Counselor Daridan, Counselor Siraud, and First Secretary and Mme. Benard.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
FEB 26 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Charles Munch returned to the podium yesterday afternoon from a brief mid-season vacation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fourth concert in the Sunday afternoon series. The program consisted of a musical bon-bon—one of the greatest violin concertos ever written, and an excellent new symphony now on the banned list in Russia.

Discussing the program in reverse order, let us consider the case of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, completed in 1947. Shortly after its first performance the composer's music was attacked and accused of "confusing and neuropathic combinations which turn music into cacophany and a chaotic accumulation of sounds." The above criticism just doe NOT apply to the Sixth Symphony. Despite the fact that the first movement is the least interesting of the three movements, the form is not at all difficult to follow and the sounds are well ordered. The second movement, one of the most pleasant pieces written during the last 25 years, is slow and song-like in character. The third and final movement is as clear and tuneful as a score by Rodgers and Hammerstein—and about as obvious. If the Soviet cultural arbiters hear chaos in this symphony, it is probably due to the fact that their sense of hearing has been dulled by listening to so much of their hysterical propaganda.

Patricia Travers was the soloist in the Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major. Miss Travers, who appears to be still this side of 20, has a good solid technique. Her tone is not a large one, but it has a beauty found too rarely in our younger violinists.

Saint-Saens' Overture to "La Princesse Jaune" served as the opening number. The overture to this nearly forgotten opera is excellent "Pops" material—cute, colorful and Gilbert and Sullivanish.

'S ONE YI FRANCE

FRANCE AMERIQUE

L POBERS 535 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

NUMERO DU 25 FEVRIER 1951

● Musique: Bilan d'une semaine: Gregor Piatigorsky est revenu après une longue retraite au cours de laquelle il n'a perdu aucune de ses belles qualités . . . 4ème concert de Munch et ses "Bostoniens" avec au programme: première audition d'un concerto de Jean Rivier... Pierre Fournier au Town Hall, fidèle à lui-même, c'est-à-dire excellent . . . A part ça, les Français ne sont pas une race de musiciens, Wagner dixit.

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
FEB 25 1951

THE WORLD OF MU

Plans have been announced for the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's new music[illegible]tor, will be at Tanglewood this Summer for the first time and will share with Serge Koussevitzky, retired leader of the Bostonians, in conducting the concerts in the Tanglewood music shed.

Koussevitzky, continuing as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, will open the festival with three week-ends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22, devoting the programs to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. The festival will close on Aug. 12.

[243]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
FEB 18 1951

Ex-Usher to Be Soloist With Boston Symphony

To bridge the gap between the second balcony and stage at Boston's Symphony Hall is every young singer's dream.

And that's the rare thrill that awaits a 26-year-old Boston basso when the lights go down and the music begins to swell at this week's Symphony concerts.

He is Robert Griffin of 270 Huntington av., who has shuffled dishes in the hall's cafeteria, ushered its paying customers to seats and taken tickets at the door, all to earn a seat in the second balcony to hear one of the world's most famous orchestras in action.

He not only has the honor of appearing for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra but of helping it introduce for the first time in its history, Franz Shubert's Mass No. 2 in G Major. Written by the immortal Austrian composer in 1815, it is fairly well known in Europe, but relatively unfamiliar to this country.

See GRIFFIN

Nervous? "I undoubtedly will be," said the six-foot, three-inch Grinn, who was auditioned for one of the three solo parts by Conductor Charles Munch at the latter's invitation.

And not the least of his worries, he said, is finding the proper regalia to fit him for the opportunity that comes once in a lifetime.

Will Have to Hire Pants

"You see I'll have to rent myself some striped pants," he said with a smile. "For although I have some tails, I haven't invested in any afternoon clothes as yet."

Then Griffin looked with a smile at his pretty 24-year-old wife, Ruth, an accomplished singer also. And she smiled back.

It was the same kind of warm smile of reassurance she will be giving him when he makes his debut with the orchestra at his Friday afternoon premier performance. Only, unlike many other singer's wife, it won't be from beyond the foot lights or the wings.

It will be from her place on stage with the 125-voice chorus joining the orchestra in the mass. She will be one of the sopranos.

"I'll be nervous for him. But I'm sure he won't be," said the blonde and petite Mrs. Griffin, who pours coffee herself in the hall's cafeteria to earn her second balcony seas. "And we have the comfort of knowing we'll both be singing together."

Griffin, a native of Seattle and an Air Force veteran of World War II, said he received the invitation to audition for the part on Washington's Birthday, just as he and his wife were recovering from the flu.

Fortunately, he said, they had a score of the Mass on top of the piano in their modest, two-room apartment, and together they went over it briefly.

Then, he said, he rushed down to the hall he knew so well in a different role, and the famed Munch put him through his paces. "I blocked up once or twice because of my illness, but I got through it," he said. "Then, a few hours later, his secretary called me and told me I had the part.

"No, I'd never met Mr. Munch before, but I'd seen him lots of times—usually from the second balcony. He is a wonderful man. Everyone is crazy about him."

Graduate of Conservatory

Both Griffin and his wife are graduates in music at the University of Washington, where they first met after he returned from the war. After graduation in 1946 Griffin came to Boston and enrolled at the New England Conservatory of Music on the G.I. Bill, graduating with a master's degree in music last June.

In the meantime the couple were married and she came on here also enrolling at the Conservatory. Both have had parts in various concerts around Boston and singing in churches. Lately, Griffin, has been given roles in the New England Opera Theatre, receiving critical acclaim.

But the big thrill comes Friday and Saturday when the young singer soloes with the Boston Symphony.

Singers, he says, often say "cheeze" when they go on stage in order to "be smiling broadly." There will be no need for that with him.

Nabokov's 'La Vita Nuova' in Previeu

March 1, 1951

Concerto for Solo Voices To Have Symphony Première

By Klaus G. Roy

When we think of a concerto, do we not usually mean a work for one or more solo instruments and orchestra? Yet some of Bach's cantatas were called concertos in their day, and so was much of the concerted music—that is, joint vocal and instrumental forces of earlier baroque and late Renaissance composers. That may be why Nicolas Nabokov's "La Vita Nuova," to be given its première this week end by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony is subtitled "Concerto for Soprano, Tenor, and Orchestra."

For many contemporary composers the musical and poetic forms of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance have exerted a powerful attraction. Thus the deep impression made on Mr. Nabokov by Dante Alighieri's youthful cycle of sonnets called "The New Life," written in the late thirteenth century, finally bore musical fruit in 1948-49.

"'You write so well for voices,' Serge Koussevitzky told me when he performed my 'Return of Pushkin' Cantata," the composer related. "'What about a big piece for orchestra and voices without words?'"

* * *

The work does use words, however, to be sung in English in a translation by Rossetti for the aria sections and by Wystan Auden for the accompanied recitatives. The very large orchestra employs many colorful instruments, such as a gong, a harp, and a glockenspiel, but the composer said that the sound he wished to produce is clear and individual, close to the transparent texture of chamber music.

From Dante's poem Mr. Nabokov has chosen the three essential sonnets and has given them a setting which is to him very close to the medieval spirit. The opening movement is a Recitative and Aria; begun by the tenor and continued by the soprano, it is a scene from Dante's story of his love for Beatrice, in its intense symbolism called "The Eating of the Heart." The second movement is a dark and brooding Passacaglia, "The Vision of Death," and the last is called Fantasia and Rota—"Beatrice's Beatitude."

"Mark you," the composer emphasized, "it is not an ecclesiastical beatitude the poet is speaking of; it is a classicist one, a transfiguration of the vision of love which was Beatrice."

* * *

The simplicity of the final round-dance is deceptive, Mr. Nabokov said. Most of the themes of the Concerto are interrelated and transformed polyphonically throughout the three movements. He admits his indebtedness to the old Flemish masters for their ingenious and subtle use of contrapuntal devices that give unity to a piece of music, and he is especially delighted when they are not noticed by the ear at the first hearing.

At present a professor of musical history and composition at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, the Russian-American composer is now at work on an evening-long ballet and a cello concerto. His recent book, "Old Friends and New Music," has been widely acclaimed. In April he will go to Europe for five months as a member of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, to which he can bring both his musical talent and his political awareness, gathered as a U.S. Military Government Officer in Berlin.

By a Staff Photographer

Nicolas Nabokov, shown following the score of his "La Vita Nuova" during a rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Nabokov 'La Vita Nuova' and Schubert Mass in G Highlights at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

"La Vita Nuova," a new score by Nicholas Nabokov, and the Second Mass, in G, by Schubert, are the highlights at the Symphony Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Conductor Charles Munch begins the program with the E-flat Symphony (K. 543) of Mozart.

Nabokov's work, which is being given first performances anywhere, is a sort of Concerto for large orchestra and soprano and tenor voices. The text consists of excerpts from Dante Gabriel Rossetti's translation of "La Vita Nuova" by Dante. While the term Concerto is a peculiar designation for what seems a free fantasia, the classical distribution of movement is observed to the extent that there are three, the first, "The Eating of the Heart," being a recitative and aria; the second, "The Vision of Death," a passacaglai, and the last, "Beatrice's Beatitude," a fantasia and rota.

Taken as a musico-poetic free fantastia on the emotions aroused by Dante's first vision of his immortal beloved, Nabokov's work makes more esthetic sense than if you try to think a concerto out of it. The composer did not tell us, by way of the program book, his purpose; perhaps he meant to be obscure. At any rate, little more than vague mood is generated by the orchestrally supported vocal solos, in prose (recitatives) and poetry (arias). A full knowledge of "La Vita Nuova" and of Beatrice's importance to Dante's "Divine Comedy" is needed to understand Mr. Nabokov's intent.

As music, this work is attractive, though often harmonically acid, and the voice parts rather strained for quasi-orchestral effects. While the orchestra does rage at moments, the total effect is of pastel colors and emotional haze that look back to Rossetti's own time. The ending is a sunset blush of sweetness and light, very pretty indeed, and a sure applause-trap.

The English vowel and consonant values occasionally are wrenched for the sake of Nabokov's musical phrase, but the soloists do have a spectacular time of it. Mary Henderson and David Garen, both rich-voiced, were fully equal to their complex tasks, and they deserve a large share of credit for the generous applause which greeted the composer when he appeared upon the stage.

Mozart's G major Mass is a tiny work in length, but its quality is angelic. The lyrical Schubert of the songs and chamber music is the same Schubert who composed this miniature masterpiece between March 2 and 7, 1815, just 136 years ago now. There is a touch of the theatre in the periodic punctuations of the string chords, and fleetingly, as in some measures of the Gloria, on the words 'et resurrexit,' in the Sanctus and the flowing line of the Agnus Dei, something of the German grandeur that Schubert inherited from Bach, Mozart and Haydn. Performed, as this week, with

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 17th concert of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Mary Henderson and Christina Cardillo, sopranos; David Garen, tenor and Robert Griffin, bass. A chorus prepared by Arthur Fiedler took part in the concert, the program of which was as follows:

Symphony No. 39 in E flat (k. 543) ..... Mozart
La Vita Nuova ..... Nabokov
Mass No. 2 in G ..... Schubert

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IN "LA VITA NUOVA," yesterday given its first performance, Nicholas Nabokov has achieved that rarity: the contemporary work that makes its own way easily and naturally.

Called, for reasons that seem a little obscure to me, a concerto for soprano, tenor and orchestra, this set of excerpts from Dante's mystically exalted tribute to his beloved Beatrice, is candidly romantic and melodic in tone throughout. There is none of that fussy, busy, bleak and discordant counterpoint that characterizes so much contemporary music, nor any smack of that dismally pedantic snobbery that causes our composers to write music to impress their colleagues and not their audiences at all. (Indeed, the composer today who pleases an audience is generally deemed a traitor to the clan.)

It is not easy to exactly place Mr. Nabokov's music in the contemporary scheme of things. It certainly shows some influences of both Prokofieff and Mahler though remote and fleeting they are indeed. The musical language is tonal but freely moving and plastic, the structure generally chordal and monophonic with rhythms of a regular though not limited stress. The orchestral colors are usually sombre and introspective, and are remarkably well suited—as is indeed the vocal line throughout—to the character of these excerpts mingling, as they do, the rapture and mysticism of Dante's love for Beatrice, his vision of her death and his expression of sorrow.

Of the three sections the second two seemed the most successful and evocative. The first with its extended recitative seemed overlong to me and here, too, the orchestral masses occasionally covered the voices. The Passacaglia, however, I found extremely beautiful, and the closing section, with its lovely final cadence, very moving indeed. The work was well sung by Mary Henderson, who displayed a big and opulent voice, and by David Garen, who had the more difficult task of the recitative. Mr. Nabokov, also the author of the currently well-received volume of memoirs called "Old Friends and New Music," appeared on the stage to be greeted with very warm applause.

THE CONCERT began with a most reposed performance of Mozart's E-flat Symphony, the first and most tender of the great final trilogy of symphonies. Mr. Munch took the finale at a breath-taking prestissimo rather than the indicated allegro but never drove the orchestra or attempted to give this fleet movement more drama than it in fact contains. A word must be added here for the charming clarinet playing and flute playing of Messrs. Cioffi and Laurent in the exquisite trio of the minuet; it was perfect.

Although the Schubert Mass in G has been given in town before, this was its first performance at these concerts, and what a beautiful thing it is! Although there are the unmistakable signatures of Schubert throughout it is really far more Mozartian in style and sound than Schubertian. Lyrical rather than liturgical, with a radiant accompaniment by the string orchestra re-inforced by the organ, its six sections are extended songs of a most gentle, beatific character, seldom rising in tension or drama.

They were sung with exceptionally well-integrated tone quality by a small chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler, and the brief solo roles were admirably taken by Christina Cardillo, whose voice was light but true and pleasing, David Garen, repeating the fine impression he made in the Nabokov, and Robert Griffin, who sounded very well indeed. It was in fine a very grateful conclusion to a concert that held attention throughout.

Next week's program offers the premiere of Honegger's Fifth Symphony as well as works by Faure, Debussy and Roussel.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The tradition of a partly choral symphony season, established by Koussevitzky, is being continued by his successor. At this week's concerts the chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler for the special purpose of assisting the orchestra is adding to the latter's repertory the G major Mass of Schubert. Already the current season had offered Barraud's "Mystery of the Holy Innocents" and the Requiem of Berlioz and Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" are still to come.

Yesterday, as in a performance by the conservatory chorus that took place not so long ago, the Mass, which Schubert composed at 18, within the space of six days, impressed as lovely, gracious music, a little in the spirit of Mozart, whose influence on the young Schubert was still strong. But, as before, while rejoicing in the beauty of this music, one could not help wishing that some conductor would disclose to us the later and reputedly far greater masses in A-flat and E-flat. The soloists were Christina Cardillo, soprano; David Garen, tenor, and Robert Griffin, bass. The heaviest burden fell on Miss Cardillo and in her sweet, pure tones she bore it worthily.

Immediately before Mr. Garen had participated in the initial performance of a very different music, Nikolai Nabokov's "La Vita Nuova," in which he was partnered, and brilliantly, by Mary Henderson, soprano. Rather unusually, Mr. Nabokov has styled his setting of Dante's early work a concerto for soprano, tenor and orchestra. The piece is divided into three sections: a recitative and aria, "The Eating of the Heart," a Passacaglia, "The Vision of Death" and a Fantasia and Rota, "Beatrice's Beatitude." We see here musically the influences of the baroque period and Mr. Nabokov has confessed his indebtedness to the still earlier Flemish masters, so skilled in the more intellectual ingenuities of counterpoint.

Those who still recalled Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova" could not help finding this another sort of music. Where Folf-Ferrari was unashamedly romantic, catching the wormth and fervor of the poetry, Mr. Nabokov was more intellectual. The relationship between the voices and the orchestra suggested Mahler, but Mr. Nabokov's idiom is the modern dissonant one. Possibly the time has gone by when a composer can find truly fitting expression for a text such as this. Making her first appearance with the orchestra, Miss Henderson displayed a voice lustrous and resonant. Mr. Garen, whom we had heard before, impressed again as an intelligent but somewhat dry vocalist.

Yesterday's concert began with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, which Mr. Munch had not conducted here before. On the whole the performance was a sympathetic one, the Andante being especially fine. In the Minuet the conductor bore on a bit hard but the finale went off with becoming verve. It should be added that Mr. Nabokov was on hand to hear the first performance of his work, and brought to the stage, was the recipient of much applause.

This Clipping From
MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS-SCIMITAR
MAR 2 - 1951

9 Big Cities Help Pay Symphonies' Way

Symphony orchestras of nine major American cities are partially supported by municipal funds, according to the Municipal Finance Officers Association. The association's report is based on a recent survey of symphonies in 19 cities, made by the Milwaukee Municipal Reference Library.

San Francisco contributes 40 per cent of the $100,000 annual cost of its symphony. Indianapolis, with its contribution of $50,000, donates 21 per cent of its symphony's costs.

Other cities receive the following municipal support:

Buffalo, $17,000, 10 per cent.
Los Angeles, $48,000, 10 per cent.
Denver, (amount not reported), 6 per cent.
Kansas City, Mo., free use of municipal auditorium.
Baltimore, $54,500, 3 per cent.
Houston and New Orleans also contribute municipal funds to their symphonies.
The cities of Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Rochester and St. Louis make no contributions to their symphony orchestras.

[245]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 3 - 1951

MUSIC

Nabokov 'La Vita Nuova' and Schubert Mass in G Highlights at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

"La Vita Nuova," a new score by Nicholas Nabokov, and the Second Mass, in G, by Schubert, are the highlights at the Symphony Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Conductor Charles Munch begins the program with the E-flat Symphony (K. 543) of Mozart.

Nabokov's work, which is being given first performances anywhere, is a sort of Concerto for large orchestra and soprano and tenor voices. The text consists of excerpts from Dante Gabriel Rossetti's translation of "La Vita Nuova" by Dante. While the term Concerto is a peculiar designation for what seems a free fantasia, the classical distribution of movement is observed to the extent that there are three, the first, "The Eating of the Heart," being a recitative and aria; the second, "The Vision of Death," a passacaglai, and the last, "Beatrice's Beatitude," a fantasia and rota.

Taken as a musico-poetic free fantastia on the emotions aroused by Dante's first vision of his immortal beloved, Nabokov's work makes more esthetic sense than if you try to think a concerto out of it. The composer did not tell us, by way of the program book, his purpose; perhaps he meant to be obscure. At any rate, little more than vague mood is generated by the orchestrally supported vocal solos, in prose (recitatives) and poetry (arias). A full knowledge of "La Vita Nuova" and of Beatrice's importance to Dante's "Divine Comedy" is needed to understand Mr. Nabokov's intent.

As music, this work is attractive, though often harmonically acid, and the voice parts rather strained for quasi-orchestral effects. While the orchestra does rage at moments, the total effect is of pastel colors and emotional haze that look back to Rossetti's own time. The ending is a sunset blush of sweetness and light, very pretty indeed, and a sure applause-trap.

The English vowel and consonant values occasionally are wrenched for the sake of Nabokov's musical phrase, but the soloists do have a spectacular time of it. Mary Henderson and David Garen, both rich-voiced, were fully equal to their complex tasks, and they deserve a large share of credit for the generous applause which greeted the composer when he appeared upon the stage.

Mozart's G major Mass is a tiny work in length, but its quality is angelic. The lyrical Schubert of the songs and chamber music is the same Schubert who composed this miniature masterpiece between March 2 and 7, 1815, just 136 years ago now. There is a touch of the theatre in the periodic punctuations of the string chords, and fleetingly, as in some measures of the Gloria, on the words 'et resurrexit," in the Sanctus and the flowing line of the Agnus Dei, something of the German grandeur that Schubert inherited from Bach, Mozart and Haydn. Performed, as this week, with smallish string orchestra and chorus, and three unpretentious but competent soloists, the Mass is a complete joy.

Mr. Munch has a special gift for this type of music, and his reading of it, vigorous but tender, was superb. The chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, showed high competence, save that the tenors and basses were timid. Christina Cardillo used her fine light soprano beautifully, and tenor David Garen and bass Robert Griffin were entirely satisfactory. These are the first performances of the Mass at these concerts. Mozart's familiar Symphony was pleasurable, as always, but a little heavy in treatment, and a bit untidy of detail.

MUSIC

Nabokov 'La Vita Nuova' and Schubert Mass in G Highlights at Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

La Vita Nuova," a new score by Nicholas Nabokov, and the Second Mass, in G, by Schubert, are the highlights at the Symphony Hall concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Conductor Charles Munch begins the program with the E-flat Symphony (K. 543) of Mozart.

Nabokov's work, which is being given first performances anywhere, is a sort of Concerto for large orchestra and soprano and tenor voices. The text consists of excerpts from Dante Gabriel Rossetti's translation of "La Vita Nuova" by Dante. While the term Concerto is a peculiar designation for what seems a free fantasia, the classical distribution of movement is observed to the extent that there are three, the first, "The Eating of the Heart," being a recitative and aria; the second, "The Vision of Death," a passacaglai, and the last, "Beatrice's Beatitude," a fantasia and rota.

Taken as a musico-poetic free fantastia on the emotions aroused by Dante's first vision of his immortal beloved, Nabokov's work makes more esthetic sense than if you try to think a concerto out of it. The composer did not tell us, by way of the program book, his purpose; perhaps he meant to be obscure. At any rate, little more than vague mood is generated by the orchestrally supported vocal solos, in prose (recitatives) and poetry (arias). A full knowledge of "La Vita Nuova" and of Beatrice's importance to Dante's "Divine Comedy" is needed to understand Mr. Nabokov's intent.

As music, this work is attractive, though often harmonically acid, and the voice parts rather strained for quasi-orchestral effects. While the orchestra does rage at moments, the total effect is of pastel colors and emotional haze that look back to Rossetti's own time. The ending is a sunset blush of sweetness and light, very pretty indeed, and a sure applause-trap.

The English vowel and consonant values occasionally are wrenched for the sake of Nabokov's musical phrase, but the soloists do have a spectacular time of it. Mary Henderson and David Garen, both rich-voiced, were fully equal to their complex tasks, and they deserve a large share of credit for the generous applause which greeted the composer when he appeared upon the stage.

Mozart's G major Mass is a tiny work in length, but its quality is angelic. The lyrical Schubert of the songs and chamber music is the same Schubert who composed this miniature masterpiece between March 2 and 7, 1815, just 136 years ago now. There is a touch of the theatre in the periodic punctuations of the string chords, and fleetingly, as in some measures of the Gloria, on the words 'et resurrexit," in the Sanctus and the flowing line of the Agnus Dei, something of the German grandeur that Schubert inherited from Bach, Mozart and Haydn. Performed, as this week, with smallish string orchestra and chorus, and three unpretentious but competent soloists, the Mass is a complete joy.

Mr. Munch has a special gift for this type of music, and his reading of it, vigorous but tender, was superb. The chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, showed high competence, save that the tenors and basses were timid. Christina Cardillo used her fine light soprano beautifully, and tenor David Garen and bass Robert Griffin were entirely satisfactory. These are the first performances of the Mass at these concerts. Mozart's familiar Symphony was pleasurable, as always, but a little heavy in treatment, and a bit untidy of detail.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 4 - 1951

Symphony in French Program to Honor Founding of Paris

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, will play an all-French program at Symphony Hall, Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30, in observance of the current celebrations of the 2000th anniversary of the founding of the city of Paris.

Mr. Munch will give the world premiere of a new Symphony by Arthur Honegger. The Fifth Symphony of the Swiss composer was composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. Mr. Munch will also introduce the Symphony in New York, and Serge Koussevitzky will conduct it at the Berkshire Festival next Summer. This program will open with the Prelude to "Penelope" by Gabriel Faure, and will include Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Roussel's Third Symphony.

The Boston Symphony will perform the seventh concert of the Tuesday evening series in Symphony Hall March 6, when the soloist will be Patricia Travers, the young violinist, who will appear in Brahms' Concerto. The first part of the program will consist of the Suite from "Dardanus" by Rameau, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, No. 39, and the Second Suite from Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 7 - 1951

MUSIC

Patricia Travers Plays Brahms Violin Concerto With Boston Symphony

Patricia Travers' performance of Brahms' Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D major, last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a display of solid workmanship from beginning to end. Her tone, though not too large, is beautiful. There are many hazards for the soloist who tackles this work: ticklish passage work, double stopping, and rhythmic gymnastics, all of which she executed with skill of hand and accomplished musicianship.

The concerto has long been considered a display piece, and only a chosen few are able to grasp its intrinsic core. Brahms is ornamental but not ornate, he is florid yet dignified and lyric. These qualities were always in abundant evidence but never dwelled upon as separate, dissociated units; they were means to an end.

Miss Travers plays with a great deal of gusto, yet her bowing arm is always smooth. She also has the temperament, the ability to put herself inside a piece and project it as a unified whole. As a result, she is able to hold the listener's interest by sheer musical communication.

Another triumph of the evening was Mr. Munch's reading of Havel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite No. 2. He seemed to infuse the work with a personal romanticism which made the climaxes vivid and colorful splashes on a mural of sensuous sound.

Other works on the program were Rameau's Suite from the opera "Dardanus," and the Symphony in E-flat major by Mozart.—A. F. B.

Symphony Preview

March 8, 1951

2,000th Anniversary of Paris To Be Celebrated by Première

By Harold Rogers

What are 2,000 years to an elegant lady like Paris? She'll but fill her hair with flowers, paint her lips in half a smile, beckon with her dreamy eyes, and her years will rest lightly. Who cares if historians date her back to 53 B.C.? If you have trouble in totaling her years, remember that calendars are capricious and are not to be trusted.

But anniversaries are helpful in the world of music. They give excuses for festivals and material for programs. Last year was Bach's 200th, and there was hardly a hamlet that didn't remember the master with at least one concert of his works. This years is Sibelius's 85th, so the venerable Finn is now getting his share of attention.

Paris, too, will have a party this week end in Symphony Hall. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will honor her first 2,000 years with a program of French music—music that Mr. Munch loves so much and conducts superbly. He will play Fauré's Prelude to "Penelope," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," Roussel's Third Symphony, and Honegger's Fifth Symphony.

It is the Honegger Fifth that is of especial interest, since these performances will constitute its world première. This will not be the first time that Mr. Munch has brought out a new work by Honegger. In Paris on Oct. 22, 1944, he conducted the initial performance of "Chant de Libération" for baritone, chorus, and orchestra. Honegger dedicated his Third Symphony, the "Liturgique," to Mr. Munch who conducted its première in Zurich on Aug. 17, 1946. Though not a première, Mr. Munch presented the Second Symphony for Strings when he made his own debut with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 27, 1946.

The Fifth Symphony was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to Natalie Koussevitzky. Honegger composed it in Paris last year, completing the sketch of the first movement on Sept. 5 and the orchestration of the last movement on Dec. 3. It is in three movements, as indeed are all his symphonies.

Under the title on the score Honegger supplies a cryptic subtitle in parentheses—"di tre re"—the symphony of the three D's. Each movement comes to a conclusion, pianissimo, on a low D. If the composer had any specific reason, he did not divulge it in his score.

The work is acerb in its harmonies, mature in the strength of its conception, and deeply introspective. The first movement in three time is marked Grave. The second is an Allegretto in three-eight time that is interrupted by two Adagio sections in four time. The third, also in common time, is an Allegro marcato. The symphony requires almost 27 minutes for performance.

Honegger Symphony in Première

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This spring France, and other parts of the world, will celebrate the 2000th anniversary of the founding of Paris. In anticipation of that event, Charles Munch is offering at this week's Symphony Concerts an all-French program.

This list, which had its first hearing yesterday afternoon, avoids the more hackneyed French pieces and also those that are admittedly first class, the exception to this general rule being Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The Fifth Symphony of Arthur Honegger, whose birthplace was France even if his blood was Swiss, was heard yesterday for the first time.

It is one of the many works written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Natalia Koussevitzky. Dr. Koussevitsky, who commissioned the piece will himself conduct it in the final concert of this summer's Berkshire Festival, but he permitted his successor to conduct the actual premiere. The score was completed on Dec. 3 last.

For his first number Mr. Munch chose the Prelude to Faure's opera, "Penelope," last heard in Symphony Hall in 1924, shortly after the composer's death; and the program ends with Roussel's relatively familiar Third Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary season of our orchestra.

The new Honegger Symphony is strong, uncompromising music, on the dissonant and angular side, but compelling, nevertheless. Honegger knows what he is about; he writes with sincerity as well as with skill and the result is a take-it-or-leave-it proposition. A disquieting suggestion of Shostakovitch (Scherzo of the First Symphony) in the second movement may, of course, have been entirely accidental.

The Prelude to Faure's opera is full of nice sounds and there are Wagnerian overtones. The music is also somewhat invertebrate, and it is easy to see why the opera, as heard in concert form in Cambridge at the Faure centennial festival of 1945, proved monotonous if often affecting.

Roussel's Symphony is a vigorous, athletic work that Mr. Munch has made peculiarly his own. It suits his temperament better than do the Debussy Nocturnes, especially "Clouds," which one fears will never sound again as Koussevitzky made it to sound. "Festivals," by the way, went very much better, since the emphasis here is on line and rhythm rather than on color.

The thumpity-thump first movement of the Roussel Symphony is the weakest part of it. The Adagio reaches emotional heights, though the fugal section in the middle does not seem to be of a piece with the rest, and the two final movements are lively and invigorating and withal melodically appealing.

3/10/51

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 10 1951

Composer's 'Fifth' Given First Performance by Munch

By Harold Rogers

The new Fifth Symphony by Arthur Honegger is one of those rare works that have all the earmarks, not of instant popularity, but of lasting greatness. It is imbued with the eloquence and the inevitableness of a Beethoven. It is magnificently tragic in the dramatic terms of Euripides. It is filled with the anguished spirit of Jeremiah's warnings of disaster.

Though the composer has given us no clue to the inner meaning of his symphony, its moods are far too expressive to leave us wholly uninformed. Honegger may not have had a specific program in mind; but if he did have one and has chosen to withhold it, we have no right to supply one of our own. We do have a right, however, to describe how certain music makes us feel. While no two people may have the same reaction to the same thing, a good composition will affect the majority of open-minded listeners in about the same way.

The three movements of this deeply introspective work were heard for the first time anywhere yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented it in a French program dedicated to the city of Paris in honor of its 2,000th anniversary.

Written last year, this symphony appears as the flower of the composer's maturity. Honegger was the member of the famous French Six who produced such novelties as "Pacific 231" and "Rugby." His Fifth is the expression of a man who has come to grips with vital issues, whose earlier concern with railroad locomotives and football games is quite forgotten.

♪ ♪ ♪

Honegger's cryptic subtitle—"di tre re"—is derived from the fact that each of the three movements ends on a low D. It is played by the timpani and the contrabasses pizzicati; indeed, the timpanist has only these three notes to play.

The first movement, marked Grave, opens with strong, anguished progressions in contrary motion. The second theme, more melodic, is like a poignant elegy. The development then becomes increasingly tortured until it culminates in a long blast from the trumpet. Then the first theme returns, embellished by filigree from the woodwinds. The scoring is handled with remarkable economy.

The second movement is an Allegretto in scherzo mood, though a sober undercurrent is never wholly absent. The lighter portions consist mainly of a piquant dialogue of melodies that mingle in sportive and argumentative ways over staccato chords. This scherzo treatment is interrupted by two Adagio sections, both of which are filled with urgency and longing.

♪ ♪ ♪

The last movement — Allegro marcato — is painted in bold colors. It appears to be the expression of a man who is crying havoc. The music gains a nervous, high-strung effect from the flutter-tongue blowings of the brasses. There is a lull, however, and the second theme emerges like some far-off vision of hope but does not stay for long. In the development the elements of hope and disaster appear to wrestle until the climax. Then in the coda the music falls away as if from exhaustion. The symphony concludes simply and quietly.

Mr. Munch also gave excellent readings of Fauré's Prelude to "Pénélope," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," and Roussel's exuberant Symphony No. 3 in G minor. The Roussel work was a gala conclusion to a Gallic day. It is replete with jocular and lyrical melodies, splashy colors, and circus flavor. The last movement sang of parades, fanfares, and revelry—a fitting climax to a program honoring Paris's first two thousand years.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 19th program of the 75th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Prelude to "Penelope".....Faure
Symphony No. 5.....Honegger
Nuages, Fetes.....Debussy
Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op 42.....Roussel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Despite the excellence of all its parts, this concert proved to be one of the lesser pleasures of the season. It contained, however, an important new symphony, and this is enough to make any occasion interesting.

The symphony is Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5, a work commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and completed in December of 1950, and this was its first performance. It may be said at the outset that the overall mood of the work is melancholy if not indeed tragic. Unlike most of Honegger's music it is very personal in expression and it contains, or so it seems to me on first hearing, many things that point to considerable programmatic significance.

The beginning is especially impressive as Honegger, speaking in his own exceedingly original language (that is quite unlike anything else), states a very broad melodic theme in massive chords of great tension, much like the thick chordal preludes of the baroque masters of the keyboard only with harmonies such as would have appalled them. This leads to a more animated section notable for a brief trumpet figure that keeps rising step-wise to culminate at last in a most anguished statement. The movement then subsides into an extremely dolorous not say pathetical postlude.

Pick up Tune

Although lighter and drier in character and beginning with a fleet duet of the clarinet and violins, the second movement quickly returns to the mood of the close of the first. In its most serious moments the flutes pick up a silly tune to suggest a sort of whistling in the dark, and the movement, following a return of the more animated material, ends quietly. So, too, does the finale, which for all its initial vigor, is overcast with the gloomiest atmosphere.

It is, in short, a work of the most serious character. If there were a glossary of Honegger's music (as there more or less is for Richard Strauss's music, which is filled with hidden pictorial and emotional devices), it would doubtless reveal the Fifth Symphony to be a vivid personal utterance. In the meantime it speaks eloquently enough of tragedy to establish its character glossary or no. And it speaks, too, in one of the most original and powerful musical voices of the day.

The concert began with the classically reposed Prelude to Faure's "Penelope," also a work touched throughout with melancholy but of a more impersonal quality. It is very sensitive music emphasizing the dark, rapturous qualities of the low strings but at the same time virile and noble of spirit. The concert ended with Roussel's Third Symphony, again a work generally low in lyrical appeal and dark of mood despite its brassy exuberances, its well-stressed rhythms and its variegated orchestral colors.

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
MAR 3 8 1951

Harold Bauer Dies; Famous Pianist

MIAMI, Fla. (AP) — Harold Bauer, internationally known concert pianist, died yesterday at the age of 77.

He had been in a hospital since mid-January with a heart condition and a kidney ailment.

A widely known interpreter of Brahms, Schumann and Franck, he spent the autumn of his life teaching and lecturing at music schools across the country.

He had been wintering in Miami for several years serving as music counsellor to the University of Miami School of Music. His permanent home was at St. James, L. I., N. Y.

Born in London, the young Bauer started out as a violin prodigy and made several successful European tours before switching to the piano.

He made his debut in Paris in 1893 and first appeared in the United States in 1900 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Later he was guest soloist with most of the famous orchestras of the world.

Survivors include his widow, the former concert pianist, Winnie Byle.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 11 1951

FOR DECADES, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has provided us with fine performances, brought us leading conductors and soloists. The next performance here, under Charles Munch, will be on Apr. 3 in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, where the musicians are seen (above) warming up for a concert.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 17 1951

Sympnony Orchestra in Capital March 31

Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Charles Munch, will play a special concert in honor of Vincent Auriol, President of France, in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., Saturday evening, March 31.

Since this is the night of a scheduled concert in Boston's Symphony Hall, subscribers who hold tickets for March 31 are asked to use them on Thursday night, March 29, when a special concert will be given in Symphony Hall in place of the regular Saturday affair.

Because of these arrangements, a very active week-end is in store for Symphony members. They will leave Boston after the Friday concert, play in Washington Saturday night, then board a train immediately to return to Boston for a Sunday afternoon concert, April 1.

The program for the Washington concert, symbolical of Franco-American friendship and cultural fraternity, will embrace music of both nations. The program will offer Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" (both American composers), and the following French works: Ravel's Concerto in G for Piano and Orchestra, with Nicole Henriot as soloist, and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

[2.17]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 19th program of the 75th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Prelude to "Penelope".....Faure
Symphony No. 5.....Honegger
Nuages, Fetes.....Debussy
Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op 42.....Roussel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Despite the excellence of all its parts, this concert proved to be one of the lesser pleasures of the season. It contained, however, an important new symphony, and this is enough to make any occasion interesting.

The symphony is Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5, a work commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and completed in December of 1950, and this was its first performance. It may be said at the outset that the overall mood of the work is melancholy if not indeed tragic. Unlike most of Honegger's music it is very personal in expression and it contains, or so it seems to me on first hearing, many things that point to considerable programmatic significance.

The beginning is especially impressive as Honegger, speaking in his own exceedingly original language (that is quite unlike anything else), states a very broad melodic theme in massive chords of great tension, much like the thick chordal preludes of the baroque masters of the keyboard only with harmonies such as would have appalled them. This leads to a more animated section notable for a brief trumpet figure that keeps rising step-wise to culminate at last in a most anguished statement. The movement then subsides into an extremely dolorous not say pathetical postlude.

Pick up Tune

Although lighter and drier in character and beginning with a fleet duet of the clarinet and violins, the second movement quickly returns to the mood of the close of the first. In its most serious moments the flutes pick up a silly tune to suggest a sort of whistling in the dark, and the movement, following a return of the more animated material, ends quietly. So, too, does the finale, which for all its initial vigor, is overcast with the gloomiest atmosphere.

It is, in short, a work of the most serious character. If there were a glossary of Honegger's music (as there more or less is for Richard Strauss's music, which is filled with hidden pictorial and emotional devices), it would doubtless reveal the Fifth Symphony to be a vivid personal utterance. In the meantime it speaks eloquently enough of tragedy to establish its character glossary or no. And it speaks, too, in one of the most original and powerful musical voices of the day.

The concert began with the classically reposed Prelude to Faure's "Penelope," also a work touched throughout with melancholy but of a more impersonal quality. It is very sensitive music emphasizing the dark, rapturous qualities of the low strings but at the same time virile and noble of spirit. The concert ended with Roussel's Third Symphony, again a work generally low in lyrical appeal and dark of mood despite its brassy exuberances, its well-stressed rhythms and its variegated orchestral colors.

Only Relief

The only relief from the program's general heaviness, indeed, were the two Debussy excerpts, but these were not enough and are, moreover, on the over-done side. What was needed to give this concert its proper post-intermission balance, it seemed to me, was a good old symphony filled with extended lyrical charm; Beethoven's Pastoral, for instance. This program just didn't add up to real fulfillment.

The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on March 20 for a Tuesday night concert, and on March 23 for a Good-Friday performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion with Adele Addison, Martha Lipton, David Lloyd, Marko Rothmuller and the chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 10 1951

MUSIC

Munch Conducts French Music in Honor of the Founding of Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra got a head start, yesterday afternoon, in the local celebration of the 2000th anniversary of the founding of the city of Paris. The official festivities hereabouts will begin next Tuesday at the State House. But the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight consist entirely of French music in observance of the establishment of what was to become The City of Light.

Faure's Prelude to "Penelope," is followed by Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which receives first performances anywhere; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Third Symphony of Roussel.

Honegger's Fifth Symphony, finished last December in Paris, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, dedicated to the memory of Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, and is now performed by permission of this orchestra's former conductor. It is a somewhat massive score, set in three movements, and obviously a work of intellectual quality. The idiom is brisk and contemporary, although the very beginning suggests the paradoxical circumstance of archaicisms and modernities woven into the same fabric.

This most recent work of Honegger is not precisely outgiving or amiable in what it has to say, but rather music of inward brooding and high seriousness. It would be interesting to know how much is reflected in it of Honegger's present state, for the distinguished Franco-Swiss composer is said to have been seriously sick. One or two hearings are not enough for more than superficial acquaintance. But at the moment it is possible to point out its essentially condensed style, its bold and original substance and the impressive orchestral mastery. More than that will have to await future performances.

It was time to play again the buoyant and spirited Third Symphony of Roussel, one of the few works commissioned for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony which have shown qualities of endurance. In fact, here is a Gallic masterpiece, vivid of color and immensely clever in the way it is made, brimming over with rhythmic vitality. Furthermore, the basic charm of Roussel's style, his engaging good nature are perceived in every page.

Were it not for the songs and some of the chamber music, the name of Gabriel Faure would have about disappeared from contemporary concert programs. Yet his name is respected by most, and revered by some. The Prelude to "Penelope," for example, had last been done at these concerts shortly after Faure's death, in 1924. Why not adventure into those orchestral works which, though few, he left behind? Or revive the Requiem, a score of great merit? Faure was a musician of superb taste and skill, and the seal of fastidious craftsmanship is upon everything of his which has endured.

Mr. Munch conducted the entire program superlatively well, perhaps achieving a peak of accomplishment in the Symphony of Roussel. His treatment of Debussy's two Nocturnes was sensitive, delicate of phrase and subtle of rhythm, yet straightforward and unassuming. All told this concert was a succession of diversified pleasures.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 12 1951

Koussevitzky Leaves Hospital

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11—Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was released yesterday from Stanford Hospital, which he had entered for "observation" on March 1 while on tour here with the Israel Symphony. His physician, Dr. Ben Shenson, said the 78-year-old conductor would convalesce at his Phoenix, Ariz., home "for at least a month."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 10 1951

MUSIC

Munch Conducts French Music in Honor of the Founding of Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra got a head start, yesterday afternoon, in the local celebration of the 2000th anniversary of the founding of the city of Paris. The official festivities hereabouts will begin next Tuesday at the State House. But the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight consist entirely of French music in observance of the establishment of what was to become The City of Light.

Faure's Prelude to "Penelope," is followed by Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which receives first performances anywhere; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Third Symphony of Roussel.

Honegger's Fifth Symphony, finished last December in Paris, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, dedicated to the memory of Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, and is now performed by permission of this orchestra's former conductor. It is a somewhat massive score, set in three movements, and obviously a work of intellectual quality. The idiom is brisk and contemporary, although the very beginning suggests the paradoxical circumstance of archaicisms and modernities woven into the same fabric.

This most recent work of Honegger is not precisely outgiving or amiable in what it has to say, but rather music of inward brooding and high seriousness. It would be interesting to know how much is reflected in it of Honegger's present state, for the distinguished Franco-Swiss composer is said to have been seriously sick. One or two hearings are not enough for more than superficial acquaintance. But at the moment it is possible to point out its essentially condensed style, its bold and original substance and the impressive orchestral mastery. More than that will have to await future performances.

It was time to play again the buoyant and spirited Third Symphony of Roussel, one of the few works commissioned for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony which have shown qualities of endurance. In fact, here is a Gallic masterpiece, vivid of color and immensely clever in the way it is made, brimming over with rhythmic vitality. Furthermore, the basic charm of Roussel's style, his engaging good nature are perceived in every page.

Were it not for the songs and some of the chamber music, the name of Gabriel Faure would have about disappeared from contemporary concert programs. Yet his name is respected by most, and revered by some. The Prelude to "Penelope," for example, had last been done at these concerts shortly after Faure's death, in 1924. Why not adventure into those orchestral works which, though few, he left behind? Or revive the Requiem, a score of great merit? Faure was a musician of superb taste and skill, and the seal of fastidious craftsmanship is upon everything of his which has endured.

Mr. Munch conducted the entire program superlatively well, perhaps achieving a peak of accomplishment in the Symphony of Roussel. His treatment of Debussy's two Nocturnes was sensitive, delicate of phrase and subtle of rhythm, yet straightforward and unassuming. All told this concert was a succession of diversified pleasures.

MUSIC 3-10-51

Munch Conducts French Music in Honor of the Founding of Paris

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra got a head start, yesterday afternoon, in the local celebration of the 2000th anniversary of the founding of the city of Paris. The official festivities hereabouts will begin next Tuesday at the State House. But the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight consist entirely of French music in observance of the establishment of what was to become The City of Light.

Faure's Prelude to "Penelope," is followed by Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which receives first performances anywhere; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Third Symphony of Roussel.

Honegger's Fifth Symphony, finished last December in Paris, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, dedicated to the memory of Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, and is now performed by permission of this orchestra's former conductor. It is a somewhat massive score, set in three movements, and obviously a work of intellectual quality. The idiom is brisk and contemporary, although the very beginning suggests the paradoxical circumstance of archaicisms and modernities woven into the same fabric.

This most recent work of Honegger is not precisely outgiving or amiable in what it has to say, but rather music of inward brooding and high seriousness. It would be interesting to know how much is reflected in it of Honegger's present state, for the distinguished Franco-Swiss composer is said to have been seriously sick. One or two hearings are not enough for more than superficial acquaintance. But at the moment it is possible to point out its essentially condensed style, its bold and original substance and the impressive orchestral mastery. More than that will have to await future performances.

It was time to play again the buoyant and spirited Third Symphony of Roussel, one of the few works commissioned for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony which have shown qualities of endurance. In fact, here is a Gallic masterpiece, vivid of color and immensely clever in the way it is made, brimming over with rhythmic vitality. Furthermore, the basic charm of Roussel's style, his engaging good nature are perceived in every page.

Were it not for the songs and some of the chamber music, the name of Gabriel Faure would have about disappeared from contemporary concert programs. Yet his name is respected by most, and revered by some. The Prelude to "Penelope," for example, had last been done at these concerts shortly after Faure's death, in 1924. Why not adventure into those orchestral works which, though few, he left behind? Or revive the Requiem, a score of great merit? Faure was a musician of superb taste and skill, and the seal of fastidious craftsmanship is upon everything of his which has endured.

Mr. Munch conducted the entire program superlatively well, perhaps achieving a peak of accomplishment in the Symphony of Roussel. His treatment of Debussy's two Nocturnes was sensitive, delicate of phrase and subtle of rhythm, yet straightforward and unassuming. All told this concert was a succession of diversified pleasures.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAR 17 195

The

Boston Symphony Program Was Disappointing

To the Editor of The Courant:

In T.H.P.'s review of the last concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, I read the following words: "It was the finest event . . .it is hard to recall when so engrossing a program has been given here, or one so vividly done by the firebrand Mr. Munch."

Allow me to disagree wholeheartedly with your reviewer.

For myself and quite a number of music lovers who not only love music but happen to know a little about it, I want to state that it is most difficult to recall a concert of the Bushnell Symphony Series—at least for the six years I was privileged to attend them—which was more disappointing in almost every regard than this one, especially as far as the program is concerned.

The extremely modest applause, which in my opinion never during the whole evening went beyond showing politeness, seemed to reflect the true impression this program made upon the vast majority of the listening audience.

And if your reviewer at the end of his review asks why the men of Boston cannot get together rhythmically any more, I would ask if perhaps the change of leadership can have something to do with it?

Walter F. Lehman

Norwich

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 15 1951

Honegger's Fifth Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Once again a Honegger symphony has left a haunting impression at its first New York performance. Presented by Charles Munch at the Boston Symphony concert last night, the Fifth Symphony will require several hearings before it yields its secret. On first acquaintance it suggests that still water runs deep.

This is a serious work. Conceived in troubled contemplation and dedicated to an eternal note of sadness, it proceeds solemnly through dark polytonal channels to brood over some tragic idea for two movements, then it climbs out of this mood time's confusions by means of a merry-go-round technique, only to end quietly in the midst of disturbance.

Honegger has enriched his creative gift. This work not only reveals his notable skill but also builds up strong feelings in the listener. It has a chamber-music character, indicating that some personal communication is at hand. Added to his other recent symphonies, this one gives him an imposing place in the contemporary scene.

That Munch performed the work with characteristic insight might be expected from one sympathetic to Honegger's music. There was some fine playing especially in the counterpoint for woodwinds and strings in the second movement.

The program opened with Rameau's suite from the opera "Dardanus" and included DeBurry's famous Two Nocturnes and Roussel's Third Symphony. Sensitive interpretations of these works were the order of the evening.

[248]

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 17 1951

MUSIC

by PAUL AFFELDER

Charles Munch and Boston Symphony Delight Audience in Final Visit

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their final visit of the season to the Academy of Music last evening and delighted the capacity audience with a diversified program which, with one exception, was devoted entirely to French music.

The first part of the evening was concerned with unfamiliar fare. The concert opened with a refined and subtly blended performance of the Prelude to Gabriel Faure's opera, "Penelope." It was our first encounter with this rarely played work, and we found it to be as exquisite a piece of writing as came from the pen of this late French romantic. The music seemed to contain a shade more of the harmonic coloring of Cesar Franck than do most of Faure's works; but even though it may have been pretty conservative stuff for 1913—the year in which it was written—it remains a beautiful orchestral composition, and should be heard more frequently.

Perhaps, four decades from now, we shall say the same thing about Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which Mr. Munch has been introducing to New York audiences this week. It sounded last night like a serious, logical and generally interesting work, but it is the sort of music which must be heard several times before it can really sink in.

The symphony, written on a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, was only completed this past December. Its composer has assigned no program to it, but under the title, "Symphony No. 5," he has placed in parentheses "(di tre re)." Unlike Montemezzi's opera, "L'Amore dei Tre Re," this has nothing whatsoever to do with three kings, the "re" here referring to the note "D," which is sounded pianissimo by the tympani at the very end of each of the symphony's three movements. What the significance of this cryptic symbol is we are left to guess.

The grave first movement is the most serious of the three, but it is also the most lyrical, its two principal themes being clearly defined, easily recognizable and frequently restated in what sounds like a variation of the standard sonata form. The second movement combines the elements of the slow movement and scherzo. The scherzo portion, with which it begins, is light in texture but not in mood, and reminds us somewhat of refined Shostakovitch with a French accent. The contrasting slow section first appears alone, but after a return to the scherzo, is combined with the theme of the latter. Throughout the symphony, one can hear the increasing use of polytonality, which comes into full blossom in the vigorous and dramatic finale. Possibly because of this, the final action of the symphony sounds considerably more acrid than the rest of the work.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave the new symphony a performance that was firm, penetrating and neatly polished. One could ask for no more. Yet it is not surprising that its reception was little more than lukewarm, opinion among the audience being rather divided.

Firmness was also the chief characteristic of Mr. Munch's interpretation of the one non-French work on the program—Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat Major. We found it, in fact, rather too firm and square-toed for Mozart, with insufficient flexibility in the phrasing. In other words, there was too much starch and not enough soft, frilly lace.

The crowning performance of the evening was that of the glorious "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel. The opening section, "Daybreak," was played with exceptional clarity and a wonderful evocation of nature; Georges Laurent's flute solo in the "Pantomine" was positively ravishing, and the concluding "Genral Dance" was tonally and rhythmically a most exciting affair.

The lengthy ovation accorded conductor and players at the conclusion of the concert must have proved to them that they will be welcomed back with open arms for their series of five concerts next season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
World-Telegram & The Sun
MAR 15 1951

Music

The 'Three D's' Earn Three A's for Munch

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

French music received a kiss on both cheeks from Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night.

Frankly, it was the best program—in content and playing—of the music of Mr. Munch's homeland that I have heard in decades. Like an ambassador, Mr. Munch seemed to be saying, through the orchestra, "these are my credentials."

Among his credentials were a power to plant in every musician's mind the image of French color and harmony and subtlety that was in his own. He created as many Munches as there were members of the orchestra.

Conviction Stands Out.

He made them play Rameau's "Dardanus" is if the early 18th Century was their birthplace; Debussy's "Nocturnes" as if impressionism was the first language they lisped in their cribs, and Roussel's 3rd Symphony as if they had been trained in the fastidious etiquette of well-groomed French music.

Best of all, Mr. Munch made the Boston Symphony perform a premiere of Honegger's 5th Symphony as if they believed in it as strongly as he did. Mr. Munch's conviction that this is a milestone of modern music was written on every page.

That conviction went out to the orchestra and from the orchestra out to the audience. Mr. Honegger has written a very persuasive symphony. It has the craftsmanship of a supreme master who knows his way about a symphony about as well as he knows his way about Paris.

Fascinating Contrasts.

It is a symphony of fascinating contrasts; passages of pastoral peace perched against passages of almost surly commotion. The themes are the sort that go places and do things, always with an eagerness to be on the move.

The movements all end pianissimo, with a drum tap on D, which may or may not warrant calling this stirring 5th Symphony of Arthur Honegger, "The Symphony of the Three Ds."

I'm all for giving the concert three A's—A for conduct (Mr. Munch's) A for obedience (the orchestra's), and A for good behavior (the audience's).

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1951

WORK BY HONEGGER INTRODUCED HERE

Composer's Fifth Symphony Presented at Carnegie Hall by Munch, Boston Group

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first New York performance of Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall. The other music on the program was a suite arranged by d'Indy from Rameau's "Dardanus," two of the Debussy "Nocturnes" and Albert Roussel's Third Symphony.

Honegger's symphony will be called cryptic by many, not excluding, perhaps, ourselves. It is polytonal writing, in utmost degree. The opening motive, with clashing triads and fifths of various tonalities marching tenaciously against each other, might suggest a Lutheran chorale gone wild. A second theme is of a wholly different line and texture, being more florid, and more susceptible to manipulation than the first. The chorale theme finishes powerfully through a short but quite complex movement. This movement ends after a climax, as all three of the movements end, softly, with a mysterious drum-tap.

Under the title of the symphony, in the score, the composer has written this comment, also cryptic: "The answer may be found at the end of each movement, where the last note is a drum-tap on D, pianissimo!"

An Enigmatical Work

The symphony continues to be enigmatical, to impress the hearer more and more with a sense of tragical introspection, of a composer talking aloud to himself, rather regardless of whether anyone else is interested. It is in three movements. The second movement combines the elements of the slow movement and the quick scherzo which are the middle movements of the traditional four-movement symphony. The scherzo part is swift, light and fantastical. It is interrupted by a more portentous adagio which reminds one of the thematic material of the preceding movement. The fast movement returns, and the adagio, too. The dramatic movement is the last, bringing its conclusion.

The dramatic movement is the last, with persistent rhythms, sudden contrasts, tumultous climaxes and roaring pedal points. It summarizes in a new and militant ways the material that has gone before.

What is the expressive import of the symphony, if there is any discernable import at all? Here is only mentioned an individual's impression. To him it seems that this music, somber and self-questioning, speaks of the world of lost faiths, inner strife; a girding of the loins for a supreme struggle, an issue fought indomitably by the spirit of man—the quest for "the answer," though it be as remote and undecipherable as the Sphinx.

So far as may be judged of a work previously unknown, and without examination of the score, this performance was of exemplary clarity and expressive significance. The Rameau suite, of movements which Mr. Munch selected from the two suites that Vincent d'Indy arranged from Rameau's opera, is pretty and formal in the ways of an earlier century and civilization. We believe it would have sounded better and more characteristic of its composer and period if it had been done by a much smaller number of players.

Between Rameau and Roussel, if not between these two and Honegger, a bond could be traced. But quite outside of those boundaries is the infinitely tender and poetical music of Debussy. Last night, unfortunately, this music — the "Nuages" and the "Fetes" — was given as rough, insensitive and coarse-handled a performance as we remember in a long time. The Nuages was much too fast and without atmosphere. The Fetes was rushed through and its climax sensationalized. And where was the fineness of tone, the precision, the sensitive finish and subtlety of nuance for which this orchestra, especially, is famous? The performance was an injury to Debussy.

Roussel's brilliant neo-classic symphony was well programmed for the conclusion of the concert.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 13 1951

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY was both engaging and boring in its program at Bushnell last night (Page 20).

Virtuosity by Boston Symphony

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

CHARLES MUNCH and the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last night a thoroughly sophisticated program before Hartford's most sophisticated audience, patrons of the Bushnell symphonic series

The day before, devotees of the Hartford Orchestra — just as knowledgable and a much more dedicated crowd—took home with them pleasant recollections of Bach, Mozart and Tschaikowsky but gagged a bit on Kabalevsky, as even the most musical people will when composers become noisy and obscure.

* * *

THAT GOES for Honnegger's Fifth Symphony which Munch offered last night. It was heard with decorum but was generally found to be a bore, if you can judge by audience restlessness, and you certainly can.

This is the kind of work which rewards in direct proportion to what you bring to it and going to symphony concerts is simply a high-level form of escapism. Concentrated listening added up the conclusion that only the composer escaped in this instance, mainly from tonality and other amiable conventions of musical thought.

It is a serious work, of course, not without a certain misty grandeur in the first movement and emotional tension in the other two. The angularity of its themes and sparseness of decorative detail argue against the composer's willingness to be completely discovered as to design and meanings.

* * *

ROUSSEL'S THIRD Symphony, by comparison was engaging and zestful. Graphic, warm-blooded, it came closer to Bizet than Franck. Munch exploited its vivid coloring matter to the full. He allowed himself a degree of excitement which did not appear in his other readings.

The wholly dispassionate and exquisite limning of the Rameau melodies from the "Dardanus" Suite and the equally chaste Debussy Nocturnes gave out an impression of reserve which is probably not always his.

* * *

THE MUNCH style is not Koussevitszky's. Absent but not missed are those spots of theatricalism in which the latter used to let himself be betrayed by the sheer virtuosity of his great orchestra.

The virtuosity is in no sense impaired. It is worn more modestly. There are lapses from discipline, as there used to be, and as there is bound to be with a high-strung band under pressure, but I find a luminosity which is new and delightful.

[247]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST HOME NEWS
MAR 15 1951

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

'Meistersinger' Opens City Opera

Wagner's philosophical comedy, "Die Meistersinger," a real refresher to the spirits, was the curtain raiser for the opening of the New York City Opera's spring season last night at City Center.

Under the authoritative musical direction of Joseph K[illegible]enstock, this rollicking satire on pedantry remains the real achievement it was last fall at its premiere by the company.

"Meistersinger" is for those who enjoy a good natured but pertinent poke at critics or anyone el[illegible] who might be convenit also dramatizes the futility of rules in the face of creative energy. Joyously it turns out a lot of common sense and incidently creates laughter. Nobody has to read a Germanic saga in order to get the ideas behind its plot. Its meat is in the foibles of humanity, I guess none of us needs any more background on this subject.

Most members of the excellent cast who originally presented the work, were back last night. Both the Eva of Frances Yeend and the H[illegible]ns Sachs of James Pease have grown immensely in portrayal. Rudolf Petrak, singing the role of Walther for the first time, performed with style. Though his voice is essentially a lyric tenor and light for the part, he acquitted himself well. David Lloyd is an admirable David in voice and appearance and the same goes for Margery Mayer's Magdalena. Oscar Natzka as Pogner and Emile Nenan as Beckmesser are both fine protrayals. The work has again been intelligently staged by Otto Erhardt. "Meistersinger" will be repeated during the six-week season on March 23, March 31 and April 4.

Boston Symphony Plays Honegger 5th Symphony

The Fifth Symphony of the French composer, Arthur Honegger, had its first New York performance last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Honegger, one of our most significant contemporaries, has composed a three-movement work which needs more than one hearing to absorb. Its final movement is driving, propulsive; its first two, though orchestrated with a master hand, do not arrest the attention with impact. They meander and don't build with conviction from one point to the next. As always with Honegger, there are moments of introspection upon which one would like to linger longer. But in this symphony they seem too few.

Charles Munch, who conducted, apparently is embarked on a new era of relaxation. The opening Rambeau Suite from the opera "Dardanus" and the following Honnegger were beautifully done and without excess of gesture or energy.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 15 1951

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Fifth evening New York concert of the season; conductor, Charles Munch. The program: Suite from the Opera, "Dardanus"....Rameau
Symphony No. 5.....Honegger
(first New York performance)
Two Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes")
Debussy
Symphony No. 3, in G minor, Op. 42..Roussel

French Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave us last night in Carnegie Hall a program of French works way off the beaten track. Among them all, only Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" (two of his three Nocturnes) are standard fare. Suites from the stately operas of Rameau (this one was out of "Dardanus") do not turn up every week by any means, and neither does Albert Roussel's ebullient Third Symphony. Last night, in addition to these refreshing items, we heard a brand-new symphony by Arthur Honegger, his Fifth.

* * *

This three-movement work is a massive evocation of organ sonorities. Not of the bright eighteenth-century sounds that are fashionable today in organ circles but rather of those huge and vibrant noises produced by the giant nineteenth-century organs in the larger French churches. The musical inspiration is out of Bach, ever this composer's chief source; but the sound of the piece is straight from Notre Dame.

* * *

Lay on top of these older elements bitonal harmonic and contrapuntal textures from our own century, and you have a balance of weights characteristic of Honegger from his youth. His Fifth Symphony is powerful and suave, steely, dark and irresistible of impact, the work of a skilled master's maturity. But it has been made out of the same preoccupations that gave such striking character thirty years ago to his gracious oratorio "King David" and to the evocative orchestral pictures of a locomotive ("Pacific 231") and of Horatio at the bridge ("Horace Victorieux"). It is Honegger at his most characteristic, impressive, personal, powerful, void of alien elements, and full of a grand seriousness at once harsh, harmonious and relentless.

* * *

Roussel's Third Symphony is one of the stronger works in that form composed within our time, but it does not sound like a symphony at all. It sounds like dance music. From beginning to end, saving two moments of adagio also apt for stage contrast, it could be used to accompany a ballet spectacle. It would be good for dancing, because its metrical insistence and florid tune lines are the kind of music that keeps legs moving. In this respect it resembles Tchaikovsky's Fourth more than it does the standard symphonies of inner-feeling content. But Tchaikovsky's Fourth only evokes ballet music; Roussel's Third is dancing itself.

* * *

Executions all evening were strong and stylish impeccable in the cool Bostonian way, except in the Debussy Nocturnes. Here Mr. Munch beat faster than is standard French practice for these pieces and got a little frenetic in the second of them. His hysteria did their subtle metries and delicate balances no good. Eleswhere he was all Calm, efficiency, enlightenment, grace.

Arthur Honegger

Whose Fifth Symphony was played here for the first time last night

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CARNEGIE HALL

Fifth evening New York concert of the season; conductor, Charles Munch. The program: Suite from the Opera, "Dardanus"....Rameau
Symphony No. 5.....Honegger
(first New York performance)
Two Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes")
Debussy
Symphony No. 3, in G minor, Op. 42..Roussel

French Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave us Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall a program of French works way off the beaten track. Among them all, only Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" (two of his three Nocturnes) are standard fare. Suites from the stately operas of Rameau (this one was out of "Dardanus") do not turn up every week by any means, and neither does Albert Roussel's ebullient Third Symphony. Wednesday night, in addition to these refreshing items, we heard a brand-new symphony by Arthur Honegger, his Fifth.

* * *

This three-movement work is a massive evocation of organ sonorities. Not of the bright eighteenth-century sounds that are fashionable today in organ circles but rather of those huge and vibrant noises produced by the giant nineteenth-century organs in the larger French churches. The musical inspiration is out of Bach, ever this composer's chief source; but the sound of the piece is straight from Notre Dame.

* * *

Lay on top of these older elements bitonal harmonic and contrapuntal textures from our own century, and you have a balance of weights characteristic of Honegger from his youth. His Fifth Symphony is powerful and suave, steely, dark and irresistible of impact, the work of a skilled master's maturity. But it has been made out of the same preoccupations that gave such striking character thirty years ago to his gracious oratorio "King David" and to the evocative orchestral pictures of a locomotive ("Pacific 231") and of Horatio at the bridge ("Horace Victorieux"). It is Honegger at his most characteristic, impressive, personal, powerful, void of alien elements, and full of a grand seriousness at once harsh, harmonious and relentless.

* * *

Roussel's Third Symphony is one of the stronger works in that form composed within our time, but it does not sound like a symphony at all. It sounds like dance music. From beginning to end, saving two moments of adagio also apt for stage contrast, it could be used to accompany a ballet spectacle. It would be good for dancing, because its metrical insistence and florid tune lines are the kind of music that keeps legs moving. In this respect it resembles Tchaikovsky's Fourth more than it does the standard symphonies of inner-feeling content. But Tchaikovsky's Fourth only evokes ballet music; Roussel's Third is dancing itself.

* * *

Executions all evening were strong and stylish impeccable in the cool Bostonian way, except in the Debussy Nocturnes. Here Mr. Munch beat faster than is standard French practice for these pieces and got a little frenetic in the second of them. His hysteria did their subtle metrics and delicate balances no good. Eleswhere he was all Calm, efficiency, enlightenment, grace.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 16 1951

Brilliant Performance Ends Current Concerts at Rutgers

By ISABEL BRYLAWSKI

While New Brunswick music lovers have been privileged to hear many fine organizations, there is something special about the appearance of the Boston Symphony. A perennial favorite, local audiences have come to feel that they are almost on friendly terms as they see the familiar faces of the players year after year.

The concert given last night as the final one of Rutgers University's subscription series was perhaps one of the most unusual ever given by this great orchestra. Under the leadership of its new conductor, the noted Frenchman, Charles Munch, whose vibrant personality made itself felt with the opening measures of the Mozart symphony, the first number on the program, the orchestra played with the precision, the fire and finesse as has rarely been heard here or elsewhere.

Mr. Munch displayed the most solid craftsmanship in his control of the entire group and yet did not overlook one phrase of the music as the composer would have wished it performed. The audience recalled him again and again and the orchestra rose time after time to acknowledge the tumultuous acclaim, so justly deserved.

The program opened with the Symphony in E flat major (Koechel No. 543) one of the gayest of the symphonies of Mozart, in spite of the fact that it was written when he was enduring great hardship because of poverty and continually had to appeal to friends for money to live. None of this is evident in the music of the symphony.

The string section of the Boston Symphony is outstanding and they had full opportunity to show the incisiveness and solidarity necessary to bring out all the brilliance of the work, which is scored for small orchestra, with delicate passages for wood winds as well as the intricate string sections.

Two nocturnes by Claude DeBussy, Nuages (Clouds) and Fetes followed. The first of these, as may be imagined by the title, depicted the dreamy, shadowy, fleeting pictures of the sky. Both of these compositions are purely program music; which tell a story. The second, Fetes, brought the carnival atmosphere, with the procession beginning in the distance and finally appearing. With the full orchestra, including the dazzling harp portions, the picture was complete.

Seldom Heard Symphony

The high light of this superlative program, was the Fantastic symphony (Symphonie Fantastique) of Hector Berlioz, Op. 14A This, too, is program music but not often heard. It is the first time that it has been performed here One of the unusual features o this symphony is the fact that i is written in five movements, instead of the usual three or four It is indeed fantastic in its idea.

Supposedly an episode in the life of an artist, the first movement, Reveries, Passions start with a broad Largo in the strings and continues with an agitated allegro, followed by a glamorous waltz. A ball and the whirling couples were almost visible enjoying the beautiful melody.

The Scene in the meadows portrays a pastoral theme by the English horn and a lovely song by the violins. A storm comes up and recedes.

The march to the scaffold, next movement, is followed by the dream of a witch's Sabbath with all the wild orgies of the evil spirits, so effectively brought out both by the composer and the players that the broomsticks could be seen flying back and forth, with their eerie riders astride.

The ovation which the audience gave the orchestra and Mr. Munch at the close of this exotic, exciting composition was evidence of their admiration for the way in which he and the musicians interpreted it. There has been considerable controversy as to whether this music is so sensational only because of the desire of the composer to capture public attention but to its hearers the real genius of Berlioz is evident.

As an added event, The Passion according to St. Matthew by Johann Sebastian Bach will be given on Good Friday evening, March 23, 1951, in the Rutgers gymnasium, with the Rutgers University Choir, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eric Leinsdorf, conductor and soloists Elaine Malbin, soprano, Margaret Harshaw, contralto, J. Alden Edkins, bass, Norman Farrow, bass and Rudolf Petrak, tenor. Tickets are available.

[250]

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

WORK BY HONEGGER INTRODUCED HERE

Composer's Fifth Symphony Presented at Carnegie Hall by Munch, Boston Group

By OLIN DOWNES

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first New York performance of Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall. The other music on the program was a suite arranged by d'Indy from Rameau's "Dardanus," two of the Debussy "Nocturnes" and Albert Roussel's Third Symphony.

Honegger's symphony will be called cryptic by many, not excluding, perhaps, ourselves. It is polytonal writing, in utmost degree. The opening motive, with clashing triads and fifths of various tonalities marching tendenciously against each other, might suggest a Lutheran chorale gone wild. A second theme is of a wholly different line and texture, being more florid, and more susceptible to manipulation than the first. This chorale theme strides powerfully through a short but quite complex movement. This movement ends after a climax, as all three of the movements end, softly, with a mysterious drum-tap.

Under the title of the symphony, in the score, the composer has written this comment, also cryptic: "The answer may be found at the end of each movement, where the last note is a drum-tap on D, pianissimo!"

An Enigmatical Work

The symphony continues to be enigmatical, to impress the hearer more and more with a sense of tragical introspection, of a composer talking aloud to himself, rather regardless of whether anyone else is interested. It is in three movements. The second movement combines the elements of the slow movement and the quick scherzo which are the middle movements of the traditional four-movement symphony. The scherzo part is swift, light and fantastical. It is interrupted by a more portentous adagio which reminds one of the thematic material of the preceding movement. The fast movement returns, and the adagio, too. The dramatic movement is the last, bringing its conclusion.

The dramatic movement is the last, with persistent rhythms, sudden contrasts, tumultous climaxes and roaring pedal points. It summarizes in a new and militant ways the material that has gone before.

What is the expressive import of the symphony, if there is any discernable import at all? Here is only mentioned an individual's impression. To him it seems that this music, sombre and self-questioning, speaks of a world of lost faiths, inner strife; a girding of the loins for a supreme struggle, an issue fought indomitably by the spirit of man—the quest for "the answer," though it be as remote and undecipherable as the Sphinx.

Expressive Significance

So far as may be judged of a work previously unknown, and without examination of the score, the performance was of exemplary clarity and expressive significance. The Rameau suite, or movements which Mr. Munch selected from the two suites that Vincent d'Indy arranged from Rameau's opera, is pretty and formal in the ways of an earlier century and civilization. We believe it would have sounded better and more characteristic of its composer and period if it had been done by a much smaller number of players.

Between Rameau and Roussel, if not between these two and Honegger, a bond could be traced. But quite outside of those boundaries is the infinitely tender and poetical music of Debussy. Last night, unfortunately, this music — the "Nuages" and the "Fetes" — was given as rough, insensitive and coarse-handled a performance as we remember in a long time. The Nuages was much too fast and without atmosphere. The Fetes was rushed through and its climax sensationalized. And where was the fineness of tone, the precision, the sensitive finish and subtlety of nuance for which this orchestra, especially, is famous? The performance was an injury to Debussy.

Roussel's brilliant neo-classic symphony was well programmed for the conclusion of the concert.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 23 1951

Symphony Ends Late

Because of the length of Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," the Boston Symphony concerts of this afternoon and Saturday evening will be longer than usual. Today's program will end at 5:15, Saturday's at 11:15.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
MAR 18 1951

Concert by Boston Symphony Will Honor Two Presidents

A concert in honor of the Presidents of the United States and France will be given by the Boston Symphony on March 31 in Constitution Hall. It thus takes on the importance of an historic event.

It was arranged by the Boston Symphony last fall when the French conductor of the orchestra, Charles Munch, learned that the president of his country, Vincent Auriol, would visit the President of this country in March. Moved by the desire to honor the Chief Executives of his native land and the head of this republic simultaneously, Munch, through the manager of the Boston Symphony, asked the French ambassador to learn if the date, March 31, would fit into the calendar of engagements prepared by the White House for the visit of the French president.

The answer was favorable. So for the first time in history a great American orchestra will play for two presidents.

It should be a stirring event. "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the "Marseillaise" will preface the regular program. This will be divided equally between the symphonic music of France and the United States.

Samuel Barber's overture to Sheridan's "School for Scandal" will open it. Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," for solo trumpet, solo English horn, and strings, will follow. Then the charming French pianist, Nicole Henriot, will assist in the presentation of the Ravel Concerto in G. Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will close it.

Overture, "Over the Hills," by Granville English, a work first produced by Howard Hanson on last fall's Festival of American Music, will have its Washington premiere tomorrow, at 8:30 p.m. when it will be featured by the Air Force Symphony, under Lt. Col. George S. Howard in Lisner auditorium. When this work was presented by Dr. Hanson on his symposium of American orchestral music it received the popular vote of the audience, the press, and the members of the orchestra.

Granville English

[25]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 18 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FAURE OPUS

Munch Conducts Orchestra in Rarely Heard Prelude to the Opera 'Penelope'

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch gave a program yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall that included a repetition of Honegger's Fifth Symphony, which had received its local première earlier in the week. Otherwise, the program was concerned with works not played at that time. It consisted of the rarely performed Prelude to Fauré's "Pénélope," Mozart's Symphony in E flat major and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suite No. 2.

Because of its unfamiliarity hereabouts, special interest centered on the Faure offering. His opera "Pénélope," composed between 1907 and 1913 and first performed in the latter year, tells the story from Homer's "Odyssey" of the fidelity of Penelope during the many years of Ulysses' absence, of the hero's return and of his slaying of her many suitors, leading to a jubilant denouement.

The Prelude is devoted to the development of two motives, those of Penelope and Ulysses, on which the entire opera is based. First is heard the melancholy, brooding, dark motive of the heroine, which, with the music referring to her first appearance before the suitors, form the opening section of the Prelude.

The middle section develops the Ulysses motive, led to an intense climax, after which the Penelope motive returns. The music closes most effectively with an often-repeated sighing figure for the horn that gradually fades into the distance and seems to summon a sense of the remote past.

This is world-weary music, modern in its subtleties and hardly what one would await as representative of the life-loving age of the Homeric epic. But it had the impeccable taste and the harmonic originality characteristic of its composer. Mr. Munch read it con amore, with tenderness and profundity of mood, so that the performance was extremely moving.

The conductor and his men were in top form throughout the afternoon. Technically and tonally, the Mozart and Ravel contributions were on the same high level as the Fauré. In the Mozart symphony the great Adagio introduction had a perfunctory sound, and its climax before the resigned final measures leading to the opening Allegro decidedly was skimpy. Otherwise the symphony was exquisite in sound and particularly significant in the interpretation of the Minuet and the splendidly realized Finale.

As for the Ravel ballet music, it was to be prafied equally for its wealth of prismatic hues, the virtuosity and poetry of its presentation and the thrilling climax of its closing division.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 19 1951

Munch, Boston

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded their New York season memorably in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

A shimmeringly intense performance of Ravel's famous Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 sent the audience home dazzled by the magnificence of the playing and the virtuoso artistry of the conductor. No such peak has been attained in this work for many years.

The program again featured Honegger's Fifth Symphony. It left this listener as deeply moved as on the occasion of the Wednesday performance.

More novel therefore was a hearing of Faure's prelude to "Penelope," a work quite worth the acquaintance made through Munch's discerning interpretation. Mozart's E-Flat Symphony came as an agreeable and needed contrast to the French music.

That preformances tarried on the high plane of the Ravel simply defines the consistency of the afternoon's music-making.

Spanish Singers

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
MAR 19 1951

The Boston Symphony To Play for Auriol

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's special concert in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., in honor of the visit of President Vincent Auriol of France on March 31 will be marked with various symbols of Franco-American friendship and cultural fraternity.

First, there is the factor of America's oldest symphony orchestra, in point of continuous existence, appearing with one of France's most distinguished musicians as its permanent conductor. Further, he has chosen a program divided between French and American composers speaking in musical idioms fairly representative of the two nations' contributions to the present-day orchestral repertoire. The two presidents may take pride in the creations of their compatriots, and interest in the art of one another's nations.

The appearance of Nicole Henriot in Ravel's Concerto in G lends an additional note of appropriateness to this Franco-American program. For the young lady is a pupil of the brilliant Marguerite Long, to whom the work is dedicated, and who was the soloist in the first public performance, in Paris, on January 14, 1932.

Having served as French Ambassador of Goodwill on the American tour of the Orchestre Nationale de la Radio Diffusion Francaise, Mr. Munch has expressed great happiness in the opportunity to return to Washington as Franco-American Ambassador.

The complete program is as follows: Barber—Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Copland—"Quiet City"; Ravel—Concerto in G, for Piano and Orchestra (Nicole Henriot, soloist); Berlioz—"Symphony Fantastique."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1951

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its sixty-fifth annual series of New York concerts yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Apart from Mozart's symphony in E flat (K. 543), the program conducted by Charles Munch was devoted to French music, including Arthur Honegger's fifth symphony, which this orchestra had introduced here Wednesday; the prelude to Gabriel Fauré's "Pénélope," and the second suite from Ravel's score for the ballet "Daphnis et Chloé." Fauré's Homeric opera, or lyric poem, was first staged in Monte Carlo and Paris in 1913; the prelude, despite certain rather static moments, has breadth and eloquence, and these qualities were reflected in the admirable performance by the musicians under Mr. Munch's direction.

The orchestra again gave a persuasive account of the new Honegger work. The Mozart symphony had a pervasively lucid and expressive performance; Mr. Munch took the first movement at a relatively leisurely pace, but the general impression of the interpretation was one of spirit and sonority in addition to delicacy of shading and clarity of detail. An impressive performance of the familiar Ravel suite brought the concert to a stimulating and climactic close.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra will return to Carnegie Hall next season for the usual series of five Wednesday night and five Saturday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 14 and 17. F. D. P.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 15th program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing Bach's St. Matthew Passion. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Marko Rosenmuller and Grant Garnell, basses. Assisting artists were Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord and E. Power Biggs, organ.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

The St. Matthew Passion of Sebastian Bach, one of the monumental glories of music, yesterday received a truly beautiful performance, a performance informed with deep musical feeling and with devotional profundity as well.

There was, for the first time in many a season, a really first-class quartet of soloists. There was also a particularly well-trained chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, a chorus with a rather tone light quality but of admirable vocal precision. There was, for its very brief role in the opening chorus, a smartly responding choir of boys from Trinity church. And there was, as always, the orchestra itself with such instrumental soloists as Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin; E. Power Biggs, organ, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord, to supply the orchestral accompaniment, the solo obbligatos and the continuo for the recitatives.

DEPENDS ON WORDS

Yet it was the devotional quality that set this performance apart, and this quality sprang directly from Charles Munch, who has long since made it clear that he ranks with the foremost Bach players of the day. What he does here—as he did in the St. John Passion of last season—is subordinate everything to the Gospel itself. Everything depends on the words. No climax is allowed nor any display of musical extravagance or theatricality tolerated unless it is implicit in the text. The general dynamic level is subdued. Massiveness is never intruded, though this is not to say that as the central tragedy nears in the second part that dramatic vehemence and tension is absent.

In his cutting of the score, which in its entirety would run more than three and a half hours, Mr. Munch emphasizes the liturgical aspects even more. For he omits many of the great solo arias and ariosos of non-Scriptural character interpolated by Bach as poetic reflections on the narrative of the Passion in favor of the narrative itself.

Omitted yesterday were "Grief and Pain," "Never Will My Heart Refuse Thee," "Gladly Will I," "Behold, Behold," "Give Me Back My Dearest Master," "Come Blessed Cross" and others (to use their English titles though this performance is sung in German). Included, however, were a number of accompanied recitatives and nearly all of the recitativo secco, a fact that made clear the conductor's devotional approach to this gigantic work. Nevertheless, it is an approach that still stresses the lyrical, profoundly contemplative aspect of the Passion while giving it additional unity in the blending of the Gospel with the non-Gospel reflections in the arias chosen.

SPLENDIDLY CHOSEN

The soloists yesterday, as indicated above, were not less than splendidly chosen. David Lloyd, again assuming the exceedingly difficult role of the Evangelist, set forth his recitative with remarkable felicity of voice and expressiveness. Marko Rosenmuller, also appearing again in the role of Jesus, has gained stature immeasurably since we last heard him, and he made the part musically and dramatically very effective and touching.

Adele Addisen, whose voice seems to gain in musicianship and quality with every appearance, sang with exceptional clarity and distinctness, and Martha Lipton, making her first appearance here, displayed a contralto voice of beautiful quality and exactitude. Grant Garnell in a smaller role proved capable. The chorus, which like all choruses of non-professional calibre, was at its best in full voice, managed the triple pianissimos enforced on it by the conductor pretty well. Save for an accident in a matter of attack in one of the recitatives, the orchestral performance was notably clear and poised and balanced throughout. The occasion was so elevated in spirit the audience seemed at a loss to know whether to applaud or not, so the final reception was very mild indeed, yet from the attention it gave the music throughout the two hours and 20 minutes of the performance it was clearly enraptured throughout.

St. Matthew Passion at Symphony—Concert

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 20 1951

THE MUSIC BOX—

CONDUCTOR MUNCH IS ONE FRENCHMAN WHO'S ALSO GERMAN

By IRVING KOLODIN
Music Editor, Review of Literature
Special to The Buffalo Evening News.

NEW YORK, March 20. — Take Charles Munch, tenth conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and you have a perfect example of what makes Europe a peculiar place.

Is he a German conductor or is he a French conductor? . . . The answer is: Both. He comes from a famous family of Strasbourgers, in which Alsace-Lorraine city he was born in 1891. He was then a German subject, and when his talent for music had manifested itself beyond the capacity of the local conservatory to cope with it, he took his violin to Berlin, where he also studied conducting with Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

With the end of World War I he was a French subject, politically, but rather distinctly a German one musically. For a while he solved that problem by settling down in his native city, as a professor of violin in the same conservatory that had produced him, and as concertmaster of the local orchestra. When his interest in this waned, Mr. Munch went to Leipzig as concertmaster of that famous orchestra.

And Then to Paris

Thus, Mr. Munch's tradition in Germanic music is rooted in rich soil. With the '30s came another urge, and Mr. Munch removed himself to Paris, first as principal violinist in the Orchestra de la Societe Philharmonique, in 1932, then as its conductor.

Mr. Munch then began to win ever-wider recognition, though his duality of background made for parlous times when Paris was occupied by the Germans. As noted in "Who's Who," Mr. Munch continued to conduct through these years, but contributed all his fees to the resistance movement.

He was little known when he made his American debut with the Philharmonic Symphony of New York in 1947, but he quickly won respect for enthusiasm, musicianship and partisanship for new music of substantial stature. Thus when he filled a guest engagement in Boston, he seemed such an alter ego for Serge Koussevitzky, then about to retire, that the Symphony Society regarded him almost at once as No. 1 candidate for the job.

Carson and J-O-Y

Everybody knows that j-o-y spells joy, but it can also be spelled Mindy Carson if her singing does for you what it does for quite a few listeners. But "Carson" itself can be spelled the same way, since she married one of the junior partners in the publishing firm of Santley-Joy at a time when hit records, star billing in night clubs, TV spots and a share of radio's "Big Show" with La Bankhead came in swift succession.

Mindy Carson

Just what changed Miss Carson from a secretarial aide in a candy company to a hit singer (one of the contributing factors was a song called "Candy and Cake," incidentally) has not yet been determined.

An excellent student, who might have gone on to Hunter College had she cared to, she preferred to take a full-time job where she had worked after school for movie money.

This led to a two-week winter vacation in Florida as guest of an aunt, then to a night club so swanky that the guests entertained each other. Miss Carson's voice caught the ear of the proprietor, who should have a share in the glory that is Carson's for he offered her a job—singing. Nothing came of it except a revival of her interest in the whole subject of singing, and her parents consented to allow her a year's trial at a career.

She Was Terrific

Through friends Mindy (derived from an Austrian family name, originally Mendy) was introduced to Eddie Joy, whose father is one of New York's best-known publishers. It would help the story to say that he thought she was terrible, but actually he liked her way of singing and put her to work making audition records of songs the concern was trying to promote.

Quick as anything, one band leader decided he didn't like the tune so much, but who was the singer? She was terrific.

From that beginning Mindy progressed to a place on Paul Whiteman's "Stairway to the Stars" program, of which she justified the title within a couple of years by going great, successively, on radio and records.

Perhaps her most pivotal success occurred when Joy, now her personal manager, won her a singing spot in the Copacabana, one of New York's more celebrated cellars, and she did so well that she was the star attraction within a month.

Gone, by now, were the flat shoes and rolled-down socks of her song-selling days—to such decorative effect that two comparisons—neither of which she particularly relishes — became commonplace: She looks like Ingrid Bergman and sounds like Lena Horne.

Boston's Conductor Makes A Point in Rehearsal

BOSTON, March 20. — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, emphasizes a point during rehearsal. WBEN carries recordings of the rehearsals Friday nights at 11:30.

Boston Sunday Globe, March 18, 1951

Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion at Boston Symphony Concerts

MARTHA LIPTON will be the contralto soloist in Bach's St. Matthew Passion, which Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony present next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Charles Munch will conduct a condensed version of Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30. The choruses will be those of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

The soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and Marko Rothmueller, baritone. The harpsichord will be played by Daniel Pinkham and the organ by E. Power Biggs.

The eighth concert of the Symphony Hall Tuesday evening series comes this week. Richard Burgin will conduct Haydn's D major Symphony, No. 104; the Third Symphony by Roussel, and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

More New Records

By CYRUS DURGIN

Vivaldi: Concertos in E minor (cello); A minor, (two violins); D major (viola d'amore), and A major (strings and cembalo), by the Collegium Musicum Italicum, a group of Italian virtuosi who visited this country—or at least, New York—last Fall. Interesting old music superbly performed and brightly recorded. Renato Fasano was musical director. Cetra-Soria, 50045.

Haydn: "Mass in Time of War" ("Paukenmesse in C), by the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, Akademie Chorus, and the following soloists: Jetti-Topitz-Feiler, soprano; Giorgina Milinkovic, alto; Herbert Handt, tenor; Hans Braun, bass. Conducted by Hans Gillesberger. More excellent and unfamiliar Haydn, presented with a richness of style unobtainable on this side of the Atlantic, and recorded in the finest manner of the Haydn Society. HSLP-2021.

Prokofieff: Sixth Symphony, by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Prokofieff's most recent symphony, which, however, looks back to his own early past and other late-romantic composers. Interesting, however, and creditably performed and recorded. Columbia ML-4328.

Roger Sessions: Second Symphony, by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic Symphony. This is aggressively and uncompromisingly modern, in fact, neurotically so, in an idiom that bristles with rough dissonance and knobby rhythms. All the same it won a Naumburg Foundation Award, and perhaps as "paper music" it will be of lasting interest to the theoretical analyst. Mitropoulos plays it with the ardor of a prophet. Columbia ML-2120.

Biggs on the Organ

Poulenc: Concerto in G Minor for Organ, String Orchestra and Tympani, by E. Power Biggs, organ; some Boston Symphony men, and the Columbia Symphony, conducted by Richard Burgin. This really solid, ingenious and attractive music is known here by virtue of Mr. Biggs' local performance of it, performance absolutely of the best. It will be treasured on records. Mr. Biggs has included, on the reverse, Franck's Prelude, Fugue and Variations, Op. 18, and "Piece Heroique."

Schubert: Fantasia for Violin and Piano, by Joseph Szigeti and pianist Joseph Levine. Minor though pleasant Schubert, done in his usual superior style by Mr. Szigeti. On the reverse a group of inconsequential "encores." Columbia ML-4338.

Verdi: Dramatic scenes from "Ernani," "Otello" (Willow Song and Ave Maria), "La Traviata," "Don Carlos" (Tu che le vanita") and "La Forza del Destino," by soprano Eleanor Steber, with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra conducted by Fausto Cleva. Choice dramatic red meat of the soprano repertory, done with a good deal of skill and distinction by this artist who continues to grow vocally and in expression. Columbia ML-2157.

Milhaud: Cantate de l'Enfant et de la Mere, and "The Household Muse." by Darius Milhaud, pianist and conductor; Madeleine Milhaud, diseuse; the Juilliard String Quartet and pianist Leonid Hambro. This is pre-World War II Milhaud, interesting, clever as always, and rather more substantial, to my mind, than recent stuff like "Bolivar." Good performance and a keen recording. Columbia ML 4305.

From the Past

Allegro, especially, continues to dig into the music of the past, and as might be expected, with varying results. Three of its recent major releases are such. "Music of the Gothic Period" and the Early Renaissance consists of two lps, containing a selection of instrumental and vocal pieces from about 1300 to 1500. This is the second volume in a series executed by the Viello Trio, a group who took their name from the archaic stringed instruments know as vielles. Du Bose Robertson, tenor, is the singer. AL-72.

Early Italian Church Cantatas consists of Alessandro Scarlatti's Motetto da Requiem, and Porpora's Salve Regina, sung with style but dubiously attractive sonority by baritone Yves Tinayre, who specializes in this type of music. Interesting, notably for the musical antiquary. Allegro AL-87.

Harpsichord Music of the Spanish School of Domenico Scarlatti is a selection of pieces from the literature by Soler, Albeniz (Mateo), Freizanet, Rodrigues, Galles and Angles, played with a good deal of flourish by Fernando Valenti. The recording is uneven in its reproduction of harpsichord tone. Allegro AL-45.

A third "Fledermaus" is from Columbia, sung by certain members of the original Metropolitan casts of this season, and various others from the same institution. The headliners are Lily Pons, Ljuba Welitch, Richard Tucker, Charles Kullman, Martha Lipton and John Brownlee. Eugene Ormandy conducted. Like its RCA-Victor counterpart, sung by other Metropolitan luminaries, this "Fledermaus" is generally superior.

Comic Donizetti

Almost last, but far from least, is "The Mikado," by the D'Oyly Carte Company, with the familiar and locally much-admired principal singers known from D'Oyly Carte visits. This is beautifully done by London, and the only objection is that you cannot see, as well as hear, Martyn Green capering as Ko-Ko. LLP-189/90.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

3-24

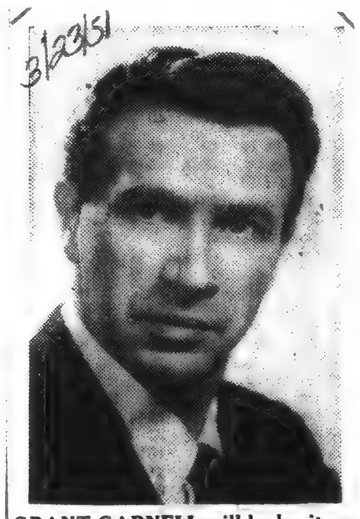
The Symphony Concert falling on Good Friday has always posed a special problem, the conventional solution being to place it a day ahead. Mr. Munch resolves the difficulty by turning the occasion into a sort of religious service. In other words, he performs a Bach passion, originally intended for church performances on this particular day. Last year it was the "St. John" and now it is the "St. Matthew." It may also be suggested that Mr. Munch, unlike his predecessor, is strong for seasonal observances, having given us in the concerts immediately preceding Christmas Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio.

We are accustomed to hearing the "St. Matthew" Passion in special concerts, and Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to make it an afternoon and evening affair. In order to bring it within something like the proper dimensions of a symphony concert, Mr. Munch has made some excisions. As it was, yesterday's concert was considerably longer than the average Friday matinee.

Mr. Munch's way with these Bach choral works is very personal, since he emphasizes above everything else the note of tenderness. This was a singularly subdued performance of the "St. Matthew," a full tone being resorted to only in the few really dramatic moments and in the great choruses that begin and close the work. The first of these was the least successful portion, since the division of the chorus into two parts made for thinness of tone, particularly in the soprano section. The chorus at these concerts, by the way, is the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, as trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. In the main, Mr. Munch's disembodied approach is effective, though there are times, as in the famous chorus of the Disciples, "Lord, is it I?" when the rightness of his procedure is open to question.

The important role of the Evangelist narrator is assigned in these performances to David Lloyd, who yesterday coped very well with the difficult tessitura and delivered the text in a fashion duly meaningful and expressive. We have heard the music of Jesus more richly sung than it was yesterday by Marko Rothmuller, but his singing was quite in keeping with the general spirit of the performance, as was that of the other bass, Grant Garnell. Martha Lipton brought gratifying warmth and volume of tone to the contralto part, and Adele Addison sang the soprano airs and recitatives with the finish and the fine musicianship that we have come to expect from her. Daniel Pinkham officiated at the harpsichord and E. Power Biggs at the organ, and the orchestra played superbly. One was reminded afresh of the many beautiful color effects that Bach has achieved in his sublime masterpiece.

3/23/51



GRANT GARNELL will be baritone soloist in Bach's St. Matthew Passion with the Boston Symphony at performances this afternoon and tomorrow evening.

[252]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
3/24

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 19th program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing Bach's St. Matthew Passion. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; Marko Rosenmuller and Grant Garnell, basses. Assisting artists were Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord, and E. Power Biggs, organ.

By RUDOLF ELIE

The St. Matthew Passion of Sebastian Bach is one of the monumental glories of music. Yesterday received a truly beautiful performance, a performance informed with deep musical feeling and with devotional profundity as well.

There was, for the first time in many a season, a really first-class quartet of soloists. There was also a particularly well-trained chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, a chorus with a rather tone light quality but of admirable vocal precision. There was, for its very brief role in the opening chorus, a smartly responding choir of boys from Trinity church. And there was, as always, the orchestra itself with such instrumental soloists as Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin; E. Power Biggs, organ, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord, to supply the orchestral accompaniment, the solo obbligatos and the continuo for the recitatives.

DEPENDS ON WORDS

Yet it was the devotional quality that set this performance apart, and this quality sprang directly from Charles Munch, who has long since made it clear that he ranks with the foremost Bach players of the day. What he does here—as he did in the St. John Passion of last season—is subordinate everything to the Gospel itself. Everything depends on the words. No climax is allowed nor any display of musical extravagance or theatricality tolerated unless it is implicit in the text. The general dynamic level is subdued. Massiveness is never intruded, though this is not to say that as the central tragedy nears in the second part that dramatic vehemence and tension is absent.

In his cutting of the score, which in its entirety would run more than three and a half hours, Mr. Munch emphasizes the liturgical aspects even more. For he omits many of the great solo arias and ariosos, of non-Scriptural character interpolated by Bach as poetic reflections on the narrative of the Passion in favor of the narrative itself.

Omitted yesterday were "Grief and Pain," "Never Will My Heart Refuse Thee," "Gladly Will I," "Behold, Behold," "Give Me Back My Dearest Master," "Come Blessed Cross" and others (to use their English titles though this performance is sung in German). Included, however, were a number of accompanied recitatives and nearly all of the recitativo secco, a fact that made clear the conductor's devotional approach to this gigantic work. Nevertheless, it is an approach that still stresses the lyrical, profoundly contemplative aspect of the Passion while giving it additional unity in the blending of the Gospel with the non-Gospel reflections in the arias chosen.

SPLENDIDLY CHOSEN

The soloists yesterday, as indicated above, were not less than splendidly chosen. David Lloyd, again assuming the exceedingly difficult role of the Evangelist, set forth his recitative with remarkable felicity of voice and expressiveness. Marko Rosenmuller, also appearing again in the role of Jesus, has gained stature immeasurably since we last heard him, and he made the part musically and dramatically very effective and touching.

Adele Addison, whose voice seems to gain in musicianship and quality with every appearance, sang with exceptional clarity and distinctness, and Martha Lipton, making her first appearance here, displayed a contralto voice of beautiful quality and exactitude. Grant Garnell in a smaller role proved capable. The chorus, which like all choruses of non-professional calibre, was at its best in full voice, managed the triple pianissimos enforced on it by the conductor pretty well. Save for an accident in a matter of attack in one of the recitatives, the orchestral performance was notably clear and poised and balanced throughout. The occasion was so elevated in spirit the audience seemed at a loss to know whether to applaud or not, so the final reception was very mild indeed, yet from the attention it gave the music throughout the two hours and 20 minutes of the performance it was clearly enraptured throughout.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 24 1951

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Pre-Easter Performances of "St. Matthew" Passion

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch yesterday afternoon conducted the first of two pre-Easter performances of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion at Symphony Hall. Because of the religious nature of this work it was appropriate to place the usual Friday Boston Symphony concert of the week on Good Friday, something always avoided when the program consists of secular music.

The choruses were those of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by their conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor (The Evangelist); Marko Rothmueller, bass (Jesus), and Grant Garnell, bass. The organist was E. Power Biggs, and the harpsichordist for the accompaniments to the recitatives, Daniel Pinkham.

With his Alsatian ancestry and church background as a young musician, Mr. Munch seems to have an unusual approach to great religious works suitable for concert performance. As has been noted before, it may be that such music arouses the German side of his nature. At any rate, Mr. Munch has presented Bach's "St. John" Passion and "Christmas Oratorio" with a surety of style and an emotional intensity which stand somewhere between French clarity and German weight.

So it was again with the "St. Matthew" Passion yesterday, and the performance was one of grandeur and overwhelming emotional power. The choruses had been well trained, as usual with Mr. Woodworth, and they sang superbly if, now and again, with the girls' voices too heavily in balance. What was especially rewarding was the prevailing clarity with which Bach's wonderful polyphony came over. Another was the rhythmic vitality, and a third the balance between the choral voices and the small orchestra.

The soloists, always a difficult problem with the "St. Matthew" Passion, were remarkably good individually, and as a body. Miss Addison's beautiful soprano soared easefully in the aria "Aus liebe will mein Heiland sterben," and Miss Lipton gave as fine account as I have heard of "Ebarme Dich." But the great burden falls upon the tenor who sings the endless recitatives of the Evangelist. Mr. Lloyd did them superbly, with a style that approached perfection, and with feeling instead of the conventional sickness of the average soloist who attempts the part. Mr. Rothmueller uttered the words of Jesus with suitable subdued and mystic effect, and Mr. Garnell, though his voice had a rough edge, was adequate.

Mr. Munch had cut enough of choruses, chorales, arias and even some of the Evangelist's recitatives to put this voluminous work within two and one-half hours performing time. This meant, however, that there was still a large proportion of recitative, which musically is the least interesting aspect of the "St. Matthew" Passion. Especially was this true in the first half. To my mind the second part contains the highest concentration of Bach at his most emotional and dramatic, including that moment which is perhaps one of the mostt frightening in all music when the mob cries on a diminished seventh chard, "Barrabas!"

Some of the greatest moments in all music, dedicated and profound, tender and exalted, are Bach's chorales. Those were sung with unforgettable beauty, an ensemble which was without flaw, even though a high organ note began to cipher in "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden." Luckily Mr. Biggs was able to stop it. He and Mr. Pinkham, added measurably to the success of the whole.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 25 1951

Boston Symphony ~~Juggles Schedule,~~ To Play For Truman

BOSTON, March 24— (UP) — The Boston Symphony orchestra announced today it was juggling its regular schedule so it could perform for the president of the United States and the president of France.

The orchestra will play its scheduled Saturday evening concert on Thursday so that it can be in Washington March 31 for a special program arranged for President Vincent Auriol of France.

MARCH 24, 1951

Bach St. Matthew Passion

Munch Presents Choral Work With Harvard-Radcliffe Group

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, are celebrating the Easter season this week with two performances of Bach's lengthy masterwork, "The Passion According to St. Matthew."

For the first time in 14 years this great choral work is being produced in Symphony Hall. David Lloyd and Marko Rothmüller carry the burden of the solos, Mr. Lloyd as the Evangelist and Mr. Rothmüller in the role of Jesus. Adele Addison and Martha Lipton sing the various solos for soprano and alto. Grant Garnell is heard in the passages for Judas, Caiaphas, Pilate, and Peter. Daniel Pinkham officiates at the harpsichord and E. Power Biggs at the organ.

* * *

It would be difficult to point out any great difference in technical production between Mr. Munch's reading of the St. Matthew Passion yesterday and his reading of Bach's Christmas Oratorio last December. The performance details were almost flawless in both instances. The Harvard and Radcliffe groups, trained by their regular conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, are comparable in caliber to the chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler for the Oratorio.

But for some reason the inspirational quality that was present at the Christmas Oratorio was missing yesterday in the Passion. This is difficult to account for. Both scores represent Bach at his best. Mr. Munch seemed no less devoted to his task yesterday than he did last Christmas. Perhaps the answer lies in the difference between the emotional moods of Christmas and Good Friday—the first a joyous heralding of Jesus' nativity while the second mourns his crucifixion.

In the opening scored for double chorus, preceded by a sublime and stately introduction, the singers were joined by the boys' choir of Trinity Church. This soprano ripieno was prepared by Francis Snow. The choral balance and tone were in sensitive adjustment throughout the performance, either in the a capella work or with orchestral accompaniment. Many niceties in dynamics and shading appeared in the familiar chorales. There were excellent contrasts in "Acknowledge me, my keeper," for instance, and the pianissimo was close to celestial in "O Lord, who dares to smite thee?"

* * *

For sheer beauty of tone, expression, and phrasing, Mr. Lloyd's tenor would be difficult to surpass. He sang the long role of the Evangelist effortlessly and with clarity of enunciation. His voice has an appealing ring and warmth.

Mr. Rothmüller's bass solos, presenting the words of Jesus, were handled with strength and dignity. Here again was excellent enunciation, good projection, and a pleasant tone quality that is not over-refined.

Miss Addison's lyric soprano is developing certain dramatic elements—greater power, richness, and security. Accompanied by the oboes and continuo, her rendition of the recitative, "Although my heart with tears o'erflow," was eloquently and poignantly moving. Her duet with Miss Lipton, "Alas! my Jesus now is taken," was generally in good balance. The serene lines of these two voices were effectively punctuated by stark expostulations from the chorus.

* * *

Miss Lipton did some of her finest work in the alto aria, "O pardon me," in which her phrases were carefully molded. Her voice has something of a metallic brilliance that is usually associated with the soprano timbre. It is a strong voice, well controlled and accurate.

Since Mr. Garnell's lines were short and few, it is difficult to give much of an appraisal of his work. His bass, however, is forthright and powerful.

Though Mr. Munch has used a shortened version for these performances, the running time extends about an hour beyond the usual length of the Symphony concerts.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1951

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Pre-Easter Performances of "St. Matthew" Passion

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch yesterday afternoon conducted the first of two pre-Easter performances of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion at Symphony Hall. Because of the religious nature of this work it was appropriate to place the usual Friday Boston Symphony concert of the week on Good Friday, something always avoided when the program consists of secular music.

The choruses were those of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by their conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor (The Evangelist); Marko Rothmueller, bass (Jesus), and Grant Garnell, bass. The organist was E. Power Biggs, and the harpsichordist for the accompaniments to the recitatives, Daniel Pinkham.

With his Alsatian ancestry and church background as a young musician, Mr. Munch seems to have an unusual approach to great religious works suitable for concert performance. As has been noted before, it may be that such music arouses the German side of his nature. At any rate, Mr. Munch has presented Bach's "St. John" Passion and "Christmas Oratorio" with a surety of style and an emotional intensity which stand somewhere between French clarity and German weight.

So it was again with the "St. Matthew" Passion yesterday, and the performance was one of grandeur and overwhelming emotional power. The choruses had been well trained, as usual with Mr. Woodworth, and they sang superbly if, now and again, with the girls' voices too heavily in balance. What was especially rewarding was the prevailing clarity with which Bach's wonderful polyphony came over. Another was the rhythmic vitality, and a third the balance between the choral voices and the small orchestra.

The soloists, always a difficult problem with the "St. Matthew" Passion, were remarkably good individually, and as a body. Miss Addison's beautiful soprano soared easefully in the aria "Aus liebe will mein Heiland sterben," and Miss Lipton gave as fine account as I have heard of "Ebarme Dich." But the great burden falls upon the tenor who sings the endless recitatives of the Evangelist. Mr. Lloyd did them superbly, with a style that approached perfection, and with feeling instead of the conventional sickness of the average soloist who attempts the part. Mr. Rothmueller uttered the words of Jesus with suitable subdued and mystic effect, and Mr. Garnell, though his voice had a rough edge, was adequate.

Mr. Munch had cut enough of choruses, chorales, arias and even some of the Evangelist's recitatives to put this voluminous work within two and one-half hours performing time. This meant, however, that there was still a large proportion of recitative, which musically is the least interesting aspect of the "St. Matthew" Passion. Especially was this true in the first half. To my mind the second part contains the highest concentration of Bach at his most emotional and dramatic, including that moment which is perhaps one of the mostt frightening in all music when the mob cries on a diminished seventh chard, "Barrabas!"

Some of the greatest moments in all music, dedicated and profound, tender and exalted, are Bach's chorales. Those were sung with unforgettable beauty, an ensemble which was without flaw, even though a high organ note began to cipher in "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden." Luckily Mr. Biggs was able to stop it. He and Mr. Pinkham, added measurably to the success of the whole.

This Clipping From
LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL
MAR 25 1951

Vive la France!

With its usual all-out recognition of over-seas nobility, the state department at Washington is bringing Charles Munch and the Boston symphony to the city to welcome Pres. Vincent Auriol of the French republic and his entourage.

[253]

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Boston Symphony To Play For Presidents Of France And U. S.

Boston, March 24. (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today it was juggling its regular schedule so it could perform for the President of the United States and the president of France.

The orchestra will play its scheduled Saturday evening concert on Thursday so that it can be in Washington March 31 for a special program arranged for President Vincent Auriol of France.

President and Mrs. Truman also will attend the concert which will be a mixture of American and French music.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 25 1951

Concert Boxes for Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's special concert, to be conducted by Charles Munch on Saturday in honor of French President Auriol, is proving very popular with capital officials and socialites. The boxes are being sold fast, many people taking several guests.

Saturday evening's list of boxholders, headed by the President and Mrs. Truman, the Ambassador of Norway and Mme. Munthe de Morgenstierne and the Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson, has had new names added to it, including those of Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Representative Frances P. Bolton, M. and Mme. Louis Bruguiere, Mme. Tamara Dmitrieff, the Ambassador of Israel and Mrs. Eban, the Ambassador of the Phillippines, Mr. Joaquin M. Elizalde; the Minister of Luxembourg and Mme. Le Gallais, Mrs. Anne Marie Girard, Mr. Edward Lehman, Senator and Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge and Mr David K. Niles.

Additional interest in the audience will be added by the presence of Lily Pons and Andre Kostelanetz, who will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Jack Snow. Dr and Mrs. Irving Brotman will hav with them the Brazilian Ministe and Mme. de Melo-Franco.

The Andre Vissons are entertaining at a small dinner part that evening—which will includ Mr. and Mrs. Harold J. Coolidge in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Georg K. Livermore of New York an Lenox, Mass., and will take the guests on to the concert with ther

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
MAR 25 1951

Munch to Play American And French Works

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony will present a program in Constitution Hall on Saturday at 8:30 p.m. for the enjoyment of the Presidents of two great Republics, Harry S. Truman of the United States and Vincent Auriol of France. Nicole Henriot, petite French pianist, will be guest artist.

After opening with the "Star-Spangled Banner" and "La Marseillaise," the French conductor will lead his American orchestra in a program of half American, half French music. America will be represented by works of two contemporary composers—Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Compland's "Quiet City." For the French half, Mlle. Henriot will play the Ravel Piano Concerto in G major; and the orchestra, Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," a great favorite of President Auriol's.

Friday's concert by the Navy Band will feature Richard E. Larson, pianist, in Weber's "Concert Picee" and trumpeters Gordon Finlay, Frank Scimonelli, and Harold Wendt in a cornet trio of Ernest Williams. Lt. Commander Charles Brendler has devoted the band's portion of the program to compositions of Grainger, Gershwin, Tschaikowsky, and Enesco. Concert time is 8:30 p.m. at the Labor Department Auditorium.

The United States Marine Symphony under the baton of Major William F. Santelmann will appear in concert at the Commerce Department Auditorium on Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, Brahms' Hungarian Dances Nos. 1 and 3, and the Conus Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, wich Roy Berkman as solist, will be the featured works.

The concerts by the U. S. Soldiers Home Symphonette under the direction of Franklin B. Charles continue this week on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday at 5:30 p.m. in Stanley Hall. Music of Rachmaninoff, Friml, Mozart, and Wagner is listed for performance.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 25 1951

BOSTONIANS LISTED AMONG PATRONS FOR WASHINGTON CONCERT

Boston subscribers to the regular Saturday evening symphony series in Symphony Hall will have a rare change made in their routine schedule next week. Due to the special concert in honor of President Vincent Auriol of France which Boston Symphony Conductor Charles Munch is conducting on Saturday evening in Constitution Hall, Washington, they have been asked to attend on Thursday evening so that the orchestra, following the regular Friday afternoon concert, may entrain for Washington.

President and Mrs. Truman head the list of honorary patrons for the Washington concert, which also includes the ambassador of Norway and Madame Munthe de Morgenstierne and Secretary of State and Mrs. Dean Acheson.

Among the box holders and patrons are Mr. and Mrs. Stanley B. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Alderman, Mrs. Margretta Stroup Austin, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, M. and Madame Jean-Pierre Benard, Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen, Hon. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, the Hon. Frances Bolton, Ambassador of France and Madame Bonnet, Dr. and Mrs. Irving Brotman, Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown.

M. and Madame Louis Brugliere, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Jefferson Coolidge, Mrs. William Crozier, M. Jean Daridan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Dewey, Madame Tamara Dmitrieff, Ambassador to Israel, and Mrs. Eban.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 25 1951

Nicole Henriot, pianist (center), soloist with the Boston Symphony, which will honor President Vincent Auriol of France with a concert in Constitution Hall Saturday, and Charles Munch, conductor (right), are shown with Henri Bonnet, French Ambassador to the United States.

Washington, D. C.
SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1951

Auriol to Hear Nicole Henriot With Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, will make an appearance Saturday at 8:30 in Constitution Hall. The concert coincides with the visit of President Auriol of France, who is expected to attend. Nicole Henriot, French pianist, will be the soloist.

The program will be half French and half American. The French will be represented by Berlioz and by Ravel whose "Concerto in G Major" will be performed by Miss Henriot. Mr. Munch chose Barber and Copland to represent the United States. The former's "School for Scandal" overture, supposedly a resume in music of Richard Sheridan's comedy by the same title and Copland's incidental music to Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City" will be given a hearing. The orchestral suite is based on the original material composed for the drama, rewritten after it failed. Two first desk men of the Boston Symphony, Roger Voisin, trumpet and Louis Steyer, English horn, will play the solo parts.

Miss Henriot was a protege of Ravel. When she was only 11, she sat at the composer's side at the piano, playing with him a four-handed arrangement of his "Mother Goose Suite." Ravel wrote and dedicated his "G Minor Concerto" to her teacher, Marguerite Long, who gave the premiere of the work in Paris. Both, Miss Henriot and the President Auriol worked in the French Resistance movement where they knew each other by sight only, since names are not revealed in that dangerous and secret work. The pianist made her American debut three years ago and returned for 30 appearances in December. She had the distinction of being soloist at the inaugural concert for UNESCO in Paris.

FRANCE AMERIQUE
OBERS 535 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

NUMERO DU 25 MARS 1951

LA MUSIQUE

entendre en première audition une oeuvre qui d'emblée se range parmi les plus importantes dans l'histoire de la musique contemporaine: la Ve Symphonie de Honegger, achevée il y a quelques mois à peine pendant que le grand compositeur se débattait contre un mal qui à l'époque faisait craindre pour ses jours. La Symphonie, écrite dans le style si personnel de Honegger, contient des pages d'une émotion intense. Elle est animée d'une force irrésistible qui n'exclut pas des moments de grande tendresse —la tendresse d'un coeur noble qui contemple le monde avec une intelligence aussi aiguisée que sensible, mûrie par l'expérience et la méditation, exprimée avec maîtrise et lucidité. Les trois mouvements de la Symphonie, dont chacun se termine par un "Ré" de signification mystérieuse joué par la timbale, reflètent un pessimisme poignant, presque douloureux mais sans aucune exagération dans le mauvais goût du "Weltschmerz" romantique. Un vrai chef d'oeuvre.

L'interprétation de M. Munch fut miraculeuse. Il a si bien réussi à extraire la quintessence de l'oeuvre de Honegger que cette musique, somme toute extrêmement difficile tant comme texte que comme facture, devint aussitôt accessible. A une oeuvre pareille, il fallait un interprète de taille. On ne saurait souhaiter une collaboration plus féconde.

* * *

La semaine dernière, il fallut dire adieu, jusqu'à la saison prochaine, au grand Charles Munch et à l'orchestre de Boston qui viennent de donner leurs derniers concerts, cette année.

A cette occasion, M. Munch fit

Les autres ouvrages dirigés par M. Munch furent également éclairés par cette lumière radieuse qu'il projette sur chaque partition dont il assume la responsabilité: La IIIe Symphonie de Roussel, "Nuages" et "Fêtes" de Debussy, l'ouverture "Pénélope" de Fauré, la Suite de "Dardanus" de Rameau (que M. Munch nous fit connaître en 1948), "Daphnis et Chloé" de Ravel et la Symphonie en mi bémol majeur de Mozart—autant de souvenirs précieux, autant de jalons sur la route que parcourent tous ceux qui cherchent à enrichir leur âme.

E. F.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAR 26 1951

Strasbourg Visit Brings Talk of Munch and Schweitzer

BY DR. EUGENE WASSERMAN

Editor's Note.—Dr. Wasserman, Dallas physcian and amateur musician, who is currently vacationing in Europe, wrote the following article from Strasbourg:

STRASBOURG, France, March 25.—This old, beautiful heirloom from the middle-ages, at the crossroads between Flanders and Italy, between Paris and Vienna, is well known these days as the seat of the European Union. To the historian it is the city where Rouget de Lisle wrote and sang for the first time "Marseillaise." For the music lover in more recent days it is the city of the organist (and philosopher and medical missionary) Albert Schweitzer and the home of the family Munch.

A deep mutual friendship existed between Schweitzer and Munch, the most important figure in Strasbourg's musical life during the last 100 years. Munch was the father of two outstanding conductors, Charles, now of Boston, and Fritz in Strasbourg. With Munch the elder, the young Schweitzer founded the Wilhelma-Choir, which is still flourishing in this town and which collaborated this week on Good Friday in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" under the son's baton.

This writer had the great pleasure of listening recently for nearly two hours to Robert Weiss, intimate friend of Albert Schweitzer, the polyhistor and humanitarian of Lambarene, French Equatorial Africa. Mr. Weiss is chief pharmacist of the city hospital. In his cozy antique office, numerous snapshots, a large plaquette and piles of letters in the minute handwriting of Dr. Schweitzer testified to his close friendship with the man who sacrificed fame and comfort to his religious and social convictions.

BUT HERE, described in the friend's informal Alsatian brogue, appeared a more human and even a humorous Schweitzer. Once, for instance, he made his companion pick up the check in a wine-tavern when he saw through the friend's stratagem of trying to poke fun at the numerous old-fashioned money pouches in which he stowed away the various European currencies in usage in this borderland town. Mr. Weiss described the Schweitzer who called himself "the hermit of Lambarene" and who wrote, after his recent visit from Stassen, "It is a great thing to sit in the wilderness and to exercise infuence upon history."

Mr. Weiss also told this writer about a play presented in Paris a few months ago called "Il est minuit, Docteur Schweitzer" (It Is Midnight, Dr. Schweitzer). The pseudo-historical plot described the tragic events in Lambarene at the outbreak of World War I, when the governor of French Equatorial Africa was ordered to arrest Dr. Schweitzer, at that time a German subject, and his wife, as enemy aliens, and to close the hospital. The principal characters, besides the doctor, were the Pere Foucauld, who actually was murdered later by savages, and an officer named Lyautey, who actually became Marshall of France later. Schweitzer wrote of this theatrical monument, "It is really funny to be dragged over the stage, while one is still alive. But the play may serve some good purpose, if it contributes to spread the idea of respect for life." Respect for life in any form is the basic idea of Schweitzer's early philosophical writings.

Strasbourgh saw Schweitzer as student of theology. By coincidence, he occupied the same room in an old house at the Fishmarket in which, 100 years before, Goethe had lived. In addition to intensive and productive theological studies, he was organist in Saint Nicholas, campaigned for the preservation of the precious old Silbermann organs in many Alsatian churches, and traveled back and forth to Paris, where he studied with Charles Marie Widor. With this master of the organ, he founded the Bach Society of Paris. At Widor's instigation, Schweitzer wrote (in French) an essay about Bach, which epochal work he later translated and greatly enlarged into the monumental German edition. Part of it may have been written in Strasbourg.

[254]

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
MAR 25 1951

Munch to Play American And French Works

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony will present a program in Constitution Hall on Saturday at 8:30 p.m. for the enjoyment of the Presidents of two great Republics, Harry S. Truman of the United States and Vincent Auriol of France. Nicole Henriot, petite French pianist, will be guest artist.

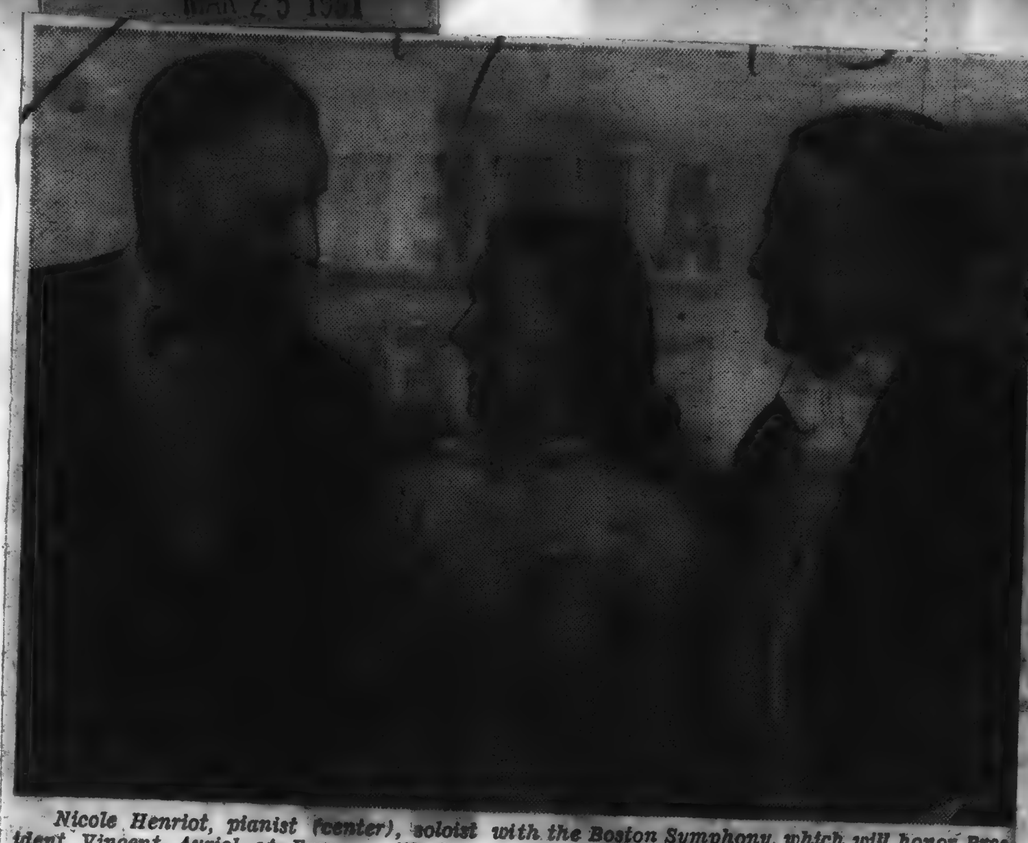
After opening with the "Star-Spangled Banner" and "La Marseillaise," the French conductor will lead his American orchestra in a program of half American, half French music. America will be represented by works of two contemporary composers—Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Compland's "Quiet City." For the French half, Mlle. Henriot will play the Ravel Piano Concerto in G major; and the orchestra, Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," a great favorite of President Auriol's.

Friday's concert by the Navy Band will feature Richard E. Larson, pianist, in Weber's "Concert Piece" and trumpeters Gordon Finlay, Frank Scimonelli, and Harold Wendt in a cornet trio of Ernest Williams. Lt. Commander Charles Brendler has devoted the band's portion of the program to compositions of Grainger, Gershwin, Tschaikowsky, and Enesco. Concert time is 8:30 p.m. at the Labor Department Auditorium.

The United States Marine Symphony under the baton of Major William F. Santelmann will appear in concert at the Commerce Department Auditorium on Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, Brahms' Hungarian Dances Nos. 1 and 3, and the Conus Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, with Roy Berkman as solist, will be the featured works.

The concerts by the U. S. Soldiers Home Symphonette under the direction of Franklin B. Charles continue this week on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday at 5:30 p.m. in Stanley Hall. Music of Rachmaninoff, Friml, Mozart, and Wagner is listed for performance.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 25 1951



Nicole Henriot, pianist (center), soloist with the Boston Symphony, which will honor President Vincent Auriol of France with a concert in Constitution Hall Saturday, and Charles Munch, conductor (right), are shown with Henri Bonnet, French Ambassador to the United States.

Washington, D. C.
SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1951

Auriol to Hear Nicole Henriot with Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, will make an appearance Saturday at 8:30 in Constitution Hall. The concert coincides with the visit of President Auriol of France, who is expected to attend. Nicole Henriot, French pianist, will be the soloist.

The program will be half French and half American. The French will be represented by Berlioz and by Ravel whose "Concerto in G Major" will be performed by Miss Henriot. Mr. Munch chose Barber and Copland to represent the United States. The former's "School for Scandal" overture, supposedly a resume in music of Richard Sheridan's comedy by the same title and Copland's incidental music to Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City" will be given a hearing. The orchestral suite is based on the original material composed for the drama, rewritten after it failed. Two first desk men of the Boston Symphony, Roger Voisin, trumpet, and Louis Steyer, English horn, will play the solo parts.

Miss Henriot was a protege of Ravel. When she was only 11, she sat at the composer's side at the piano, playing with him a four-handed arrangement of his "Mother Goose Suite." Ravel wrote and dedicated his "G Minor Concerto" to her teacher, Marguerite Long, who gave the premiere of the work in Paris. Both, Miss Henriot and the President Auriol worked in the French Resistance movement where they knew each other by sight only, since names are not revealed in that dangerous and secret work. The pianist made her American debut three years ago and returned for 30 appearances in December. She had the distinction of being soloist at the inaugural concert for UNESCO in Paris.

FRANCE-AMERIQUE

OBERS — 535 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

NUMERO DU 25 MARS 1951

LA MUSIQUE

entendre en première audition une oeuvre qui d'emblée se range parmi les plus importantes dans l'histoire de la musique contemporaine: la Ve Symphonie de Honegger, achevée il y a quelques mois à peine pendant que le grand compositeur se débattait contre un mal qui à l'époque faisait craindre pour ses jours. La Symphonie, écrite dans le style si personnel de Honegger, contient des pages d'une émotion intense. Elle est animée d'une force irrésistible qui n'exclut pas des moments de grande tendresse —la tendresse d'un coeur noble qui contemple le monde avec une intelligence aussi aiguisée que sensible, mûrie par l'expérience et la méditation, exprimée avec maîtrise et lucidité. Les trois mouvements de la Symphonie, dont chacun se termine par un "Ré" de signification mystérieuse joué par la timbale, reflètent un pessimisme poignant, presque douloureux mais sans aucune exagération dans le mauvais goût du "Weltschmerz" romantique. Un vrai chef d'oeuvre.

L'interprétation de M. Munch fut miraculeuse. Il a si bien réussi à extraire la quintessence de l'oeuvre de Honegger que cette musique, somme toute extrêmement difficile tant comme texte que comme facture, devint aussitôt accessible. A une oeuvre pareille, il fallait un interprète de taille. On ne saurait souhaiter une collaboration plus féconde.

Les autres ouvrages dirigés par M. Munch furent également éclairés par cette lumière radieuse qu'il projette sur chaque partition dont il assume la responsabilité: La IIIe Symphonie de Rousel, "Nuages" et "Fêtes" de Debussy, l'ouverture "Pénélope" de Fauré, la Suite de "Dardanus" de Rameau (que M. Munch nous fit connaître en 1948), "Daphnis et Chloé" de Ravel et la Symphonie en mi bémol majeur de Mozart—autant de souvenirs précieux, autant de jalons sur la route que parcourent tous ceux qui cherchent à enrichir leur âme.

E. F.

* * *

La semaine dernière, il fallut dire adieu, jusqu'à la saison prochaine, au grand Charles Munch et à l'orchestre de Boston qui viennent de donner leurs derniers concerts, cette année.

A cette occasion, M. Munch fit

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
MAR 25 1951

BOSTONIANS LISTED AMONG PATRONS FOR WASHINGTON CONCERT

Boston subscribers to the regular Saturday evening symphony series in Symphony Hall will have a rare change made in their routine schedule next week. Due to the special concert in honor of President Vincent Auriol of France which Boston Symphony Conductor Charles Munch is conducting on Saturday evening in Constitution Hall, Washington, they have been asked to attend on Thursday evening so that the orchestra, following the regular Friday afternoon concert, may entrain for Washington.

President and Mrs. Truman head the list of honorary patrons for the Washington concert, which also includes the ambassador of Norway and Madame Munthe de Morgenstierne and Secretary of State and Mrs. Dean Acheson.

Among the box holders and patrons are Mr. and Mrs. Stanley B. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Alderman, Mrs. Margretta Stroup Austin, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, M. and Madame Jean-Pierre Benard, Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen, Hon. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, the Hon. Frances Bolton, Ambassador of France and Madame Bonnet, Dr. and Mrs. Irving Brotman, Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown.

M. and Madame Louis Brugliere, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. William R. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Jefferson Coolidge, Mrs. William Crozier, M. Jean Dardan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Dewey, Madame Tamara Dmitrieff, Ambassador to Israel, and Mrs. Eban.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAR 26 1951

Strasbourg Visit Brings Talk of Munch and Schweitzer

BY DR. EUGENE WASSERMAN

Editor's Note.—Dr. Wasserman, Dallas physcian and amateur musician, who is currently vacationing in Europe, wrote the following article from Strasbourg:

STRASBOURG, France, March 25.—This old, beautiful heirloom from the middle-ages, at the crossroads between Flanders and Italy, between Paris and Vienna, is well known these days as the seat of the European Union. To the historian it is the city where Rouget de Lisle wrote and sang for the first time "Marseillaise." For the music lover in more recent days it is the city of the organist (and philosopher and medical missionary) Albert Schweitzer and the home of the family Munch.

A deep mutual friendship existed between Schweitzer and Munch, the most important figure in Strasbourg's musical life during the last 100 years. Munch was the father of two outstanding conductors, Charles, now of Boston, and Fritz in Strasbourg. With Munch the elder, the young Schweitzer founded the Wilhelma-Choir, which is still flourishing in this town and which collaborated this week on Good Friday in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" under the son's baton.

This writer had the great pleasure of listening recently for nearly two hours to Robert Weiss, intimate friend of Albert Schweitzer, the polyhistor and humanitarian of Lambarene, French Equatorial Africa. Mr. Weiss is chief pharmacist of the city hospital. In his cozy antique office, numerous snapshots, a large plaquette and piles of letters in the minute handwriting of Dr. Schweitzer testified to his close friendship with the man who sacrificed fame and comfort to his religious and social convictions.

BUT HERE, described in the friend's informal Alsatian brogue, appeared a more human and even a humorous Schweitzer. Once, for instance, he made his companion pick up the check in a wine-tavern when he saw through the friend's stratagem of trying to poke fun at the numerous old-fashioned money pouches in which he stowed away the various European currencies in usage in this borderland town. Mr. Weiss described the Schweitzer who called himself "the hermit of Lambarene" and who wrote, after his recent visit from Stassen, "It is a great thing to sit in the wilderness and to exercise influence upon history."

Mr. Weiss also told this writer about a play presented in Paris a few months ago called "Il est minuit, Docteur Schweitzer" (It Is Midnight, Dr. Schweitzer). The pseudo-historical plot described the tragic events in Lambarene at the outbreak of World War I, when the governor of French Equatorial Africa was ordered to arrest Dr. Schweitzer, at that time a German subject, and his wife, as enemy aliens, and to close the hospital. The principal characters, besides the doctor, were the Perrin Foucauld, who actually was murdered later by savages, and an officer named Lyautey, who actually became Marshall of France later. Schweitzer wrote of this theatrical monument, "It is really funny to be dragged over the stage, while one is still alive. But the play may serve some good purpose, if it contributes to spread the idea of respect for life." Respect for life in any form is the basic idea of Schweitzer's early philosophical writings.

Strasbourgh saw Schweitzer as a student of theology. By coincidence, he occupied the same room in an old house at the Fishmarket in which, 100 years before, Goethe had lived. In addition to intensive and productive theological studies he was organist in Saint Nicholas, campaigned for the preservation of the precious old Silbermann organs in many Alsatian churches and traveled back and forth to Paris, where he studied with Charles Marie Widor. With this master of the organ, he founded the Bach Society of Paris. At Widor's instigation, Schweitzer wrote (in French) an essay about Bach, which epochal work he later translated and greatly enlarged into the monumental German edition. Part of it may have been written in Strasbourg.

[254]

This Clipping From WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON
MAR 25 1951

This Week's Baton

TAKE Charles Munch, tenth conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and you have a perfect example of what makes Europe a peculiar place. . . Is he a German conductor or is he a French conductor? . . . The answer is: both. He comes from a famous family of Strasbourgers, in which Alsace-Lorraine city he was born in 1891. He was then a German subject, and when his talent for music had manifested itself beyond the capacity of the local conservatory to cope with it, he took his violin to Berlin, where he also studied conducting with Wilhelm Furtwaengler. . . With the end of World War I he was a French subject, politically, but rather distinctly a German one, musically.

Munch

He was little known when he made his American debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York in 1947, but he quickly won respect for enthusiasm, musicianship, and partisanship for new music of substantial stature. Thus when he filled a guest engagement in Boston, he seemed such an alter ego for Serge Koussevitzky, then about to retire, that the Symphony Society regarded him almost at once as No. 1 candidate for a job which, with fantastic prescience, Virgil Thomson had predicted (in 1935) he would one day hold. . . He now holds it firmly and with general esteem even among those who preferred the Koussevitzky sound to the Munch sound. This summer he makes his first venture into the famous music shed at Tanglewood for a series in the July Berkshire Festival, which is an additional reason for honoring him with a baton symbolic of high regard in his field.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
MAR 28 1951

What Readers Have to Say

Plea for Griffith Programs of "More Esoteric and Less Familiar Compositions"—Other Letters

To the Editor:

Sir—Greatly indebted as we are to the Griffith Music Foundation for bringing to Newark the major symphonic organizations, I cannot help to feel a little dissatisfaction with the content of the programs offered.

In contrast with the performances given by the same orchestras in New York, where the standard symphonic works are supplemented by some of the more esoteric and less familiar compositions of the old masters and the productions of the moderns, the concerts in Newark are devoted almost exclusively to excellent renditions of music of most elementary and "popular" character.

Thus, March 15 the Philadelphia Orchestra gave us the overplayed hurdy-gurdy "Meistersinger" Overture; the hackneyed "Rosenkavalier" Suite, singable music in operatic form but too unsubstantial for the concert hall; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, the most impoverished in thematic material of all symphonies and suitable only for a sentimental Broadway operetta (for which, indeed, it was used many years ago), and Dvorak's Concerto for Cello, a piece sustained only by its folk tune references and not improved by its gargoyle embellishments, which, incidentally, the performer on this occasion could master only at the sacrifice of tonality.

I don't like to believe that Essex County audiences are as musically naive and unsophisticated as the program makers appear to think. No customers will be lost, I feel, by offering programs at a level distinguishably higher than that of the Boston Pops.

ROYAL F. SHEPARD.

Glen Ridge.

It cannot be denied that the recent performance of the Philadelphia Orchestra offered nothing new or startling, although it would be equally difficult to agree with the writer's characterizations of the music performed. Few authorities would concede that Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony is the "most impoverished in thematic material" or that the "Meistersinger" Prelude is "hurdy-gurdy" music.

During the season, under Griffith auspices, considerable symphonic music has been offered. Certainly there was nothing hackneyed about the Boston Symphony program conducted by Dr. Charles Munch. This program contained a Schumann overture never played here previously. It also contained, at the request of Alan Branigan of The Newark News music staff, Hector Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which was greeted with a tremendous ovation. Here, indeed, were novelties.

The best course for dissatisfied subscribers, it would seem, is to inform the Griffith management of its wishes and desires. If enough requests are made for works of a "more esoteric and less familiar" nature, the programs will be changed. That this has not occurred is probably a reflection of the wishes of Newark audiences for performances of time-honored masterpieces. After all, the public decides this question by the mere action of buying tickets.—The Editor.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 28 1951

Concert Saturday for the Presidents

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following program Saturday at 8:30 p. m. at Constitution Hall in honor of President Truman and President Vincent Auriol of France:

Overture, The School for Scandal, by Barber; Copland's Quiet City, with Roger Voisin, trumpet, and Louis Steyer, English horn; Ravel's G major piano concerto with Nicole Henriot as soloist; Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique.

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
MAR 26 1951

City Symphony Manager Quits

George Judd jr., business manager of the Oklahoma City Symphony orchestra since September, 1948, has resigned to take a position with Columbia Concerts, Inc., New York City, Dean McGee, president of the symphony society, announced Monday.

Judd's resignation, effective May 1, follows by only a few weeks that of Victor Alessandro, conductor for 13 years, who will become conductor of the San Antonio symphony.

McGee said, however, Judd advised the board last October he planned to resign this spring.

Action Still to Come

"Of course we are sorry to see Judd go," said McGee. "He has done a fine job as far as the board is concerned. He has been very helpful, but we can't blame him for going on to greener fields."

McGee said the executive committee will recommend as Judd's successor Roy Stokely, executive assistant of the chamber of commerce, who was largely responsible for obtaining the orchestra's international broadcast series.

Final action on the recommendation is not expected until the board meets at 4 p. m. Wednesday.

"We feel that Stokely, being familiar with operations of the orchestra for the last two years, will make a fine successor," said McGee. Stokely, he continued, has worked in the orchestra's financial campaigns for two years.

Broadcasts Started

Through Stokely's efforts the Oklahoma City Symphony broadcast 13 world concerts last season. This season, the series was extended to 26 weeks, and the concerts lengthened from half hour to full hour broadcasts.

Judd, 36, is joining his brother, William, vice-president of Columbia Concerts. He is the son of the business manager of the Boston Symphony, and a graduate of [redacted] university.

He is an army veteran, serving in Germany and the Philippines, and was stationed at Camp Gruber, Muskogee, when he met the 1948-49 symphony president, Rev. W. H. Alexander, who recommended him as business manager.

This Clipping From
CRESSET
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MAR - 1951

RECENT RECORDINGS

GIUSEPPE VERDI. Quartet in E Minor. The Paganini Quartet.—This fine composition is played in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Verdi's death. It was written in 1874 for the composer's own amusement. Verdi permitted one private performance but subsequently refused to let the work be played in public. RCA Victor WDM-1469.

HECTOR BERLIOZ. Beatrice and Benedict Overture. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Münch.—A virile reading of a melodically barren but brilliantly scored composition. RCA Victor 49-3078.

FRANCESCO CILÈA. Lamento di Féderico: È la solita storia, from L'Arlésiana. GAETANO DONIZETTI. Una furtiva lagrima, from The Elixir of Love. Jussi Bjoerling, tenor, with an orchestra under Nils Grevillius.—This recording was made in Sweden. Bjoerling has one of the great voices of the present time. RCA Victor 49-3086.

JULES MASSENET. Élégie. REYNALDO HAHN. Les Cygnes. Gladys Swarthout, mezzo-soprano, with Gibner King at the piano. Leonard Rose plays the 'cello obbligato in Massenet's composition.—These excellent recordings will give much pleasure to many. RCA VICTOR 49-3042.

NICCOLÒ PAGANINI. La Campanella, from Second Concerto, Op. 7. Moto Perpetuo. Played by the thirty-four violins of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler.—Superb recording. RCA Victor 49-3077.

IRVING BERLIN. You're Just in Love, from Call Me Madam. It's a Lovely Day Today, from the same production. Risë Stevens, mezzo-soprano, and Robert Merrill, baritone, with the RCA Victor Orchestra under Ted Dale.—The singing is acceptable, but the music represents Berlin at his worst. RCA Victor 49-3108.

JOSEPH HAYDN. Toy Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.—A fine recording of a tuneful work which Haydn wrote for the little ones. RCA Victor 49-3013.

[255]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting gave the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the voilin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. In it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, and the Fifth is an obviously a tortured fin de siecle meditation on episodes in the life of an artist as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This is one of the topsy-turvy weeks at Symphony Hall when the Thursday and Friday concerts exchange places. In other words, since the Orchestra is playing in Washington this evening, at a special concert in honor of President Auriol of France, the Saturday concert was put ahead to Thursday evening and became, to use the old terminology, the public rehearsal, while that of yesterday afternoon was the "concert." And since Mr. Munch is conducting in Washington, Richard Burgin took over his duties at home.

The current program, which may now be spoken of in the past tense, consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for violin, violoncello, oboe and bassoon, and the Fifth Symphony by Mahler. Haydn's work had not been played before at the Symphony Concerts, though there was a performance by the Conservatory Orchestra at Jordan Hall some three seasons ago. The soloists yesterday were Alfred Krips, Samuel Mayes, Ralph Gomberg and Raymond Allard.

Stylistically this is a curious piece. Since it was composed in London in 1792 we might expect it to sound like the London Symphonies of that period, but it does not. It lacks their earthy, jolly qualities. A deal of it might pass for Mozart, since the music is cast in the conventional idiom of the time, while the concerted style makes it suggest the concerto grosso of an earlier day. Even if not of the Haydn whom we love best, this is charming music and written most deftly for the four soloists, if not in a way to exploit the fullest possibilities of each instrument. The four virtuosi acquitted themselves handsomely and the whole performance was a joy to hear.

Would that as much might be said of the Mahler Symphony. Frankly, the work did not make the impression that it did when Mr. Burgin conducted it in November, 1948, when he quite outdid himself and the symphony seemed a veritable masterpiece. Was it because that was then Koussevitzky's orchestra, possessed of the fabulous and fabled tone? Or was it because Mr. Munch required some of the rehearsal time for his French-American program in Washington? Or was it because the piece itself has turned a corner and suddenly lost its virtue? One was conscious yesterday, not so much of the music's eloquence, as of its banality, bathos, bombast and bluster. This observation applies particularly to the first two divisions, the rather commonplace funeral march (as it seemed yesterday) and the stormy section it encircles. The scherzo went its lengthy way, conveying often an impression of forced gayety. The sentimental Adagietto seemed almost insipid, with only the extraordinary Rondo finale redeeming the whole. And even here the orchestral tone was unduly coarse. However, this movement aroused the audience to a state of excitement, comparable to that found in the music itself.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 31 1951

HUB SYMPHONY BEQUEATHED PRIZE VIOLIN

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Saturday (AP) — A violin that had been in a Providence family for 156 years has been bequeathed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the terms of the will of Miss Hope Vinton, filed in Providence Probate Court yesterday.

Miss Vinton, who died Sunday, provided that a Maline violin which had belonged to her late father, Dr. Frederick A. Vinton, for 76 years and been in her family for 75 years before that should go to the Boston orchestra in memory of her father.

The will provides that one third of the residue of the estate be used to set up a trust fund for students of the University of Vermont who show proficiency in Latin and Greek. The estate is estimated at $9000.

This Clipping From WICHITA, KAN.
BEACON
MAR 25 1951

This Week's Baton

TAKE Charles Munch, tenth conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and you have a perfect example of what makes Europe a peculiar place. . . Is he a German conductor or is he a French conductor? . . . The answer is both. He comes from a famous family of Strasbourgers, in which Alsace-Lorraine city he was born in 1891. He was then a German subject, and when his talent for music had manifested itself beyond the capacity of the local conservatory to cope with it, he took his violin to Berlin, where he also studied conducting with Wilhelm Furtwaengler. . . With the end of World War I he was a French subject, politically, but rather distinctly a German one, musically.

Munch

He was little known when he made his American debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony of New York in 1947, but he quickly won respect for enthusiasm, musicianship, and partisanship for new music of substantial stature. Thus when he filled a guest engagement in Boston, he seemed such an alter ego for Serge Koussevitzky, then about to retire, that the Symphony Society regarded him almost at once as No. 1 candidate for a job which, with fantastic prescience, Virgil Thomson had predicted (in 1935) he would one day hold. . . He now holds it firmly and with general esteem even among those who preferred the Koussevitzky sound to the Munch sound. This summer he makes his first venture into the famous music shed at Tanglewood for a series in the July Berkshire Festival, which is an additional reason for honoring him with a baton symbolic of high regard in his field.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
MAR 28 1951

What Readers Have to Say

Plea for Griffith Programs of "More Esoteric and Less Familiar Compositions"—Other Letters

To the Editor:

Sir—Greatly indebted as we are to the Griffith Music Foundation for bringing to Newark the major symphonic organizations, I cannot help to feel a little dissatisfaction with the content of the programs offered.

In contrast with the performances given by the same orchestras in New York, where the standard symphonic works are supplemented by some of the more esoteric and less familiar compositions of the old masters and the productions of the moderns, the concerts in Newark are devoted almost exclusively to excellent renditions of music of most elementary and "popular" character.

Thus, March 15 the Philadelphia Orchestra gave us the overplayed hurdy-gurdy "Meistersinger" Overture; the hackneyed "Rosenkavalier" Suite, singable music in operatic form but too unsubstantial for the concert hall; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, the most impoverished in thematic material of all symphonies and suitable only for a sentimental Broadway operetta (for which, indeed, it was used many years ago), and Dvorak's Concerto for Cello, a piece sustained only by its folk tune references and not improved by its gargoyle embellishments, which, incidentally, the performer on this occasion could master only at the sacrifice of tonality.

I don't like to believe that Essex County audiences are as musically naive and unsophisticated as the program makers appear to think. No customers will be lost, I feel, by offering programs at a level distinguishably higher than that of the Boston Pops.

ROYAL F. SHEPARD.

Glen Ridge.

It cannot be denied that the recent performance of the Philadelphia Orchestra offered nothing new or startling, although it would be equally difficult to agree with the writer's characterizations of the music performed. Few authorities would concede that Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony is the "most impoverished in thematic material" or that the "Meistersinger" Prelude is "hurdy-gurdy" music.

During the season, under Griffith auspices, considerable symphonic music has been offered. Certainly there was nothing hackneyed about the Boston Symphony program conducted by Dr. Charles Munch. This program contained a Schumann overture never played here previously. It also contained, at the request of Alan Branigan of The Newark News music staff, Hector Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which was greeted with a tremendous ovation. Here, indeed, were novelties.

The best course for dissatisfied subscribers, it would seem, is to inform the Griffith management of its wishes and desires. If enough requests are made for works of a "more esoteric and less familiar" nature, the programs will be changed. That this has not occurred is probably a reflection of the wishes of Newark audiences for performances of time-honored masterpieces. After all, the public decides this question by the mere action of buying tickets.—The Editor.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 28 1951

Concert Saturday for the Presidents

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following program Saturday at 8:30 p. m. at Constitution Hall in honor of President Truman and President Vincent Auriol of France:

Overture, The School for Scandal, by Barber; Copland's Quiet City, with Roger Voisin, trumpet, and Louis Steyer, English horn; Ravel's G major piano concerto with Nicole Henriot as soloist; Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
MAR 26 1951

City Symphony Manager Quits

George Judd jr., business manager of the Oklahoma City Symphony orchestra since September, 1948, has resigned to take a position with Columbia Concerts, Inc., New York City, Dean McGee, president of the symphony society, announced Monday.

Judd's resignation, effective May 1, follows by only a few weeks that of Victor Alessandro, conductor for 13 years, who will become conductor of the San Antonio symphony.

McGee said, however, Judd advised the board last October he planned to resign this spring.

Action Still to Come

"Of course we are sorry to see Judd go," said McGee. "He has done a fine job as far as the board is concerned. He has been very helpful, but we can't blame him for going on to greener fields."

McGee said the executive committee will recommend as Judd's successor Roy Stokely, executive assistant of the chamber of commerce, who was largely responsible for obtaining the orchestra's international broadcast series.

Final action on the recommendation is not expected until the board meets at 4 p. m. Wednesday.

"We feel that Stokely, being familiar with operations of the orchestra for the last two years, will make a fine successor," said McGee. Stokely, he continued, has worked in the orchestra's financial campaigns for two years.

Broadcasts Started

Through Stokely's efforts the Oklahoma City Symphony broadcast 13 world concerts last season. This season, the series was extended to 26 weeks, and the concerts lengthened from half hour to full hour broadcasts.

Judd, 36, is joining his brother, William, vice-president of Columbia Concerts. He is the son of the business manager of the Boston Symphony, and a graduate of Harvard University. He is a navy veteran, having in Germany [illegible] for Stalag Luft [illegible], and was stationed at Bad Orb under Mussolini, when he met the 1948-49 symphony president, Rev. W. H. Alexander, who recommended him as business manager.

This Clipping From
CRESSET
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MAR - 1951

RECENT RECORDINGS

GIUSEPPE VERDI. Quartet in E Minor. The Paganini Quartet.—This fine composition is played in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Verdi's death. It was written in 1874 for the composer's own amusement. Verdi permitted one private performance but subsequently refused to let the work be played in public. RCA Victor WDM-1469.

HECTOR BERLIOZ. Beatrice and Benedict Overture. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Münch.—A virile reading of a melodically barren but brilliantly scored composition. RCA Victor 49-3078.

FRANCESCO CILÈA. Lamento di Federico: È la solita storia, from L'Arlésiana. GAETANO DONIZETTI. Una furtiva lagrima, from The Elixir of Love. Jussi Bjoerling, tenor, with an orchestra under Nils Grevillius.—This recording was made in Sweden. Bjoerling has one of the great voices of the present time. RCA Victor 49-3086.

JULES MASSENET. Élégie. REYNALDO HAHN. Les Cygnes. Gladys Swarthout, mezzo-soprano, with Gibner King at the piano. Leonard Rose plays the 'cello obbligato in Massenet's composition.—These excellent recordings will give much pleasure to many. RCA VICTOR 49-3042.

NICCOLÒ PAGANINI. La Campanella, from Second Concerto, Op. 7. Moto Perpetuo. Played by the thirty-four violins of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler.—Superb recording. RCA Victor 49-3077.

IRVING BERLIN. You're Just in Love, from Call Me Madam. It's a Lovely Day Today, from the same production. Risë Stevens, mezzo-soprano, and Robert Merrill, baritone, with the RCA Victor Orchestra under Ted Dale.—The singing is acceptable, but the music represents Berlin at his worst. RCA Victor 49-3108.

JOSEPH HAYDN. Toy Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.—A fine recording of a tuneful work which Haydn wrote for the little ones. RCA Victor 49-3013.

[355]

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the violin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. Is it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, and the Fifth is an obviously a tortured fin de siecle meditation on episodes in the life of an artist as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This is one of the topsy-turvy weeks at Symphony Hall when the Thursday and Friday concerts exchange places. In other words, since the Orchestra is playing in Washington this evening, at a special concert in honor of President Auriol of France, the Saturday concert was put ahead to Thursday evening and became, to use the old terminology, the public rehearsal, while that of yesterday afternoon was the "concert." And since Mr. Munch is conducting in Washington, Richard Burgin took over his duties at home.

The current program, which may now be spoken of in the past tense, consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for violin, violoncello, oboe and bassoon, and the Fifth Symphony by Mahler. Haydn's work had not been played before at the Symphony Concerts, though there was a performance by the Conservatory Orchestra at Jordan Hall some three seasons ago. The soloists yesterday were Alfred Krips, Samuel Mayes, Ralph Gomberg and Raymond Allard.

Stylistically this is a curious piece. Since it was composed in London in 1792 we might expect it to sound like the London Symphonies of that period, but it does not. It lacks their earthy, jolly qualities. A deal of it might pass for Mozart, since the music is cast in the conventional idiom of the time, while the concerted style makes it suggest the concerto grosso of an earlier day. Even if not of the Haydn whom we love best, this is charming music and written most deftly for the four soloists, if not in a way to exploit the fullest possibilities of each instrument. The four virtuosi acquitted themselves handsomely and the whole performance was a joy to hear.

Would that as much might be said of the Mahler Symphony. Frankly, the work did not make the impression that it did when Mr. Burgin conducted it in November, 1948, when he quite outdid himself and the symphony seemed a veritable masterpiece. Was it because that was then Koussevitzky's orchestra, possessed of the fabulous and fabled tone? Or was it because Mr. Munch required some of the rehearsal time for his French-American program in Washington? Or was it because the piece itself has turned a corner and suddenly lost its virtue? One was conscious yesterday, not so much of the music's eloquence, as of its banality, bathos, bombast and bluster. This observation applies particularly to the first two divisions, the rather commonplace funeral march (as it seemed yesterday) and the stormy section it encircles. The scherzo went its lengthy way, conveying often an impression of forced gayety. The sentimental Adagietto seemed almost insipid, with only the extraordinary Rondo finale redeeming the whole. And even here the orchestral tone was unduly coarse. However, this movement aroused the audience to a state of excitement, comparable to that found in the music itself.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 31 1951

HUB SYMPHONY BEQUEATHED PRIZE VIOLIN

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Saturday (AP) — A violin that had been in a Providence family for 156 years has been bequeathed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the terms of a will of Miss Hope Vinton, filed in Providence Probate Court yesterday.

Miss Vinton, who died Sunday, provided that a Maline violin which had belonged to her late father, Dr. Frederick A. Vinton, for 76 years and been in her family for 75 years before that should go to the Boston orchestra in memory of her father.

The will provides that one third of the residue of the estate be used to set up a trust fund for students of the University of Vermont who show proficiency in Latin and Greek. The estate is estimated at $8000.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the voilin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. In it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, and the Fifth is an obviously a tortured fin de siecle meditation on episodes in the life of an artist as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,'' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a special program in Washington, D. C., tonight for President Vincent Auriol of the French Republic, the Symphony Hall evening concert was advanced to Thursday, and the afternoon one played as usual on Friday. The program consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante in B-flat, Op. 84, and the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Both scores went beautifully yesterday afternoon, prompting the reflection that if Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, is affectionately known as "Le beau Charles," Mr. Burgin equally deserves to be called "Le bon homme Richard." Haydn's work, a product of 1792 and first performed in London, is something between the symphonies of his finest period, and the old-fashioned concerto grosso. There is a "concertina," or solo group of oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, contrasted against the small string orchestra.

One single word applies to the Sinfonie Concertante, and that is "lovely." The writing is without a blemish, the general atmosphere serene and sunny. The solo instruments, collectively and in a few places alone, weave characteristic and radiant Haydn melodies against the rich background of massed strings. For some reason, this work had never been performed previously at these concerts. Now that it has been introduced, let us hope it will become a familiar friend.

One of the many admirable aspects of Mr. Burgin's musicianship is his delight in the music of Mahler. The old arguments about the total worth of that emotionally tormented composer will persist always, and they come to the fore every time one of his major scores, like the C-sharp minor Symphony, is played. The dark tunnels of gloom, the profusion of somewhat overripe tunes, the fanfares, the marches, the eternal repetitions, cause some listeners to regard Mahler's music as from the wrong side of the tonal track.

But no amount of argument will ever solve those problems. Either you take Mahler whole, or in part, or you reject him altogether, which last is purist folly. Like the egg (I think it was Mark Twain's) that was good in parts, much of Mahler is good, and some of it is among the great, immortal pages of eternity. You find some of those in the Fifth Symphony: much of the sturmisch bewegt section, some of the rondo, all of the adagietto and portions of the rondo finale.

As for Mahler's extreme length, that, too, is a problem never to be solved. The best prescription is to sit quietly and patiently and enjoy what appeals to you, always in the hope that each hearing will bring new and increased delight. You can cut Mahler, but that is merely an evasion, and it is better, as in this week's performances, to accept it entire, and let the tissues of the sitting anatomy protest as they may. After all, a glimpse of eternity is worth the trouble it takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensity. The orchestra played superbly all the way, sounding rich and deep and grand. Mr. Burgin generously shared the applause with trumpeter Volsin and hornist Stagliano, as, at the end of the Haydn, he had done with Messrs. Krips, Mayes, Gomberg and Allard of the "concertino."

Heard at Symphony Hall

Burgin Program Includes Haydn Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, D.C., tonight. They are giving a special concert in Constitution Hall honoring President Vincent Auriol of France, now on a brief visit to the United States. The order of the Symphony Hall concerts this week was therefore changed so the orchestra could accept the invitation. These concerts took place Thursday evening and Friday afternoon under the direction of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor.

On Thursday evening Mr. Burgin gave the Mahler Fifth Symphony a compelling reading, but yesterday afternoon the performance was far more than that—it was exciting and brilliant. It is generally known that Mr. Burgin is an ardent Mahlerite; he possesses one of the famous gold medals awarded by the Bruckner Society to those who have supported Mahler's cause. There may be areas in which Mahler still needs promoting, but in Boston (judging from the ovation yesterday) Mahler has reached a state of popularity. This is due in no small part to Mr. Burgin's devoted efforts.

* * *

But the Mahler Fifth, heard here on at least ten occasions since it was written in 1902, is also a work of much popular appeal. There is the nobility of the opening funeral march, for instance, with its clarion trumpet calls, its stately serenity broken by moments of agitation. The vehement second section of Part I, filled with Sturm und Drang, sustains the listener's interest by lightening changes of mood and a strong development of the materials.

Then comes the lilting waltz of Part II—the Scherzo—as adroit and appealing as Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" waltzes. But since Mahler's waltz preceded Strauss's by nine years, it is Strauss who is reminiscent.

The post-Wagnerian orchestration, to which Mahler brought a greater degree of subtlety and refinement than his contemporaries, has a lushness that goes well with the swing of three-quarter time. There is humor in the waltz's frippery beginning, reverie in its evanescent pizzicato passages, and breathtaking excitement in its close. There were moments, it is true, when the mass of details tended to blur, but Mr. Burgin successfully sustained the flow of the line and the whirling momentum.

And what is more ineffable than a sensitive performance of the Adagietto in Part III? It is a gentle mood, heightened by sighing suspensions, by harmonies of protean iridescence, by silken strings and a languid harp. In the Rondo-Finale we return to the rapid changes of instrumental color, the saucy outbursts from the percussion, the buoyant velocity that mounts to a dizzy crescendo. Small wonder that cries of bravo were heard as soon as Mr. Burgin finished the final six gigantic chords!

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened his program with Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe, and Bassoon, Opus 84. It was the only other number played and was heard in its first performance at these concerts.

The concertino, which alternated with the orchestral tutti, was comprised of Alfred Krips, violinist; Samuel Mayes, cellist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Raymond Allard, bassoonist. Written for Salomon's London concerts, it is imbued with the high style and elegance of the classical period.

The ensemble and balance maintained by the soloists yesterday was superior to that displayed the night before. There were times, however, when the oboe was not clearly heard. The violin part carried by Mr. Krips, who is the assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, carries the burden of the solo work. He gave an eloquent reading in both performances.

SPECIAL CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

In honor of His Excellency

VINCENT AURIOL

President of the French Republic

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1951, at 8:30 P.M.
Constitution Hall, Washington

[redacted]

[256]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the voilin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. In it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, the Fifth is an obviously a tured fin de siecle meditation episodes in the life of an art as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's "Emperor," Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a special program in Washington, D. C., tonight for President Vincent Auriol of the French Republic, the Symphony Hall evening concert was advanced to Thursday, and the afternoon one played as usual on Friday. The program consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante in B-flat, Op. 84, and the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Both scores went beautifully yesterday afternoon, prompting the reflection that if Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, is affectionately known as "Le beau Charles," Mr. Burgin equally deserves to be called "Le bon homme Richard." Haydn's work, a product of 1792 and first performed in London, is something between the symphonies of his finest period, and the old-fashioned concerto grosso. There is a "concertina," or solo group of oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, contrasted against the small string orchestra.

One single word applies to the Sinfonie Concertante, and that is "lovely." The writing is without a blemish, the general atmosphere serene and sunny. The solo instruments, collectively and in a few places alone, weave characteristic and radiant Haydn melodies against the rich background of massed strings. For some reason, this work had never been performed previously at these concerts. Now that it has been introduced, let us hope it will become a familiar friend.

One of the many admirable aspects of Mr. Burgin's musicianship is his delight in the music of Mahler. The old arguments about the total worth of that emotionally tormented composer will persist always, and they come to the fore every time one of his major scores, like the C-sharp minor Symphony, is played. The dark tunnels of gloom, the profusion of somewhat overripe tunes, the fanfares, the marches, the eternal repetitions, cause some listeners to regard Mahler's music as from the wrong side of the tonal track.

But no amount of argument will ever solve those problems. Either you take Mahler whole, or in part, or you reject him altogether, which last is purist folly. Like the egg (I think it was Mark Twain's) that was good in parts, much of Mahler is good, and some of it is among the great, immortal pages of eternity. You find some of those in the Fifth Symphony: much of the sturmisch bewegt section, some of the rondo, all of the adagietto and portions of the rondo finale.

As for Mahler's extreme length, that, too, is a problem never to be solved. The best prescription is to sit quietly and patiently and enjoy what appeals to you, always in the hope that each hearing will bring new and increased delight. You can cut Mahler, but that is merely an evasion, and it is better, as in this week's performances, to accept it entire, and let the tissues of the sitting anatomy protest as they may. After all, a glimpse of eternity is worth the trouble it takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensity. The orchestra played superbly all the way, sounding rich and deep and grand. Mr. Burgin generously shared the applause with trumpeter Volsin and hornist Stagliano, as, at the end of the Haydn, he had done with Messrs. Krips, Mayes, Gomberg and Allard of the "concertino."

MARCH 31, 1951

Heard at Symphony Hall

Burgin Program Includes Haydn Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, D.C., tonight. They are giving a special concert in Constitution Hall honoring President Vincent Auriol of France, now on a brief visit to the United States. The order of the Symphony Hall concerts this week was therefore changed so the orchestra could accept the invitation. These concerts took place Thursday evening and Friday afternoon under the direction of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor.

On Thursday evening Mr. Burgin gave the Mahler Fifth Symphony a compelling reading, but yesterday afternoon the performance was far more than that—it was exciting and brilliant. It is generally known that Mr. Burgin is an ardent Mahlerite; he possesses one of the famous gold medals awarded by the Bruckner Society to those who have supported Mahler's cause. There may be areas in which Mahler still needs promoting, but in Boston (judging from the ovation yesterday) Mahler has reached a state of popularity. This is due in no small part to Mr. Burgin's devoted efforts.

* * *

But the Mahler Fifth, heard here on at least ten occasions since it was written in 1902, is also a work of much popular appeal. There is the nobility of the opening funeral march, for instance, with its clarion trumpet calls, its stately serenity broken by moments of agitation. The vehement second section of Part I, filled with Sturm und Drang, sustains the listener's interest by lightening changes of mood and a strong development of the materials.

Then comes the lilting waltz of Part II—the Scherzo—as adroit and appealing as Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" waltzes. But since Mahler's waltz preceded Strauss's by nine years, it is Strauss who is reminiscent.

The post-Wagnerian orchestration, to which Mahler brought a greater degree of subtlety and refinement than his contemporaries, has a lushness that goes well with the swing of three-quarter time. There is humor in the waltz's trippery beginning, reverie in its evanescent pizzicato passages, and breathtaking excitement in its close. There were moments, it is true, when the mass of details tended to blur, but Mr. Burgin successfully sustained the flow of the line and the whirling momentum.

And what is more ineffable than a sensitive performance of the Adagietto in Part III? It is a gentle mood, heightened by sighing suspensions, by harmonies of protean iridescence, by silken strings and a languid harp. In the Rondo-Finale we return to the rapid changes of instrumental color, the saucy outbursts from the percussion, the buoyant velocity that mounts to a dizzy crescendo. Small wonder that cries of bravo were heard as soon as Mr. Burgin finished the final six gigantic chords!

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened his program with Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe, and Bassoon, Opus 84. It was the only other number played and was heard in its first performance at these concerts.

The concertino, which alternated with the orchestral tutti, was comprised of Alfred Krips, violinist; Samuel Mayes, cellist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Raymond Allard, bassoonist. Written for Salomon's London concerts, it is imbued with the high style and elegance of the classical period.

The ensemble and balance maintained by the soloists yesterday was superior to that displayed the night before. There were times, however, when the oboe was not clearly heard. The violin part carried by Mr. Krips, who is the assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, carries the burden of the solo work. He gave an eloquent reading in both performances.

SPECIAL CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

In honor of His Excellency

VINCENT AURIOL

President of the French Republic

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1951, at 8:30 P.M.
Constitution Hall, Washington

[redacted]

[256]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

of programmatic significance, the Fifth is an obviously a tured fin de siecle meditation episodes in the life of an art as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensi

MARCH 31, 1951

Heard at Symphony Hall

Burgin Program Includes Haydn Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, D.C., tonight. They are giving a special concert in Constitution Hall honoring President Vincent Auriol of France, now on a brief visit to the United States. The order of the Symphony Hall concerts this week was therefore changed so the orchestra could accept the invitation. These concerts took place Thursday evening and Friday afternoon under the direction of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor.

On Thursday evening Mr. Burgin gave the Mahler Fifth Symphony a compelling reading, but yesterday afternoon the performance was far more than that—it was exciting and brilliant. It is generally known that Mr. Burgin is an ardent Mahlerite; he possesses one of the famous gold medals awarded by the Bruckner Society to those who have supported Mahler's cause. There may be areas in which Mahler still needs promoting, but in Boston (judging from the ovation yesterday) Mahler has reached a state of popularity. This is due in no small part to Mr. Burgin's devoted efforts.

* * *

But the Mahler Fifth, heard here on at least ten occasions since it was written in 1902, is also a work of much popular appeal. There is the nobility of the opening funeral march, for instance, with its clarion trumpet calls, its stately serenity broken by moments of agitation. The vehement second section of Part I, filled with Sturm und Drang, sustains the listener's interest by lightening changes of mood and a strong development of the materials.

Then comes the lilting waltz of Part II—the Scherzo—as adroit and appealing as Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" waltzes. But since Mahler's waltz preceded Strauss's by nine years, it is Strauss who is reminiscent.

The post-Wagnerian orchestration, to which Mahler brought a greater degree of subtlety and refinement than his contemporaries, has a lushness that goes well with the swing of three-quarter time. There is humor in the waltz's frippery beginning, reverie in its evanescent pizzicato passages, and breathtaking excitement in its close. There were moments, it is true, when the mass of details tended to blur, but Mr. Burgin successfully sustained the flow of the line and the whirling momentum.

And what is more ineffable than a sensitive performance of the Adagietto in Part III? It is a gentle mood, heightened by sighing suspensions, by harmonies of protean iridescence, by silken strings and a languid harp. In the Rondo-Finale we return to the rapid changes of instrumental color, the saucy outbursts from the percussion, the buoyant velocity that mounts to a dizzy crescendo. Small wonder that cries of bravo were heard as soon as Mr. Burgin finished the final six gigantic chords!

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened his program with Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe, and Bassoon, Opus 84. It was the only other number played and was heard in its first performance at these concerts.

The concertino, which alternated with the orchestral tutti, was comprised of Alfred Krips, violinist; Samuel Mayes, cellist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Raymond Allard, bassoonist. Written for Salomon's London concerts, it is imbued with the high style and elegance of the classical period.

The ensemble and balance maintained by the soloists yesterday was superior to that displayed the night before. There were times, however, when the oboe was not clearly heard. The violin part carried by Mr. Krips, who is the assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, carries the burden of the solo work. He gave an eloquent reading in both performances.

HONORARY PATRONS

THE PRESIDENT AND MRS. TRUMAN
THE AMBASSADOR OF NORWAY AND MADAME MUNTHE DE MORGENSTIERNE
THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND MRS. ACHESON

BOX HOLDERS AND PATRONS

Mr. and Mrs. Stanley B. Adams
Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Alderman
Mrs. Margretta Stroup Austin
Mrs. Robert Low Bacon
M. and Madame Jean-Pierre Benard
The Ambassador of New Zealand and Lady Berendsen
Hon. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss
Hon. Frances Bolton
The Ambassador of France and Madame Bonnet
Doctor and Mrs. Irving Brotman
Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown
M. and Madame Louis Bruguiere
Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot
Mr. and Mrs. Earl Campbell
Hon. and Mrs. William R. Castle
Mr. and Mrs. Harold Jefferson Coolidge
Mrs. William Crozier
M. Jean Daridan
Hon. and Mrs. Charles S. Dewey
Madame Tamara Dmitrieff
The Ambassador of Israel and Mrs. Eban
The Ambassador of the Philippines, Joaquin M. Elizalde
General Paul Ely
Mrs. Reginald C. Foster
Justice and Mrs. Felix Frankfurter
The Minister of Luxembourg and Madame le Gallais
Mrs. Anne Marie Girard
Hon. and Mrs. Joseph C. Grew
Hon. and Mrs. Christian A. Herter
Mrs. Gilbert M. Hitchcock
Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Jackson
Mr. and Mrs. Seymour Jeselsohn
Mr. George E. Judd
Mr. Edward Lehman
Doctor Juan Bautista de Lavalle, Representative of Peru to the OAS
Senator and Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr.
Hon. and Mrs. John W. McCormack
Doctor and Mrs. Howard Mitchell
Madame Charles Munch
Mr. Edward Nash
Judge and Mrs. George Neilson
Hon. and Mrs. George W. Perkins
Senator and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall
Mr. and Mrs. Curt C. Schiffeler
M. and Madame Pierre-Paul Schweitzer
Hon. and Mrs. Jouett Shouse
Hon. and Mrs. John Farr Simmons
M. Pierre Siraud
Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Jack Snow
Mr. Harvey Spear
The Ambassador of Italy and Signora Tarchiani
Mr. John Thacher
M. and Madame Andre Visson
Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth
Mrs. Edwin M. Watson
Mrs. Matthew John Whittall
Hon. and Mrs. Richard Wigglesworth

La Marseillaise
The Star Spangled Banner

PROGRAM

BARBER ..... Overture, "The School for Scandal"

COPLAND ..... "Quiet City" for Trumpet, English Horn and Strings
Trumpet: ROGER VOISIN
English Horn: LOUIS SPEYER

RAVEL ..... Piano Concerto
I. Allegramente
II. Adagio assai
III. Presto

INTERMISSION

BERLIOZ ..... Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A
I. Rêveries, Passions
Largo: Allegro agitato e appassionato assai
II. Un Bal
Waltz: Allegro non troppo
III. Scène au Champs
Adagio
IV. Marche au Supplice
Allegretto non troppo
V. Songe d'une Nuit du Sabbat
Larghetto: Allegro

Soloist
NICOLE HENRIOT

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Next season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, Music Director, will give three concerts in Constitution Hall on Thursday evenings, November 15, December 6, and February 14.

Subscriptions may be renewed until May 29, when tickets will be offered to new subscribers (a minimum deposit of 20 per cent is required).

Snow Concert Bureau
1108 G St. N. W., Washington, D. C. Phone Republic 4433
(The box office will be closed July and August)

[256]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, in the 21st program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:

Sinfonie Concertante ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor ..... Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the voilin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. In it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, the Fifth is an obviously a tortured fin de siecle meditation, episodes in the life of an artist as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adiette) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto, Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a special program in Washington, D. C., tonight for President Vincent Auriol of the French Republic, the Symphony Hall evening concert was advanced to Thursday, and the afternoon one played as usual on Friday. The program consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante in B-flat, Op. 84, and the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Both scores went beautifully yesterday afternoon, prompting the reflection that if Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, is affectionately known as "Le beau Charles," Mr. Burgin equally deserves to be called "Le bon homme Richard." Haydn's work, a product of 1792 and first performed in London, is something between the symphonies of his finest period, and the old-fashioned concerto grosso. There is a "concertina," or solo group of oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, contrasted against the small string orchestra.

One single word applies to the Sinfonie Concertante, and that is "lovely." The writing is without a blemish, the general atmosphere serene and sunny. The solo instruments, collectively and in a few places alone, weave characteristic and radiant Haydn melodies against the rich background of massed strings. For some reason, this work had never been performed previously at these concerts. Now that it has been introduced, let us hope it will become a familiar friend.

One of the many admirable aspects of Mr. Burgin's musicianship is his delight in the music of Mahler. The old arguments about the total worth of that emotionally tormented composer will persist always, and they come to the fore every time one of his major scores, like the C sharp minor Symphony, is played. The dark tunnels of gloom, the profusion of somewhat overripe tunes, the fanfares, the marches, the eternal repetitions, cause some listeners to regard Mahler's music as from the wrong side of the tonal track.

But no amount of argument will ever solve those problems. Either you take Mahler whole, or in part, or you reject him altogether, which last is purist folly. Like the egg (I think it was Mark Twain's) that was good in parts, much of Mahler is good, and some of it is among the great, immortal pages of eternity. You find some of those in the Fifth Symphony; much of the sturmisch bewegt section, some of the rondo, all of the adagietto and portions of the rondo finale.

As for Mahler's extreme length, that, too, is a problem never to be solved. The best prescription is to sit quietly and patiently and enjoy what appeals to you, always in the hope that each hearing will bring new and increased delight. You can cut Mahler, but that is merely an evasion, and it is better, as in this week's performances, to accept it entire, and let the tissues of the sitting anatomy protest as they may. After all, a glimpse of eternity is worth the trouble it takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensity. The orchestra played superbly all the way, sounding rich and deep and grand. Mr. Burgin generously shared the applause with trumpeter Volsin and hornist Stagliano, as, at the end of the Haydn, he had done with Messrs. Krips, Mayes, Gomberg and Allard of the "concertino."

MARCH 31, 1951

Heard at Symphony Hall

Burgin Program Includes Haydn Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Washington, D.C., tonight. They are giving a special concert in Constitution Hall honoring President Vincent Auriol of France, now on a brief visit to the United States. The order of the Symphony Hall concerts this week was therefore changed so the orchestra could accept the invitation. These concerts took place Thursday evening and Friday afternoon under the direction of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor.

On Thursday evening Mr. Burgin gave the Mahler Fifth Symphony a compelling reading, but yesterday afternoon the performance was far more than that—it was exciting and brilliant. It is generally known that Mr. Burgin is an ardent Mahlerite; he possesses one of the famous gold medals awarded by the Bruckner Society to those who have supported Mahler's cause. There may be areas in which Mahler still needs promoting, but in Boston (judging from the ovation yesterday) Mahler has reached a state of popularity. This is due in no small part to Mr. Burgin's devoted efforts.

* * *

But the Mahler Fifth, heard here on at least ten occasions since it was written in 1902, is also a work of much popular appeal. There is the nobility of the opening funeral march, for instance, with its clarion trumpet calls, its stately serenity broken by moments of agitation. The vehement second section of Part I, filled with Sturm und Drang, sustains the listener's interest by lightening changes of mood and a strong development of the materials.

Then comes the lilting waltz of Part II—the Scherzo—as adroit and appealing as Strauss's "Rosenkavalier" waltzes. But since Mahler's waltz preceded Strauss's by nine years, it is Strauss who is reminiscent.

The post-Wagnerian orchestration, to which Mahler brought a greater degree of subtlety and refinement than his contemporaries, has a lushness that goes well with the swing of three-quarter time. There is humor in the waltz's frippery beginning, reverie in its evanescent pizzicato passages, and breathtaking excitement in its close. There were moments, it is true, when the mass of details tended to blur, but Mr. Burgin successfully sustained the flow of the line and the whirling momentum.

And what is more ineffable than a sensitive performance of the Adagietto in Part III? It is a gentle mood, heightened by sighing suspensions, by harmonies of protean iridescence, by silken strings and a languid harp. In the Rondo-Finale we return to the rapid changes of instrumental color, the saucy outbursts from the percussion, the buoyant velocity that mounts to a dizzy crescendo. Small wonder that cries of bravo were heard as soon as Mr. Burgin finished the final six gigantic chords!

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened his program with Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe, and Bassoon, Opus 84. It was the only other number played and was heard in its first performance at these concerts.

The concertino, which alternated with the orchestral tutti, was comprised of Alfred Krips, violinist; Samuel Mayes, cellist; Ralph Gomberg, oboist, and Raymond Allard, bassoonist. Written for Salomon's London concerts, it is imbued with the high style and elegance of the classical period.

The ensemble and balance maintained by the soloists yesterday was superior to that displayed the night before. There were times, however, when the oboe was not clearly heard. The violin part carried by Mr. Krips, who is the assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, carries the burden of the solo work. He gave an eloquent reading in both performances.

PASTE OVER

TRA

R

gust 12

July 22
ducting

beron";
ony.
idelio"; ARRAU);

School
phony;

umann,
Ravel,

Handel,
Strings
rgan).
Guar-
oncerto an Ex-

lemnis"

phony;
mphony

Theme

SPECIAL CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

In honor of His Excellency

VINCENT AURIOL

President of the French Republic

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1951, at 8:30 P.M.
Constitution Hall, Washington

[256]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, in its program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program, in which the soloists were Alfred Krips, violin; Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, was as follows:
Sinfonie Concertante .....Haydn
Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor .....Mahler

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THE PRACTICE of not giving our own first desk soloists an opportunity to play either solos or concerted solos in the vast but grievously neglected repertoire of the 18th and early 19th century has long been to me a source of considerable concern.

After hearing yesterday's fine performance of a truly exquisite Sinfonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon by Haydn, it will continue to be a source of concern if this sort of thing isn't done more often. I don't know when a symphony concert has had such an interesting and such a grateful opening. Yet, if it can be imagined, it was a first performance at these concerts!

Like most of the baroque concerto grossos and the sinfonia concertantes (the stylistic difference between them need not detain us here), Haydn's starts off with a vigorous tutti for the whole ensemble. Out of this develops the four solo voices, now imitating one another, now in dialogue, now in contrasting mood and now in amiable competition as the robust but always urbane movement works towards its climax in the concerted cadenza.

After an extended song-like slow movement, entirely untroubled, unpretentious and unassuming, it comes to a brisk and invigorating conclusion, having proved nothing whatever save that four solo instruments of contrasting qualities played by superb musicians against the accompaniment of a great orchestra can create a magical half hour.

SPECIAL MENTION must be made of the voilin playing of Alfred Krips, whose regular position as second concert master has never given him the opportunity to demonstrate so clearly the fastidious taste and impeccable technique of his playing, and to Samuel Mayes, 'cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. They made a quartet of brilliant attainment. And on his part, Richard Burgin conducted this music with just the proper unostentatiousness to give it a finely grained music integration. If the orchestra will look into the matter, it will find there are uncounted numbers of things every bit as good by everybody from Stamitz to Mozart, from Pergolesi to C. P. E. Bach and from Boccherini to Brahms.

After this serene introduction, the Mahler Fifth seemed a rough and turbulent ordeal indeed. I say "ordeal" in the sense of the composer's own ordeal, for despite its immense length, its anguished proclamations and its massive utterances, it is not difficult to assimilate.

The trouble with this work is that it tries to look two ways at once. In it Mahler for the first time composed a symphony without a program, which is to say he intended it to be pure music. But this was impossible for Mahler; he never wrote a note of "pure" music in his life. Everything was of programmatic significance, and the Fifth is an obviously a tortured fin de siecle meditation on episodes in the life of an artist as Berlioz' Fantastic is a romantic meditation.

IT THUS CONTRASTS moments of the sheerest beauty with raucous vulgarities, moments of sublime reflections (as in the adietto) with tawdry jingles, and moments of child-like naivete with thunderously tragic proclamations of despair. But this is Mahler anyway; this feverish compulsion to cram everything in is in all of Mahler. In the Fifth it is merely more emphatic, more intrusive, and in the end it diminishes the impact implicit in this gigantic work.

The orchestra and the two predominating soloists—Roger Voisin, trumpet, and James Stagliano, horn—were in top form, and if Mr. Burgin rather over-emphasized the harsher aspects of the work, he nonetheless conducted with great authority and devotion. The program next week offers Carpenter's Carmel Concerto. Barber's Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven's 'Emperor,' Clifford Curzon being the piano soloist.

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a special program in Washington, D. C., tonight for President Vincent Auriol of the French Republic, the Symphony Hall evening concert was advanced to Thursday, and the afternoon one played as usual on Friday. The program consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante in B-flat, Op. 84, and the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Both scores went beautifully yesterday afternoon, prompting the reflection that if Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, is affectionately known as "Le beau Charles," Mr. Burgin equally deserves to be called "Le bon homme Richard." Haydn's work, a product of 1792 and first performed in London, is something between the symphonies of his finest period, and the old-fashioned concerto grosso. There is a "concertina," or solo group of oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, contrasted against the small string orchestra.

One single word applies to the Sinfonie Concertante, and that is "lovely." The writing is without a blemish, the general atmosphere serene and sunny. The solo instruments, collectively and in a few places alone, weave characteristic and radiant Haydn melodies against the rich background of massed strings. For some reason, this work had never been performed previously at these concerts. Now that it has been introduced, let us hope it will become a familiar friend.

One of the many admirable aspects of Mr. Burgin's musicianship is his delight in the music of Mahler. The old arguments about the total worth of that emotionally tormented composer will persist always, and they come to the fore every time one of his major scores, like the C-sharp minor Symphony, is played. The dark tunnels of gloom, the profusion of somewhat overripe tunes, the fanfares, the marches, the eternal repetitions, cause some listeners to regard Mahler's music as from the wrong side of the tonal track.

But no amount of argument will ever solve those problems. Either you take Mahler whole, or in part, or you reject him altogether, which last is purist folly. Like the egg (I think it was Mark Twain's) that was good in parts, much of Mahler is good, and some of it is among the great, immortal pages of eternity. You find some of those in the Fifth Symphony: much of the sturmisch bewegt section, some of the rondo, all of the adagietto and portions of the rondo finale.

As for Mahler's extreme length, that, too, is a problem never to be solved. The best prescription is to sit quietly and patiently and enjoy what appeals to you, always in the hope that each hearing will bring new and increased delight. You can cut Mahler, but that is merely an evasion, and it is better, as in this week's performances, to accept it entire, and let the tissues of the sitting anatomy protest as they may. After all, a glimpse of eternity is worth the trouble it takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensity. The orchestra played superbly all the way, sounding rich and deep and grand. Mr. Burgin generously shared the applause with trumpeter Volsin and hornist Stagliano, as, at the end of the Haydn, he had done with Messrs. Krips, Mayes, Gomberg and Allard of the "concertino."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
MAR 31 1951

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Mahler Fifth and Haydn Score at Symphony Hall

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of this week's concerts. Since the orchestra must give a special program in Washington, D. C., tonight for President Vincent Auriol of the French Republic, the Symphony Hall evening concert was advanced to Thursday, and the afternoon one played as usual on Friday. The program consisted of Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante in B-flat, Op. 84, and the Fifth Symphony of Mahler.

Both scores went beautifully yesterday afternoon, prompting the reflection that if Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, is affectionately known as "Le beau Charles," Mr. Burgin equally deserves to be called "Le bon homme Richard." Haydn's work, a product of 1792 and first performed in London, is something between the symphonies of his finest period, and the old-fashioned concerto grosso. There is a "concertina," or solo group of oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, contrasted against the small string orchestra.

One single word applies to the Sinfonie Concertante, and that is "lovely." The writing is without a blemish, the general atmosphere serene and sunny. The solo instruments, collectively and in a few places alone, weave characteristic and radiant Haydn melodies against the rich background of massed strings. For some reason, this work had never been performed previously at these concerts. Now that it has been introduced, let us hope it will become a familiar friend.

One of the many admirable aspects of Mr. Burgin's musicianship is his delight in the music of Mahler. The old arguments about the total worth of that emotionally tormented composer will persist always, and they come to the fore every time one of his major scores, like the C-sharp minor Symphony, is played. The dark tunnels of gloom, the profusion of somewhat overripe tunes, the fanfares, the marches, the eternal repetitions, cause some listeners to regard Mahler's music as from the wrong side of the tonal track.

But no amount of argument will ever solve those problems. Either you take Mahler whole, or in part, or you reject him altogether, which last is purist folly. Like the egg (I think it was Mark Twain's) that was good in parts, much of Mahler is good, and some of it is among the great, immortal pages of eternity. You find some of those in the Fifth Symphony: much of the sturmisch bewegt section, some of the rondo, all of the adagietto and portions of the rondo finale.

As for Mahler's extreme length, that, too, is a problem never to be solved. The best prescription is to sit quietly and patiently and enjoy what appeals to you, always in the hope that each hearing will bring new and increased delight. You can cut Mahler, but that is merely an evasion, and it is better, as in this week's performances, to accept it entire, and let the tissues of the sitting anatomy protest as they may. After all, a glimpse of eternity is worth the trouble it takes to get it.

Mr. Burgin conducted Mahler with high and appropriate intensity. The orchestra played superbly all the way, sounding rich and deep and grand. Mr. Burgin generously shared the applause with trumpeter Volsin and hornist Stagliano, as, at the end of the Haydn, he had done with Messrs. Krips, Mayes, Gomberg and Allard of the "concertino."

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 1 - 1951

Two Presidents Attend Concert Of Orchestra

The President of France and Mme. Auriol and the President of the United States and Mrs. Truman shared honors last evening at a specially arranged concert. Mr. Charles Muench, famed Frenchh conductor, planned the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to honor his President and Mme. Auriol.

Mrs. Truman sat in the box with President Auriol where Vice President Barkley also was seated. Others in that box were the French Minister of Foreign Affairs Robert Schuman and Mme. Bonnet.

Sitting with President Truman were Mme. Auriol, Mrs. Barkley and French Ambassador Bonnet.

It was a brilliant audience composed of top ranking officials, diplomats and leaders in resident society.

[257]

Boston Sunday Globe - April 1, 1951

THEY BUILD CATHEDRALS

The great cathedrals of Europe seem alive with the effigies of their donors. This goes on long after the cathedral ceases to be the center of religious and cultural life. In the south transept of Westminster Abbey the verger seats an American visitor where his one foot is on the grave of Charles Dickens and his other on that of Thomas Hardy. Even as late as 1909 there was a controversy over whether to permit sepulture to George Meredith, a third great 19th-century novelist, but a little independent on the side of orthodoxy. The decision went against him, unfortunately for the Abbey, for his thought flies far and free in the living world. He lies buried in the country churchyard at Dorking.

To walk in any cathedral of England (or on the Continent) is to understand why those who gave their faith, their work and their money to these great monuments of religion—even to the country churches, for some of the English village churches are among the most beautiful small buildings on earth—want their bodies to lie close to where their souls had aspired.

And why not? Overhead in the twin towers, as at York and Lincoln Minster, the Abbey, and in Notre Dame de Paris, sound the solemn and sonorous music of the bells, through chancel, transept, nave and aisles, under their soaring vaults and groin vaults, roll the harmonious thunders of the great organ as choir answers choir in antiphony from end to end of chancel and nave. And when this music has ceased, in Summer sounds Nature's music, the wind rustling in the ivies entwined amongst the mullions of the open casements of stained glass, and amongst the winds and the ivies the soft, constant twitter of bird music.

All these are the friends of music and religion, and amongst them for centuries after centuries have the friends of music and religion wished to be buried in order that long after the death of their bodies their spirits may still partake of the ingredients of what most they loved on earth.

* * *

In every epoch communities will find a way to make beautiful the artistic symbol of that which it treasures closest to its heart. This is why the New England village churches of the 18th, 19th and a few of the 17th century are now considered such gems of the village carpenter's (really architect's) art. In some ages in Europe, working for a community like Chartres, architects and craftsmen of stained glass were the great creators of their time and their art was wrought to "give glory to God," there, then and now.

Today this enthusiasm has taken, or been forced to take, equally familiar but seemingly more secular forms. One is our American system of education. In the very trough of our financial depression, about 1931, it was announced that the annual donations to our schools, colleges, universities and other forms of education had not diminished; nearly everything else had fallen off, but not that.

Another form of cultural education which, so far from falling off in the past 30 years, has dramatically increased is music. As our social systems change through the centuries, and of late through even the decades, our cherished arts have had to find financial sustainment. The big independent universities, and the many independent colleges of this country, are feeling this necessity and looking for ways to meet the need.

* * *

Since 1900, even since 1920, the growth of our love and appreciation in this country of some of the greatest music is an almost incredible record. Musically you would hardly know we were the same people in 1920 that we are in 1951. In the earlier years if you wanted music in small towns, you had to make it yourself. "Amateur orchestras," "friends of music," and the few great orchestras had to be sustained, in large part, by one or many wealthy donors who wanted others to share their delight, plus the ticket sales to the multitude. In those days—1900 to 1914—a concert-goer often felt a pang of conscience: "Only a few hundred can hear this music, both because of limited space and limited money; but everybody ought to hear it."

Today, in some form or another, everybody can hear it. In order to make this possible, a shift to a new form of economic support had to be found, and has been found, modestly, quietly, gradually, but among the first, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Wealthy donors have ceased to be able in full to take up the annual deficits of these not-yet-entirely self-sustaining cultural instruments. An appeal has been made annually to what is vaguely called the middle class, and the middle class, both here and elsewhere, has answered and borne a large share of the annual deficit. Neither is our Orchestra any "respecter of persons." The same appeal is made at Tanglewood for the Berkshire Music Center, almost in the same words, a phrase natural to what it describes: "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." These are practically admitted to the inner councils of the institution which so largely they help to sustain. A report is made annually by the chairman of the board of trustees at a meeting of the "Friends," which this year is held at 4 p. m., next Wednesday, April 4. The report is read, often it contains hitherto confidential news of future developments; the orchestra then plays a short concert, and the rest is social.

* * *

It has been said in scriptural language that our Orchestra is "no respecter of persons," meaning that it is outright equalitarian. The dimes, nickels and quarters dropped into the slot box after the Esplanade concerts (which are free to all comers) are as welcome as the dollars: even as in the epoch of cathedral-building, the craftsmanship of stone workers and stained glass makers was of equal importance with the gifts from wealthy donors.

Today our "orchestra cities," which in these United States number scores, are spoken of as were, and are, the "cathedral cities" of England and the Continent. And they say to all classes: "If you want these great works performed by resident orchestras in your own town or city, there is an extra fee, due according to voluntary ability to give."

For "Friends of the Orchestra" is a new phrase, expressive of a new sociological phase, upon which most of our free cultural institutions are entering—the voluntary sustainment by all the people of those things which make life in a democracy worth living. It was all expressed in a terse epigram by one of our greatest modern thinkers. He had said that there was no doubt we were entering on a new epoch in this century. Then,

—"The only question is whether the equality of man shall be achieved at a low level or at a high level."

UNCLE DUDLEY.

[255]

This Clipping From WASHINGTON, D. C. TIMES-HERALD

APR 1 - 1951

Presidential Boxes Decorated With Flags of Two Nations

By ACHSAH DORSEY SMITH

OUTPROTOCOLING all of the social events on last evening's party parade was the concert at Constitution hall, with the Presidents of two great nations and their wives leading the long list of dignitaries from many lands. And a sellout audience heard French-born Charles Munch conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in honor of the President of the Republic of France and Mme. Auriol.

ACHSAH

Host to the Auriols were President and Mrs. Truman. The two Presidential boxes side by side were draped with the tricolor of La Belle France and the Stars and Stripes. Adding to the brilliance of the historic occasion (beauty and high fashion were galore) were fine French and American melodies for the program was half and half.

Before M. Munch raised his baton at 8:30 p.m. and "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the "Marseillaise" brought the audience to its feet, Presidents Auriol and Truman and their "First Ladies" had greeted conductor Munch backstage and posed for a battery of photographers.

It was the second meeting of the French leader and M. Munch, for they had first shaken hands at the huge and colorful reception which the Auriols arranged to compliment the Trumans Friday evening at the handsome French embassy.

President Auriol, like the top U.S. Executive, is a music lover. Whereas Mr. Truman's forte is the piano, M. Auriol is a student of the violin. Especially for his excellency was Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, for the French composer is one of his favorites. Ravel was also rendered. On the American side of the program came Copeland and Barber.

Mlle. Nicole Henriot, petite French pianist, was guest soloist. During World War II she was active in the French resistance movement. Both the President and Mme. Auriol won high honor for their part in that era.

Seated with President Truman were Mme. Auriol, Mrs. Barkley, and Ambassador Bonnet of France. In the adjoining box were President Auriol, Mrs. Truman, Vice President Barkley, Mme. Bonnet and Robert Schuman, French minister of foreign affairs.

Mme. Auriol led French fashions last evening in her divinely draped white jersey gown by designer Gres with its flowing Grecian lines.

Large French Group Has Place of Honor

THE French embassy itself had four boxes. The group included Gen. Paul Grossin, military secretary general to President Auriol; Jacques Dumaine, chief of protocol; Paul Auriol, assistant secretary-general and son of the presidential couple; Jacques Kosciusko-Morizet, director of the office of the French Republic; and Bernard Beck, counselor of the French ministry of foreign affairs.

Jean Daridan, minister counselor of the French embassy, was also spied, as were French Gen. and Mme. Ely, the financial counselor and Mme. Schwitzer and the other members of the embassy staff. One of the French boxes was turned over to U. S. servicemen.

Whereas Mme. Bonnet was dressed by Dior in chic perfection, Mme. Benard, wife of the French first secretary, wore a stunning Balenciaga creation of white jersey. Those with the Benards in their box included the Mexican ambassador to the O.A.S. and Senora de Quintanilla. Later in the evening the popular French couple entertained a small group of friends at supper at their home.

Achesons Attend With House Guests

Boxholders in the Cabinet line-up included the Secretary of State and Mrs. Acheson, who had with them their house guests, the Ambassador to France and Mrs. David K. E. Bruce. The Italian Ambassador and Signora Tarchiani were among those from Embassy Row, including Lady Berendsen, wife of the New Zealand ambassador; and Ambassador Elizalde of the Philippines. Visiting her father this week end from New York is Mlle. Cecilia Elizalde.

Seen with Ambassador of Israel and Mme. Eban were the Counselor and Mme. Keren and Mlle. Esther Herlitz, the first secretary. Dr. Juan Bautista de Lavalle, Peruvian ambassador to the O.A.S., was another in the "box brigade."

With the Luxembourg Minister and titian-haired Mme. LeGallais were Col. M. [illegible] and [illegible] Kelly. The foursome had dined together at the Luxembourg legation. Particularly eye-catching was Mme. LeGallais' gown of black topped by a torso-length oriental brocade jacket gleaming with gold and soft-toned pink, blue and lavender flowers.

Paresces Accompany Charles Mechams

REP. Frances Bolton had turned her box over to Maj. and Mrs. Charles Meeham and accompanying them were the press counselor of the Italian embassy and Signora Paresce. The latter is the daughter of Marconi, the noted inventor of the wireless. Mrs. Meeham is the former Countess di Nogarole of the well known Italian family.

Boxed with First Secretary Manger of the Norwegian embassy were Mr. and Mrs. Frank Redliker, Mrs. Thomas Richard Cowell and Mrs. George R. Holmes. The Economic Co-operation Administrator and Mrs. Foster were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Jouett Shouse for dinner and in their box. Mrs. Shouse returned Friday from Beaufort, S. C.

Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, just back from New York, was hostess to a group of friends at cocktails and buffet supper before going on to the concert. Ambassador Nabuco of Brazil and the Minister of the same embassy and Mme. Mello-Franco were with Dr. and Mrs. Irving Brotman.

The State of Massachusetts was well represented in the formal function's "dian ond horseshoe" with Se.. and Mrs. Saltonstall, Sen. and Mrs. Lodge and Rep. and Mrs. McCormack and Thomas Dudley Cabot, director of international security affairs, and Mrs. Cabot among those listed.

The Chief of Protocol and Mrs. Simmons had also taken a box, as had former Ambassador and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, and Associate Justice and Mrs. Frankfurter. Mrs. Edwin M. Watson and the Harold J. Coolidges were others. The latter couple dined with Mr. and Mrs. Andre Visson and their house guests, Mr. and Mrs. George K. Livermore of New York and Lenox, Mass.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew J. Snow had invited French opera star Lily Pons and her conductor-husband, Andre Kostelanetz, to add glamor to their box, while still others with guests included the Conductor of the National Symphony orchestra and Mrs. Mitchell and Judge and Mrs. George D. Neilson.

Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs and Mrs. Perkins were among the many more glimpsed, such as Rep. and Mrs. Wigglesworth, and the Eliot Wadsworths.

Auriols Spend Today Resting, Sightseeing

THERE are few free hours in any "24" for such personages as presidents, although the Auriols are slated to spend today resting and sightseeing. Originally a week end at a near-by Virginia estate had been planned for them.

For instance, yesterday at 5 p.m. they entertained at a reception for at least 600 guests at the French embassy, with the group including members of the Alliance Francaise, French and Americans who have done notable relief work for France, some members of the D. C. French government colony as well as officers and crew of the cruiser Jeanne D'Arc.

In the fashion focus again, Mme. Auriol smiled welcome in a two-piece gray lace beaded in embroidery by Dior. The same designer was also responsible for Mme. Bonnet's simple black and white polka-dot dress.

At the luncheon hour, Prospect house was the meeting spot for the Auriols and a private party luncheon. Earlier, the French "prexy" had laid a wreath at the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon and another at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington. Then he addressed a special session at the Pan American Union of the delegates to the current conference of the American foreign ministers.

N Y Times Apr. 1 '51

MUSIC

FINANCIAL WOES

Musical Organizations of America Face Critical Times and Need Help

By OLIN DOWNES

OUR leading American symphony orchestras and opera companies are facing critical financial years. The expenses of these organizations increase steadily and swiftly. The income is much less than the outgo. There are varying degrees of distress, reports of mounting costs and deficits coming from all quarters of the compass.

It is a situation which cannot be ignored and which must be met in ways different from those of the past. The historical development of our orchestras has been based upon the principle or understanding that individuals of wealth and of public spirit, manifested in America in a degree unparalleled by any other country of the world, have met deficits of operation from their own pockets. At the same time, no expense has been spared to obtain the finest possible quality of performance.

But the changing economic situation, the proportion of taxation, Federal and state, to income, the constantly increasing costs of operation, make impossible the benefactions of what we can only look upon today as the romantic past of concert and opera production in this nation. Other recent developments have increased the tension, such as the greatly diminished returns from broadcasting. Very few orchestras are now on the air at all and fewer of these have presently the benefit of advertising sponsorship.

Various forms of Federal, state and municipal aid or subsidy have been widely discussed and in isolated instances attempted. In San Francisco, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Louisville various degrees and kinds of municipal assistance have been instituted.

A small percentage of city taxes has been donated to some orchestras in exchange for a given number of performances for the municipality. Or a fixed sum has been received annually for the orchestra's war chest. New York might well entertain some of these ideas.

This writer believes that the day inevitably must come when we have both Federal and state support for music. But that day lies ahead in an indiscernible future. There is something else which can and should be done quickly to meet at least partly the present situation.

Relief Needed

Relief from the Federal admissions tax, we are informed, would have almost balanced the Metropolitan's deficit as of the present season. It would be of commensurate relief to our symphonic organizations, all of which can be classed as non-profit charitable activities. And it would be a degree of logical recognition of the incalculable services that these institutions render to our people, of especial value in these days of such anxiety and concern to the nation.

In this connection words from the address that Floyd G. Blair, president of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, made on March 7 to the Ways and Means Committee of the House recounting the steps by which the admissions tax was first imposed in war years, then doubled to the rate today, are instructive.

I am president and treasurer of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York. In my private capacity I am vice president of the National City Bank of New York. I am here to discuss the impact of the Federal Admissions Tax of 20 per cent on charitable, non-profit organizations such as symphony orchestras and the opera. * * *

You will all recall what happened at the last session of the Congress. You approved an amendment to the Revenue Act restoring our exemption. The House of Representatives passed the bill, but before the Senate acted war broke out in Korea. The bill as passed by the Senate dropped the exemption. We hoped that it would be put back in conference, but that hope was not realized. We therefore find ourselves in the same deplorable situation that we have been in since Secretary Morgenthau persuaded this committee and the Congress to subject these charitable, non-profit organizations to the tax. This was first done in 1941. The tax was doubled in 1943, Secretary Morgenthau giving his solemn undertaking that the tax would be removed six months after the end of the war.

I am sure you all know that Congressman Morano of Connecticut on Feb. 8 introduced a bill (H. R. 2524) which was referred to this committee specifically providing for exemption from the admissions tax of symphony orchestras and the opera. Congressman Celler introduced a similar bill referring, I believe, solely to the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Congressman Klein has also introduced a bill (H. R. 2893) referred to this committee providing for the establishment of the Office of Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Fine Arts, which contains a provision restoring to us our former exemption.

Sound Finance

Gentlemen, without going into personal details, I assure you that no one of you is more deeply concerned than I to see that the finances of our Government are kept on a sound basis, that serious inflation is avoided and that the value of the dollar is maintained * * * I have filed with the committee a condensed budget of our own orchestra which I trust is before each one of you. As explained, this may be taken as representative of the twenty-eight leading symphony societies, though our position is better than that of most. There are also probably twenty to twenty-five minor symphony orchestras in the country which are in a relatively much worse position. Beyond them come perhaps 600 school, semi-professional and amateur orchestras scattered across the country, mostly in smaller communities. These are made up of sixty to 100 players who, with their families, represent a cross-section of American life at its best.

In addition to these orchestras there are probably more than 2,000 community and civic concert groups operating all over the country. Series of concerts are organized and our best artists are brought before audiences in cities and towns spread from north to south and east to west.

The audiences that sit in these concert halls number many millions. The radio audience adds millions more, probably more than 10,000,000 people listening to our Sunday broadcast alone. Beyond that millions of recordings of our great orchestras are sold each year and are played at home and on the air over and over again.

Now, what does this mean to the American people? Is it really important that it continue? Is it something that in times of stress and worry, people had better do without? Is it something we should deny our youth? Is it something which should be grouped with movies and perhaps night clubs, or is it part of our cultural education, something that touches the soul, something which, with many, approaches the realm of religion?

It may well be asked, in these days when, by common consent, astronomical sums are necessarily expended in national defense, if it is not also essential to defend the artistic inheritance of the nation? Our music, which, in its symphonic and operatic aspects, is unrivaled in quality of performance and extent of repertory in the world, is utterly essential to our spiritual security and well-being.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 1 - 1951

Postlude

Auriols and Trumans Guests At Boston Symphony Concert

By Paul Hume

The President of France and Madame Auriol and President and Mrs. Truman were guests last night at a special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

Charles Munch, the famous French conductor, now musical director of the Boston Symphony, led the program in which Nicole Henriot, young French pianist, was soloist. It was the second time in a few weeks that this combination of musicians appeared together in Washington.

The program was precisely balanced between American and French music. Samuel Barber's overture for the School for Scandal opened the concert. It was followed by Aaron Copland's tone poem, The Quiet City. These two scores are among the finest American works of our time.

From France we heard Ravel's G Major Piano Concerto, and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

The Ravel was a remarkably happy choice. While thoroughly Gallic in essence, it is the most strongly influenced by American jazz of all of Ravel's music. It was equally happy as a concerto tailored to Miss Henriot's remarkable talents.

She has unerring accuracy in the fleetest passages, and a powerful rhythmic sense. These combined to bring her a tremendous ovation at the close of the concerto. Sharing the applause with Munch and the orchestra, Miss Henriot was obliged finally to repeat the closing movement of the work before she was allowed to retire.

The orchestra gave her the most polished, expert support at every moment in the Ravel. As a piece of music to which she might well have been born, the work gave her moments none of which she missed. Had her tone in the extended solo opening the second movement been more legato and gentle, the entire effect would have been beyond praise.

To the American music at the beginning of the evening, Munch and the orchestra brought the best of subtlety and wit in the Barber, and a mood of sustained revery in the Copland that exhibited its unique though simple beauties. Roger Voisin's trumpet and the English horn of Louis Speyer made the solo lines notable.

We admire Munch for his interest in, and service to our contemporary composers.

To close the concert with the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony was, for Charles Munch, the occasion to display once again his rare talents for breathing fire into a problematic composition. The tension and restless motion he showed in its first two movements is of a part with the fevered program Berlioz provided for his score; even so, it was often a contradiction of the musical directions.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 1 1951

AURIOL JOINS TRUMAN AT CONCERT

WASHINGTON, March 31 (UP) — Pres. Vincent Auriol of France joined Pres. Truman Saturday night to hear a concert in his honor by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Constitution hall.

The French president, who was given a prolonged ovation upon entering and leaving the auditorium, appeared to enjoy the program which included two works by French composers — Ravel's "Piano Concerto" and Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

The Boston symphony is directed by French-born Charles Munch.

Auriol was particularly delighted with the rendition of the Ravel piece by French piano soloist, Nicole Henriot.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 2 - 1951

Harvard, Radcliffe

American Foreign Ministers To Be Honored at Concert

THE FOREIGN Ministers of the 21 American Republics will be honored todnight during the concert to be given by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society at Clendenen Hall, American University, under the sponsorship of the Radcliffe College Club of Washington. The two groups, numbering about 80 singers, will devote a portion of their program to music from Brazil, Cuba, Mexico and Puerto Rico, dedicating it to inter-American friendship and cooperation.

Guest conductor for this section will be Augusta Rodriguez, professor of music at the University of Puerto Rico. Mr. Rodriguez, a composer and arranger as well as conductor, has studied music in this country under a special grant from the government of Puerto Rico. He is coming to Washington especially for the Harvard-Radcliffe concert.

During the remainder of the evening, G. Wallace Woodworth, regular director of the glee clubs, will conduct. In addition to more traditional choral music, he will include in his program excerpts from Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," based on Sacheverell Sitwell's poem, and portions of Igor Stravinsky's oratorio "Oedipus Rex." The latter will be heard in Washington for the first time.

Another "first" in the forthcoming concert is the fact that it will be the initial Washington appearance of the Radcliffe Choral Society. Although in Cambridge and Boston the Radcliffe group appears in all major events with its coleagues from across Cambridge square, it has seldom gone on road tours with the Harvard club. In honor of the occasion, Radcliffe students from the Washington area will serve as ushers.

FOLLOWING the Washington concert, the clubs will go on tour, including in their stops New York, Bryn Mawr, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. The Harvard club will return to Washington on April 14 to present a special concert at the Pan American Union in honor of Pan American Day. Attendance at this program will be by invitation only.

The final major event of the groups' spring season will be three performances of the Hector Berlioz "Requiem" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 20, 21 and 24.

Proceeds of the Washington concert will be applied to the Radcliffe College scholarship fund maintained by the Washington Radcliffe Club. Income from the fund is used annually to help send an outstanding Washington-area student to Radcliffe.

The scholarship benefit is the major project of the club year. White elephant and rummage sales, and Georgetown house tours have been used for this purpose in the past, but it is hoped to make the Harvard-Radcliffe concert an annual event, according to Mrs. Hugh L. Elsbree, club president.

Recipient of this year's scholarship is Miss Siciy Pao, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wen-nieh Pao of 1701 Swan st. nw. Mr. Pao is a member of the staff of the Chinese embassy.

Siciy was educated in Nanking and came to this country only three years ago.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 2 - 1951

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony With Battista, Piano Soloist

Joseph Battista, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, played the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F minor with sound technique and a great amount of charm.

Battista has a natural gift for making music. His instincts are as gracious as his technique is sound. He exploits sentiment without too much stylization, nevertheless, for all the technical skill and romantic feeling, some of his playing seemed blurred. Occasionally a brilliant, bravura run would be covered by excessive pedaling causing the texture to become thick and muddled, but in the quietier passages, especially the Larghetto movement, his playing was clean, sonorous, and eloquent.

He is a businesslike player, and never once did he attempt to dazzle with keyboard pyrotechnics the brio sections, nor did he under-play the more quiet introspective parts.

The program began with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, and ended with Brahms' Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor, Op. 25 (orchestrated by Schoenberg for orchestra alone). This is a rapturous work, but the florid orchestration given it by Schoenberg was a little too rich and lusty for this listener.

The work itself is a magnificent thing, a long, spacious and completely romantic traversal, but the terrifying array of trumpets, trombones, tuba, tambourine, glockenspiel, etc., did little more than produce a mass of pretty sound, with the essence of the work lost in the depths.

The orchestra thins out for a time in the final movement, permitting a string quartet a brief and refreshing speaking part, but this was a minor role . . . the orchestra immediately took over for a grandiose finish.

Mr. Burgin, substituting for Charles Munch, conducted with convincing authority.—A. F. B.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 1 - 1951

Presidents Attend Concert

WASHINGTON, April 1 (UP)— President Auriol and President Truman attended a concert tonight in M. Auriol's honor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitutional Hall.

The program included two works by French composers, Ravel's Piano Concerto and Berlioz Fantastic Symphony. The Boston Symphony is directed by the French-born Charles Munch. After the rendition of the Ravel piece by this French piano soloist, Nicole Henriot, M. Auriol presented to her a bouquet of red roses.

In President Truman's box were Mme. Auriol, Mrs. Alben W. Barkley and Ambassador Henri Bonnet. President Auriol, Mrs. Truman, Vice President Barkley, Mme. Bonnet, and Robert Schuman, the French Foreign Minister, occupied an adjourning box.

[251]

N Y Times MUSIC Apr. 1 '51

FINANCIAL WOES

Musical Organizations of America Face Critical Times and Need Help

By OLIN DOWNES.

OUR leading American symphony orchestras and opera companies are facing critical financial years. The expenses of these organizations increase steadily and swiftly. The income is much less than the outgo. There are varying degrees of distress, reports of mounting costs and deficits coming from all quarters of the compass.

It is a situation which cannot be ignored and which must be met in ways different from those of the past. The historical development of our orchestras has been based upon the principle or understanding that individuals of wealth and of public spirit, manifested in America in a degree unparalleled by any other country of the world, have met deficits of operation from their own pockets. At the same time, no expense has been spared to obtain the finest possible quality of performance.

But the changing economic situation, the proportion of taxation, Federal and state, to income, the constantly increasing costs of operation, make impossible the benefactions of what we can only look upon today as the romantic past of concert and opera production in this nation. Other recent developments have increased the tension, such as the greatly diminished returns from broadcasting. Very few orchestras are now on the air at all and fewer of these have presently the benefit of advertising sponsorship.

Various forms of Federal, state and municipal aid or subsidy have been widely discussed and in isolated instances attempted. In San Francisco, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Louisville various degrees and kinds of municipal assistance have been instituted.

A small percentage of city taxes has been donated to some orchestras in exchange for a given number of performances for the municipality. Or a fixed sum has been received annually for the orchestra's war chest. New York might well entertain some of these ideas.

This writer believes that the day inevitably must come when we have both Federal and state support for music. But that day lies ahead in an indiscernible future. There is something else which can and should be done quickly to meet at least partly the present situation.

Relief Needed

Relief from the Federal admissions tax, we are informed, would have almost balanced the Metropolitan's deficit as of the present season. It would be of commensurate relief to our symphonic organizations, all of which can be classed as non-profit charitable activities. And it would be a degree of logical recognition of the incalculable services that these institutions render to our people, of especial value in these days of such anxiety and concern to the nation.

In this connection words from the address that Floyd G. Blair, president of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, made on March 7 to the Ways and Means Committee of the House recounting the steps by which the admissions tax was first imposed in war years, then doubled to the rate today, are instructive.

I am president and treasurer of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York. In my private capacity I am vice president of the National City Bank of New York. I am here to discuss the impact of the Federal Admissions Tax of 20 per cent on charitable, non-profit organizations such as symphony orchestras and the opera. * * *

You will all recall what happened at the last session of the Congress. You approved an amendment to the Revenue Act restoring our exemption. The House of Representatives passed the bill, but before the Senate acted war broke out in Korea. The bill as passed by the Senate dropped the exemption. We hoped that it would be put back in conference, but that hope was not realized. We therefore find ourselves in the same deplorable situation that we have been in since Secretary Morgenthau persuaded this committee and the Congress to subject these charitable, non-profit organizations to the tax. This was first done in 1941. The tax was doubled in 1943, Secretary Morgenthau giving his solemn undertaking that the tax would be removed six months after the end of the war.

I am sure you all know that Congressman Morano of Connecticut on Feb. 8 introduced a bill (H. R. 2524) which was referred to this committee specifically providing for exemption from the admissions tax of symphony orchestras and the opera. Congressman Celler introduced a similar bill referring, I believe, solely to the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Congressman Klein has also introduced a bill (H. R. 2893) referred to this committee providing for the establishment of the Office of Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Fine Arts, which contains a provision restoring to us our former exemption.

Sound Finance

Gentlemen, without going into personal details, I assure you that no one of you is more deeply concerned than I to see that the finances of our Government are kept on a sound basis, that serious inflation is avoided and that the value of the dollar is maintained * * * I have filed with the committee a condensed budget of our own orchestra which I trust is before each one of you. As explained, this may be taken as representative of the twenty-eight leading symphony societies, though our position is better than that of most. There are also probably twenty to twenty-five minor symphony orchestras in the country which are in a relatively much worse position. Beyond them come perhaps 600 school, semi-professional and amateur orchestras scattered across the country, mostly in smaller communities. These are made up of sixty to 100 players who, with their families, represent a cross-section of American life at its best.

In addition to these orchestras there are probably more than 2,000 community and civic concert groups operating all over the country. Series of concerts are organized and our best artists are brought before audiences in cities and towns spread from north to south and east to west.

The audiences that sit in these concert halls number many millions. The radio audience adds millions more, probably more than 10,000,000 people listening to our Sunday broadcast alone. Beyond that millions of recordings of our great orchestras are sold each year and are played at home and on the air over and over again.

Now, what does this mean to the American people? Is it really important that it continue? Is it something that in times of stress and worry, people had better do without? Is it something we should deny our youth? Is it something which should be grouped with movies and perhaps night clubs, or is it part of our cultural education, something that touches the soul, something which, with many, approaches the realm of religion?

It may well be asked, in these days when, by common consent, astronomical sums are necessarily expended in national defense, if it is not also essential to defend the artistic inheritance of the nation? Our music, which, in its symphonic and operatic aspects, is unrivaled in quality of performance and extent of repertory in the world, is utterly essential to our spiritual security and well-being.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 1 - 1951

Postlude

Auriols and Trumans Guests At Boston Symphony Concert

By Paul Hume

The President of France and Madame Auriol and President and Mrs. Truman were guests last night at a special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall.

Charles Munch, the famous French conductor, now musical director of the Boston Symphony, led the program in which Nicole Henriot, young French pianist, was soloist. It was the second time in a few weeks that this combination of musicians appeared together in Washington.

The program was precisely balanced between American and French music. Samuel Barber's overture for the School for Scandal opened the concert. It was followed by Aaron Copland's tone poem, The Quiet City. These two scores are among the finest American works of our time.

From France we heard Ravel's G Major Piano Concerto, and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

The Ravel was a remarkably happy choice. While thoroughly Gallic in essence, it is the most strongly influenced by American jazz of all of Ravel's music. It was equally happy as a concerto tailored to Miss Henriot's remarkable talents.

She has unerring accuracy in the fleetest passages, and a powerful rhythmic sense. These combined to bring her a tremendous ovation at the close of the concerto. Sharing the applause with Munch and the orchestra, Miss Henriot was obliged finally to repeat the closing movement of the work before she was allowed to retire.

The orchestra gave her the most polished, expert support at every moment in the Ravel. As a piece of music to which she might well have been born, the work gave her moments none of which she missed. Had her tone in the extended solo opening the second movement been more legato and gentle, the entire effect would have been beyond praise.

To the American music at the beginning of the evening, Munch and the orchestra brought the best of subtlety and wit in the Barber, and a mood of sustained revery in the Copland that exhibited its unique though simple beauties. Roger Voisin's trumpet and the English horn of Louis Speyer made the solo lines notable.

We admire Munch for his interest in, and service to our contemporary composers.

To close, the concert with the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony was, for Charles Munch, the occasion to display once again his rare talents for breathing fire into a problematic composition. The tension and restless motion he showed in its first two movements is of a part with the fevered program Berlioz provided for his score; even so, it was often a contradiction of the musical directions.

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 1 1951

AURIOL JOINS TRUMAN AT CONCERT

WASHINGTON, March 31 (UP) — Pres. Vincent Auriol of France joined Pres. Truman Saturday night to hear a concert in his honor by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Constitution hall.

The French president, who was given a prolonged ovation upon entering and leaving the auditorium, appeared to enjoy the program which included two works by French composers — Ravel's "Piano Concerto" and Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony."

The Boston symphony is directed by French-born Charles Munch.

Auriol was particularly delighted with the rendition of the Ravel piece by French piano soloist, Nicole Henriot.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
APR 2 - 1951

Harvard, Radcliffe

American Foreign Ministers To Be Honored at Concert

THE FOREIGN Ministers of the 21 American Republics will be honored tonight during the concert to be given by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society at Clendenen Hall, American University, under the sponsorship of the Radcliffe College Club of Washington. The two groups, numbering about 80 singers, will devote a portion of their program to music from Brazil, Cuba, Mexico and Puerto Rico, dedicating it to inter-American friendship and cooperation.

Guest conductor for this section will be Augusta Rodriguez, professor of music at the University of Puerto Rico. Mr. Rodriguez, a composer and arranger as well as conductor, has studied music in this country under a special grant from the government of Puerto Rico. He is coming to Washington especially for the Harvard-Radcliffe concert.

During the remainder of the evening, G. Wallace Woodworth, regular director of the glee clubs, will conduct. In addition to more traditional choral music, he will include in his program excerpts from Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande," based on Sacheverell Sitwell's poem, and portions of Igor Stravinsky's oratorio "Oedipus Rex." The latter will be heard in Washington for the first time.

Another "first" in the forthcoming concert is the fact that it will be the initial Washington appearance of the Radcliffe Choral Society. Although in Cambridge and Boston the Radcliffe group appears in all major events with its coleagues from across Cambridge square, it has seldom gone on road tours with the Harvard club. In honor of the occasion, Radcliffe students from the Washington area will serve as ushers.

FOLLOWING the Washington concert, the clubs will go on tour, including in their stops New York, Bryn Mawr, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. The Harvard club will return to Washington on April 14 to present a special concert at the Pan American Union in honor of Pan American Day. Attendance at this program will be by invitation only.

The final major event of the groups' spring season will be three performances of the Hector Berlioz "Requiem" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on April 20, 21 and 24.

Proceeds of the Washington concert will be applied to the Radcliffe College scholarship fund maintained by the Washington Radcliffe Club. Income from the fund is used annually to help send an outstanding Washington-area student to Radcliffe.

The scholarship benefit is the major project of the club year. White elephant and rummage sales, and Georgetown house tours have been used for this purpose in the past, but it is hoped to make the Harvard-Radcliffe concert an annual event, according to Mrs. Hugh L. Elsbree, club president.

Recipient of this year's scholarship is Miss Siciy Pao, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wen-nieh Pao of 1701 Swan st. nw. Mr. Pao is a member of the staff of the Chinese embassy.

Siciy was educated in Nanking and came to this country only three years ago.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 1 - 1951

Presidents Attend Concert

WASHINGTON, April 1 (UP)— President Auriol and President Truman attended a concert tonight in M. Auriol's honor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitutional Hall.

The program included two works by French composers, Ravel's Piano Concerto and Berlioz Fantastic Symphony. The Boston Symphony is directed by the French-born Charles Munch. After the rendition of the Ravel piece by this French piano soloist, Nicole Henriot, M. Auriol presented to her a bouquet of red roses.

In President Truman's box were Mme. Auriol, Mrs. Alben W. Barkley and Ambassador Henri Bonnet. President Auriol, Mrs. Truman, Vice President Barkley, Mme. Bonnet, and Robert Schuman, the French Foreign Minister, occupied an adjourning box.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 2 - 1951

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony With Battista, Piano Soloist

Joseph Battista, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, played the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F minor with sound technique and a great amount of charm.

Battista has a natural gift for making music. His instincts are as gracious as his technique is sound. He exploits sentiment without too much stylization, nevertheless, for all the technical skill and romantic feeling, some of his playing seemed blurred. Occasionally a brilliant, bravura run would be covered by excessive pedaling causing the texture to become thick and muddled, but in the quietier passages, especially the Larghetto movement, his playing was clean, sonorous, and eloquent.

He is a businesslike player, and never once did he attempt to dazzle with keyboard pyrotechnics the brio sections, nor did he under-play the more quiet introspective parts.

The program began with Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, and ended with Brahms' Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor, Op. 25 (orchestrated by Schoenberg for orchestra alone). This is a rapturous work, but the florid orchestration given it by Schoenberg was a little too rich and lusty for this listener.

The work itself is a magnificent thing, a long, spacious and completely romantic traversal, but the terrifying array of trumpets, trombones, tuba, tambourine, glockenspiel, etc., did little more than produce a mass of pretty sound, with the essence of the work lost in the depths.

The orchestra thins out for a time in the final movement, permitting a string quartet a brief and refreshing speaking part, but this was a minor role . . . the orchestra immediately took over for a grandiose finish.

Mr. Burgin, substituting for Charles Munch, conducted with convincing authority.—A. F. B.

[25?]

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
APR 2 - 1951

Who's Best?

The March issue of Holiday magazine contains a list by Deems Taylor of his choice of the ten finest symphony orchestras in the United States. Excluding the NBC Symphony on the ground that it is primarily a radio orchestra, the critic-composer lumps in first place the three obvious choices—the orchestras of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. "Tied for second place" are Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, St. Louis, and San Francisco.

This listing naturally did not find favor with agreement in many other cities boasting major symphonic orchestras. Many neglected conductors and officials of overlooked aggregations grumbled privately. Not so reticent was D. Gordon Rose Jr., prominent supporter of the Dallas Symphony. "Where does Holiday take its holiday?" he asked. "Doesn't Deems Taylor get around? Other magazines and critics do. Does Holiday or Deems Taylor know that Texas is the only state in the union other than New York with three major symphonies—orchestras costing $250,000 to $400,000 a year?"

New Orleans took an even more aggressive attitude. It invited critic-composer Virgil Thomson of The New York Herald Tribune to come down and conduct the New Orleans Symphony last week, and judge for himself. Although Thomson ducked the major issue after the concert by saying he "never makes comparisons," he did say that New Orleans had "a fine, a very fine orchestra." Noting that most orchestras were generally as good as their budgets (New Orleans is budgeted at a relatively modest $217,000 a year), Thomson said further: "New Orleans is getting more than it is paying for."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
APR 2 - 1951

MUNCH DEPENDS ON SPONTANEITY

Boston Symphony Leader Here Next Season

The Boston Symphony, well-known to Western Massachusetts music lovers, will return to this part of the state for the first time in several years and under the baton of its new conductor, Charles Munch, when the orchestra appears here during the 1951-52 season of Community Concerts.

Depends on Spontaneity

Mr. Munch, who had a large shoe to fill when he took over the retired Serge Koussevitsky's job, has been the subject of much controversy among critics and music lovers alike but the consensus is that he has given the Boston Symphony something it never had before.

Munch is the type of conductor who relies on spontaneity and inspiration of the moment. He may not achieve the same perfection of detail as the one who works his men hard but there will be an alertness and freshness in the results which creates a new form of excitement.

Munch came to the Boston Symphony from Europe. He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. Although violin was his forte, he turned to conducting following a period as concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsig under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932 he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, becoming its regular conductor.

In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. In the fall of 1949 he became permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL
APR 2 - 1951

Photo by Jean Cunningham

FRANCES YEEND
. . . soloist with Winston-Salem Symphony . . .

Soloist Yeend Happy to Sing With Winston-Salem Orchestra

By FRANCES GRIFFIN

You might think that a girl who's sung with the venerable Boston Symphony would find singing with a youngster like the Winston-Salem Symphony a trifle unexciting.

But if you think that, you wouldn't be having Frances Yeend in mind.

Frankly, it makes her downright mad to hear a big-time artist looking down his or her nose at a young orchestra.

"These small orchestras are our hope for the future," she says.

Miss Yeend (rhymes with "blend") flew into Winston-Salem last night from New York where she just finished singing a performance of "Die Meistersinger" at the New York City Center. This afternoon she was to be partied by the Woman's Committee of the Winston-Salem Symphony Association. Tonight she will rehearse with the Winston-Salem Symphony. Sometime today or tomorrow she was to "look at some of these old buildings." And at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow she will appear as soprano soloist with the symphony in its final concert of the season.

Goes in All Directions

Then back to New York for a performance of "Faust."

"Really," said Miss Yeend this morning over a second cup of Postum (coffee makes her ill), "I go in all directions."

By which she meant that she sings in opera, in big works like Beethoven's Ninth with major orchestras, in concert and in many new works.

And she likes singing with little orchestras like the Winston-Salem Symphony. "You know, youngsters these days go in for band, drum major stuff. If it weren't for these small orchestras, we would have no future string players."

Miss Yeend, blonde of hair and brown of eyes, is strictly American. She was born in the Pacific Northwest, taught a while before launching into a concert career and has no patience with "acting prima donnas."

She doesn't think the American people fall for the bursts of temperament, the play for homage that once characterized the singing star.

"It's due to the way we live," she said. "Now we have so much to listen to that the coming of a singer to town is not a much-anticipated event any more. Too, there is much more competition in the field. The people don't like to see singers put on too much of a show."

Certainly, Miss Yeend practices what she preaches. She was simply dressed today (in a green knitted dress) and talked easily of everything from cameras to painting draperies to cooking.

She isn't married and when she is in New York she does her own cooking.

'Only," she said, "when I cook for myself, I cook non-fattening things—not too interesting."

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL
2 - 1951

WASHINGTON—MUSICAL RECEPTION. At a concert given in Constitution Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, President Auriol of France and President Truman, with their wives, meet Charles Munch, conductor, and Nicole Henriot, soloist. From left: Madame Auriol, President Auriol, Munch, Henriot, President Truman and Mrs. Truman. Auriol is in the United States on a state visit. AP Wirephoto.

[260]

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
APR 2 - 1951

Who's Best?

The March issue of Holiday magazine contains a list by Deems Taylor of his choice of the ten finest symphony orchestras in the United States. Excluding the NBC Symphony on the ground that it is primarily a radio orchestra, the critic-composer lumps in first place the three obvious choices—the orchestras of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. Tied for second place are Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, St. Louis, and San Francisco.

This listing naturally did not find favor [illegible] agreement [illegible] many other cities boasting major symphonic orchestras. Many neglected conductors and officials of overlooked aggregations grumbled privately. Not so discreet was D. Gordon Rupe Jr., prominent supporter of the Dallas Symphony. "Where does Holiday take its holiday?" he blasted. "Doesn't Deems Taylor [illegible] Other magazines and critics [illegible] Deems Taylor know that Texas is the only state in the union other than New York with three major symphonies—orchestras costing $250,000 to $300,000 a year?

New Orleans took an even more aggressive attitude. It invited critic-composer Virgil Thomson of The New York Herald Tribune to come down and conduct the New Orleans Symphony last week and listen for himself. Although Thomson duck[ed] the major issue after the concert by saying he "never makes comparisons," he did say that New Orleans had "a very fine orchestra." Noting that most orchestras were generally as good as their budgets, (New Orleans is budgeted at a relatively modest $217,000 a year), Thomson said further: "New Orleans is getting more than it is paying for."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
APR 2 - 1951

MUNCH DEPENDS ON SPONTANEITY

Boston Symphony Leader Here Next Season

The Boston Symphony, well-known to Western Massachusetts music lovers, will return to this part of the state for the first time in several years and under the baton of its new conductor, Charles Munch, when the orchestra appears here during the 1951-52 season of Community Concerts.

Depends on Spontaneity

Mr. Munch, who had a large shoe to fill when he took over the retired Serge Koussevitsky's job, has been the subject of much controversy among critics and music lovers alike but the consensus is that he has given the Boston Symphony something it never had before.

Munch is the type of conductor who relies on spontaneity and inspiration of the moment. He may not achieve the same perfection of detail as the one who works his men hard but there will be an alertness and freshness in the results which creates a new form of excitement.

Munch came to the Boston Symphony from Europe. He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. Although violin was his forte, he turned to conducting following a period as concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932 he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, becoming its regular conductor.

In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the [illegible] Conservatory Orchestra. In the fall of 1949 he became permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL
APR 2 - 1951

Photo by Jean Cunningham

FRANCES YEEND
... soloist with Winston-Salem Symphony ...

Soloist Yeend Happy to Sing With Winston-Salem Orchestra

By FRANCES GRIFFIN

You might think that a girl who's sung with the venerable Boston Symphony would find singing with a youngster like the Winston-Salem Symphony a trifle unexciting.

But if you think that, you wouldn't be having Frances Yeend in mind.

Frankly, it makes her downright mad to hear a big-time artist looking down his or her nose at a young orchestra.

"These small orchestras are our hope for the future," she says.

Miss Yeend (rhymes with "blend") flew into Winston-Salem last night from New York where she just finished singing a performance of "Die Meistersinger" at the New York City Center. This afternoon she was to be partied by the Woman's Committee of the Winston-Salem Symphony Association. Tonight she will rehearse with the Winston-Salem Symphony. Sometime today or tomorrow she was to "look at some of these old buildings." And at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow she will appear as soprano soloist with the symphony in its final concert of the season.

Goes in All Directions

Then back to New York for a performance of "Faust."

"Really," said Miss Yeend this morning over a second cup of Postum (coffee makes her ill), "I go in all directions."

By which she meant that she sings in opera, in big works like Beethoven's Ninth with major orchestras in concert and in many new works.

And she likes singing with little orchestras like the Winston-Salem Symphony. "You know, youngsters these days go in for band, drum major stuff. If it weren't for these small orchestras, we would have no future string players."

Miss Yeend, blonde of hair and brown of eyes, is strictly American. She was born in the Pacific Northwest, taught a while before launching into a concert career and has no patience with "acting prima donnas."

She doesn't think the American people fall for the bursts of temperament, the play for homage that once characterized the singing star.

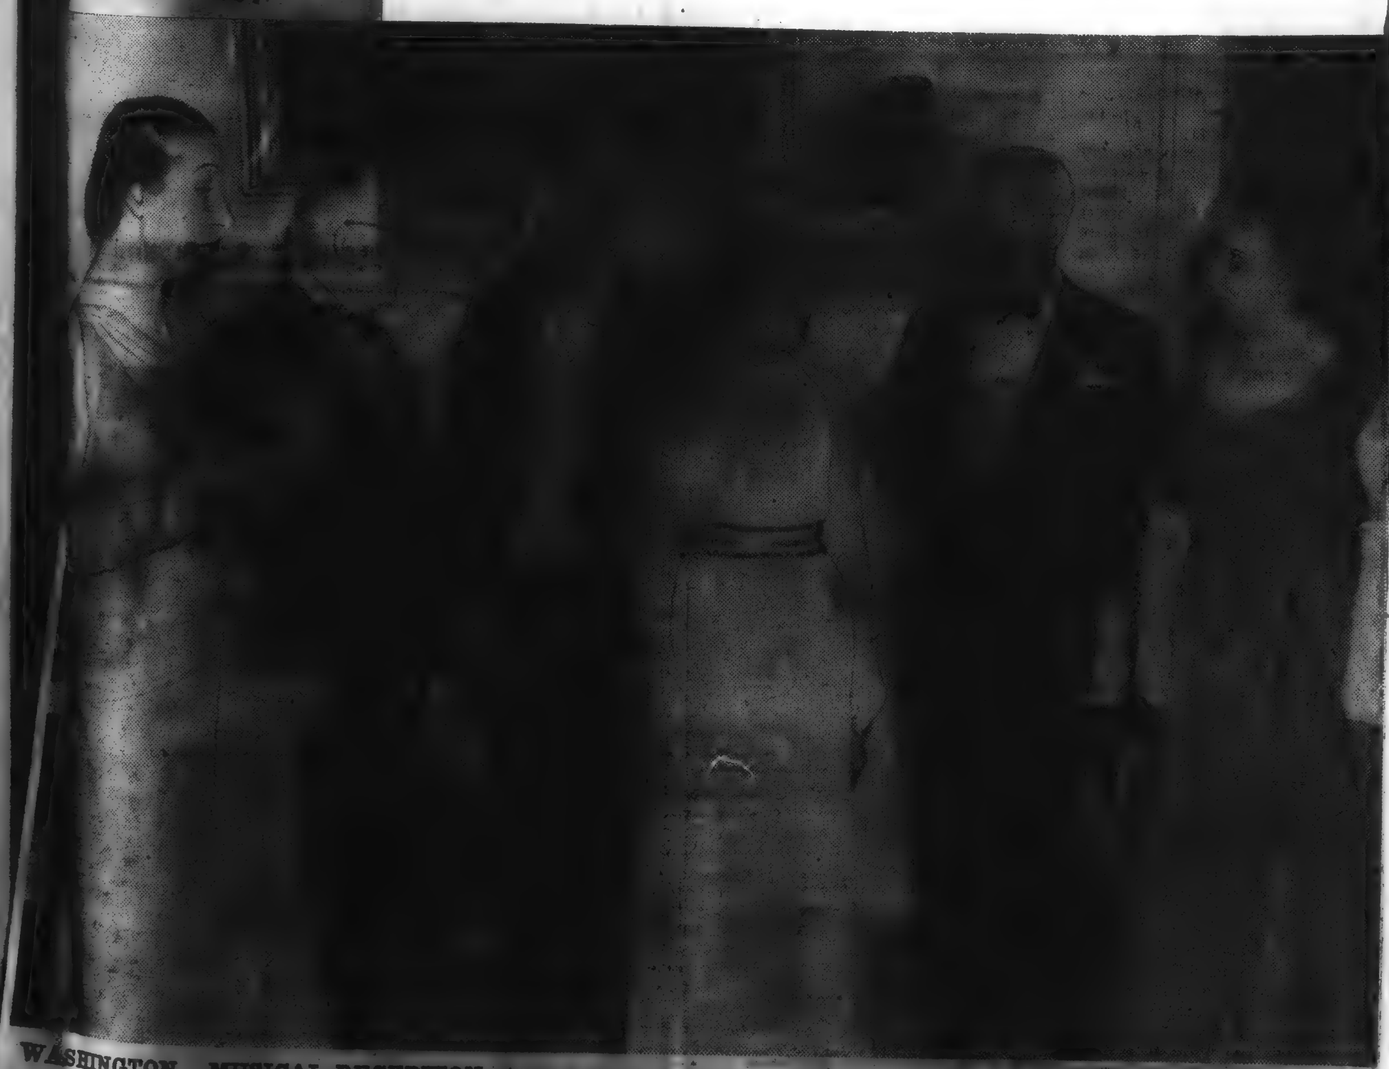
"It's due to the way we live," she said. "Now we have so much to listen to that the coming of a singer to town is not a much-anticipated event any more. Too, there is much more competition in the field. The people don't like to see singers put on too much of a show."

Certainly, Miss Yeend practices what she preaches. She was simply dressed today (in a green knitted dress) and talked easily of everything from cameras to painting draperies to cooking.

She isn't married and when she is in New York she does her own cooking.

"Only," she said, "when I cook for myself, I cook non-fattening things—not too interesting."

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL
APR 2 - 1951



WASHINGTON—MUSICAL RECEPTION. At a concert given in Constitution Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, President Auriol of France and President Truman, with their wives, meet Charles Munch, conductor, and Nicole Henriot, soloist. From left: Madame Auriol, President Auriol, Munch, Henriot, President Truman and Mrs. Truman. Auriol is in the United States on a state visit. AP Wirephoto.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 2 - 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Saturday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from a Washington performance before two eminent amateur musicians, the pianist-President of the United States and the violinist-President of France, and, whether for that reason or because of the hint of spring in the air, was in top form for the Sunday afternoon concert.

The Beethoven Overture to Egmont and Arnold Schoenberg's full orchestral transcription of the Brahms Piano Quartet in G Minor, opus 25, repeat performances of works heard previously on the Friday-Saturday series and the Tuesday evening series, were again conducted by Richard Burgin, the orchestra's able concert-master, with more authority and spirit than at the two previous concerts.

A program addition was the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F Minor, with Joseph Battista as pianist. The Chopin Concerto, wickedly difficult to perform in the manner the composer intended, presented technical difficulties which the young artist surmounted in so facile a manner that one was scarcely conscious they existed. That Mr. Battista elected to perform the rather quiet and poetic Chopin Concerto instead of the histrionic warhorses with which young artists establish their reputations speaks well for the seriousness with which he performs on the instrument of which he has become a master. As in few other concertos the orchestra is no more than an accompanying second part, for the most part, it must be admitted, is unbelievably dull. However, the piano part is consistently interesting, and one is thankful to have heard so fine a pianist playing this solo.

T. K.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1951

PHILHARMONIC AIM IS TO CUT DEFICITS

Symphony Society Setting Up an Organization of 'Friends' to Help Support Orchestra

To offset the financial drain of its annually recurring deficits, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is following the lead of the Boston Symphony in establishing an organization of "Friends," who will be invited to make a donation each year to help support the orchestra.

"Friends of the Philharmonic-Symphony" is to be the name of tthe new organization and its establishment was announced last night at the orchestra's first dinner for the general public. The dinner, which was planned and arranged by Mrs. Lytle Hull, was held at the Hotel Plaza and it also helped the orchestra, for it cost $10 a plate and there were 300 present.

Floyd G. Blair, president and treasurer of the orchestra, in announcing the new organization, said that an annual deficit "in the neighborhood of $150,000" was "inevitable."

"After weighing all the factors," he said, "we have decided to follow the example of what is done in Boston and seek to enroll thousands of public-spirited individuals on whom we can count to send us each year a special contribution of $10, or $20—or more—in regular support of the orchestra. It is my personal hope that a way can be found to bring the members of this new group into pleasant contact with the officers and directors of the society and with the musical director, our guest conductors and the members of the orchestra itself."

In outlining the financial difficulties of the orchestra, Mr. Blair said, "The iniquitous 20 per cent Federal admissions tax is drawing tighter around the orchestra's throat."

"A cultural, nonprofit organization with a huge deficit," he said, "we are compelled to collect and pay into the Federal treasury in admission taxes an amount equivalent to roughly $500 a day for each day of the concert season, concert or no concert. And at the end of next season we shall be approaching total tax payments of $1,000,000."

Pending the functioning of the new organization, a group has been quietly trying to raise a special fund of $200,000, Mr. Blair announced. Of this sum, $150,405 already has been donated or pledged. Another move to raise money is seen in the orchestra's negotiations to play at the Roxy for two weeks at the conclusion of the current musical season.

Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce was the other principal speaker. After envisaging an imaginary dictator who might make music-making a crime, she said we must set about saving our finest music and supporting our finest music makers by both private and public support.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the orchestra, served as the accompanist for the two soloists of the evening, Leonard Rose, 'cellist, and Martha Lipton. After his stint at the piano, he added his voice to those asking for the support of the orchestra.

Mrs. Hull and Charles Triller, the chairman of the board, were the other speakers. The speeches and part of the musical program were broadcast by station WQXR.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 4 - 1951

HIGH POWER FM STATION IS PLANNED

Would Broadcast Hub Symphony and Other Programs

Application for a construction permit to erect a high-power noncommercial education FM station in Boston designed to bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges and the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to millions of listeners, has been filed with the Federal Communications Commission by the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

ON BLUE HILL

The three - kilowatt frequency-modulated transmitter presented by Professor E. H. Armstrong of Columbia University, and the antenna of the proposed FM station would be on top of Great Blue Hill in Milton, highest point of land in eastern Massachusetts. Central studios and offices would be in Symphony Hall, Boston, with auxiliary studios in the co-operating colleges and universities.

Institutions co-operating in the council program, according to this announcement by Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, include Boston College, Boston University, Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College. Boston University will continue to operate its own FM station, WBUR.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
APR 3 - 1951

ARTHUR W. PERKINS
Takes Symphony Job

NEW BUSINESS MANAGER FOR SYMPHONY ARRIVES

Arthur W. Perkins, new business manager of the Symphony Society of San Antonio, arrived here and soon will assume duties of his new post.

Until recenty a member of the staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Perkins succeeds A. M. Walker, whose resignation was recently announced.

Perkins for two years acted in liaison capacity between the Boston Symphony manager and Conductor Charles Muench, among other duties with the well-known orchestra and at the Tanglewood Music Festival.

Prior to joining the Boston organization Perkins served two years in the state department in Paris and Frankfurt, beginning in 1947.

A graduate of Harvard, where he majored in psychology, Perkins spent two years at the university in the Navy's V-12 R.O.T.C. officer training. He also attended Phillips Exeter Academy, where he finished in 1944.

With him in San Antonio is his wife, whom he married in Paris in 1948, and one-year-old daughter, Louise.

A native of Boston, Perkins is the son of a Unitarian minister, who is now the pastor of King's Chapel in Boston.

This Clipping From
MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
APR 4 - 1951

Lowell Institute Applies For Cultural FM Station

BOSTON—(UP)—The Lowell Institute announced last night it had applied for federal permission to build a new FM radio station whose non-commercial educational programs would include full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ralph Lowell, a trustee of the institute, said that if the proposed 20,000-watt station were built it would begin broadcasting the symphony performances next fall. It will be the first time full performances have been broadcast to Greater Boston listeners since 1926.

Lowell said the proposed station also would bring millions o New England listeners the cultural resources of six Greate Boston colleges that are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

The new station would cover a 65-mile radius in which there is an estimated total population of 4,861,369.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 4 - 1951

The Symphony on the Air

New England owes congratulations to Mr. Ralph Lowell and the Lowell Institute for the initiative which is to muster the cultural resources of half a dozen colleges in Greater Boston, together with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in support of the new FM radio station, the establishment of which was announced last night.

This educational, noncommercial venture expands tremendously an undertaking which has already added to the Lowell Institute's fame among our six New England States. It means that, for the first time in a generation, the full performances of the Boston Symphony will be on the air, with the opening of the new season, next Autumn. Thus, to the familiar programs of scholars, scientists and creative artists in letters, will be added the cooperative contribution of one of the most famous orchestras in the world.

Mr. Lowell is well justified in stressing the wealth of educational resources available in our community. This welcome project expresses a fine spirit of community responsibility in sharing them.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
APR 4 - 195

Lowell Tech Seeks FM Station Permit

Boston, April 3. (UP) — The Lowell Institute announced tonight it had applied for Federal permission to build a new FM radio station whose noncommercial educational programs would include full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ralph Lowell, a trustee of the institute, said that if the proposed 20,000-watt station were built it would begin broadcasting the Symphony performances next Fall. It will be the first time full performances have been broadcast to Greater Boston listeners since 1926.

Lowell said the proposed station also would bring millions of New England listeners the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges that are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 4 - 1951

Institute Plans New Radio Station

Educational Programs Would Be Presented By Boston Colleges

BOSTON (UP)—Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, revealed plans today for a noncommercial radio station that would specialize in educational broadcasts by presenting the cultural resources of six greater Boston colleges and full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lowell said the institute has applied to the Federal Communication System for permission to build a new FM station of 20,000 watts to begin broadcasting in the fall.

The studios would be at Symphony Hall in Boston with the transmitter in the blue hills of Milton.

The new station, he said, would cover a 65-mile radius in which there is an estimated population of 4,861,369.

[261]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 2 - 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Saturday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from Washington performance before two eminent amateur musicians, the pianist-President of the United States and the violinist-President of France, and, whether for that reason or because of the hint of spring in the air, was in top form for the Sunday afternoon concert.

The Beethoven Overture to Egmont and Arnold Schoenberg's full orchestral transcription of the Brahms Piano Quartet in G Minor, opus 25, repeat performances of works heard previously on the Friday-Saturday series and the Tuesday evening series, were again conducted by Richard Burgin, the orchestra's able concert-master, with more authority and spirit than at the two previous concerts.

A program addition was the Chopin Concerto No. 2 in F Minor, with Joseph Battista as pianist. The Chopin Concerto, wickedly difficult to perform in the manner the composer intended, presented technical difficulties which the young artist surmounted in so facile a manner that one was scarcely conscious they existed. That Mr. Battista elected to perform the rather quiet and poetic Chopin Concerto instead of the histrionic warhorses with which young artists establish their reputations speaks well for the seriousness with which he performs on the instrument of which he has become a master. As in few other concertos the orchestra is no more than an accompanying second part, for the most part, it must be admitted, is unbelievably dull. However, the piano part is consistently interesting, and one is thankful to have heard so fine a pianist playing this solo.

T. K.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 4 - 1951

HIGH POWER FM STATION IS PLANNED

Would Broadcast Hub Symphony and Other Programs

Application for a construction permit to erect a high-power noncommercial education FM station in Boston designed to bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges and the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to millions of listeners, has been filed with the Federal Communications Commission by the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council.

ON BLUE HILL

The three - kilowatt frequency-modulated transmitter presented by Professor E. H. Armstrong of Columbia University, and the antenna of the proposed FM station would be on top of Great Blue Hill in Milton, highest point of land in eastern Massachusetts. Central studios and offices would be in Symphony Hall, Boston, with auxiliary studios in the co-operating colleges and universities.

Institutions co-operating in the council program, according to this announcement by Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, include Boston College, Boston University, Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College. Boston University will continue to operate its own FM station, WBUR.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1951

PHILHARMONIC AIM IS TO CUT DEFICITS

Symphony Society Setting Up an Organization of 'Friends' to Help Support Orchestra

To offset the financial drain of its annually recurring deficits, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is following the lead of the Boston Symphony in establishing an organization of "Friends," who will be invited to make a donation each year to help support the orchestra.

"Friends of the Philharmonic-Symphony" is to be the name of tthe new organization and its establishment was announced last night at the orchestra's first dinner for the general public. The dinner, which was planned and arranged by Mrs. Lytle Hull, was held at the Hotel Plaza and it also helped the orchestra, for it cost $10 a plate and there were 300 present.

Floyd G. Blair, president and treasurer of the orchestra, in announcing the new organization, said that an annual deficit "in the neighborhood of $150,000" was "inevitable."

"After weighing all the factors," he said, "we have decided to follow the example of what is done in Boston and seek to enroll thousands of public-spirited individuals on whom we can count to send us each year a special contribution of $10, or $20—or more—in regular support of the orchestra. It is my personal hope that a way can be found to bring the members of this new group into pleasant contact with the officers and directors of the society and with the musical director, our guest conductors and the members of the orchestra itself."

In outlining the financial difficulties of the orchestra, Mr. Blair said, "The iniquitous 20 per cent Federal admissions tax is drawing tighter around the orchestra's throat."

"A cultural, nonprofit organization with a huge deficit," he said, "we are compelled to collect and pay into the Federal treasury in admission taxes an amount equivalent to roughly $500 a day for each day of the concert season, concert or no concert. And at the end of next season we shall be approaching total tax payments of $1,000,000."

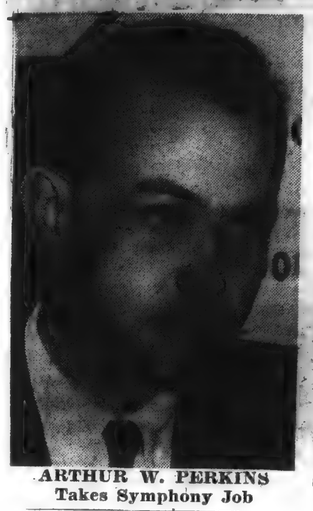
Pending the functioning of the new organization, a group has been quietly trying to raise a special fund of $200,000, Mr. Blair announced. Of this sum, $150,405 already has been donated or pledged. Another move to raise money is seen in the orchestra's negotiations to play at the Roxy for two weeks at the conclusion of the current musical season.

Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce was the other principal speaker. After envisaging an imaginary dictator who might make music-making a crime, she said we must set about saving our finest music and supporting our finest music makers by both private and public support.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the orchestra, served as the accompanist for the two soloists of the evening, Leonard Rose, 'cellist, and Martha Lipton. After his stint at the piano, he added his voice to those asking for the support of the orchestra.

Mrs. Hull and Charles Triller, the chairman of the board, were the other speakers. The speeches and part of the musical program were broadcast by station WQXR.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
APR 3 1951



ARTHUR W. PERKINS
Takes Symphony Job

NEW BUSINESS MANAGER FOR SYMPHONY ARRIVES

Arthur W. Perkins, new business manager of the Symphony Society of San Antonio, arrived here and soon will assume duties of his new post.

Until recenty a member of the staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Perkins succeeds A. M. Walker, whose resignation was recently announced.

Perkins for two years acted in liaison capacity between the Boston Symphony manager and Conductor Charles Muench, among other duties with the well-known orchestra and at the Tanglewood Music Festival.

Prior to joining the Boston organization Perkins served two years in the state department in Paris and Frankfurt, beginning in 1947.

A graduate of Harvard, where he majored in psychology, Perkins spent two years at the university in the Navy's V-12 R.O.T.C. officer training. He also attended Phillips Exeter Academy, where he finished in 1944.

With him in San Antonio is his wife, whom he married in Paris in 1948, and one-year-old daughter, Louise.

A native of Boston, Perkins is the son of a Unitarian minister, who is now the pastor of King's Chapel in Boston.

This Clipping From
MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
APR 4 - 1951

Lowell Institute Applies For Cultural FM Station

BOSTON—(UP)—The Lowell Institute announced last night it had applied for federal permission to build a new FM radio station whose non-commercial educational programs would include full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ralph Lowell, a trustee of the institute, said that if the proposed 20,000-watt station were built it would begin broadcasting the symphony performances next fall. It will be the first time full performances have been broadcast to Greater Boston listeners since 1926.

Lowell said the proposed station also would bring millions of New England listeners the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges that are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

The new station would cover a 65-mile radius in which there is an estimated total population of 4,861,369.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 4 - 1951

The Symphony on the Air

New England owes congratulations to Mr. Ralph Lowell and the Lowell Institute for the initiative which is to muster the cultural resources of half a dozen colleges in Greater Boston, together with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in support of the new FM radio station, the establishment of which was announced last night.

This educational, noncommercial venture expands tremendously an undertaking which has already added to the Lowell Institute's fame among our six New England States. It means that, for the first time in a generation, the full performances of the Boston Symphony will be on the air, with the opening of the new season, next Autumn. Thus, to the familiar programs of scholars, scientists and creative artists in letters, will be added the cooperative contribution of one of the most famous orchestras in the world.

Mr. Lowell is well justified in stressing the wealth of educational resources available in our community. This welcome project expresses a fine spirit of community responsibility in sharing them.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
APR 4 - 1951

Lowell Tech Seeks FM Station Permit

Boston, April 3. (UP) — The Lowell Institute announced tonight it had applied for Federal permission to build a new FM radio station whose noncommercial educational programs would include full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ralph Lowell, a trustee of the institute, said that if the proposed 20,000-watt station were built it would begin broadcasting the Symphony performances next Fall. It will be the first time full performances have been broadcast to Greater Boston listeners since 1926.

Lowell said the proposed station also would bring millions of New England listeners the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges that are members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 4 - 195

Institute Plans New Radio Station

Educational Programs Would Be Presented By Boston Colleges

BOSTON (UP)—Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute, revealed plans today for a noncommercial radio station that would specialize in educational broadcasts by presenting the cultural resources of six greater Boston colleges and full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Lowell said the institute has applied to the Federal Communication System for permission to build a new FM station of 20,000 watts to begin broadcasting in the fall.

The studios would be at Symphony Hall in Boston with the transmitter in the blue hills of Milton.

The new station, he said, would cover a 65-mile radius in which there is an estimated population of 4,861,369.

[261]

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 4 - 1951

Reviews of Music

Boston Symphony Winds Up Season At Vets Auditorium

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, played the final concert of the season last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. The program was received with great enthusiasm and the superb artistry of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been so completely displayed or so completely appreciated here as it was at this concert.

The program included engaging music by Rameau, the Suite from the opera "Dardanus," the delightful Symphony in E flat major (K 543) by Mozart and the Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a by Berlioz.

Rameau's music was played with a tone color which, in the first three sections, took on the faded tint of old brocade. Its stiff, conventional patterns were played with perfect balance and in the Rondeau, the delicacy of the strings was delightful. The "Rondeau gai" was played with a firmer touch and it led into the Mozart well.

The Mozart E flat is a favorite Symphony and the orchestra gave it devoted attention. The Andante was marked by a beautiful singing tone in the strings. The Trio of the Minuet was also one of the fine moments of the concert. The Finale was very gay and the audience recalled the conductor several times.

The Berlioz Symphony is a tremendous work and as Dr. Munch interpreted it, one can understand the enthusiasm which devotees of Berlioz music show. The amazing fact that Berlioz wrote as he did, so long before his contemporaries and that he experimented with orchestral tone color in a manner then unknown and even now, imitated, makes the hearing of his work all the more entrancing.

Single melodic phrases, sung with exquisite tone by solo reed instruments, unusual placing of accents and extraordinary bowing effects were some of the special bits which were heard. The full sweep of his phrases and the tonal volume of the climaxes were exploited to the utmost by the musicians and there was nothing in the music which Berlioz indicated which we did not hear.

That Dr. Munch conducted the entire program without scores and that he brought such a thrilling experience in listening to his Providence admirers as this magnificent reading of the Fantastic Symphony brings anew a profound sense of gratitude that we are able to enjoy as many concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence. It has been a wonderful season. We can anticipate next year's concerts eagerly because we are sure that the orchestra has inspired leadership.

Kent County Group Ends Series with National Male Quartet

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Kent County Civic Music Association completed its current series of concerts last night at Gorton High School Auditorium in Warwick with the appearance of the National Male Quartet in a variety program of songs and arias planned to arouse audience response by practically every known legitimate means.

There were only one or two artistic casualties—Handel's "Largo" turned up in a religious text quite out of keeping with the original setting, and the Brahms "Lullaby", especially arranged as an encore, barely nodded to Brahms in passing—but these were exceptions, and generally the evening was nicely successful in doing what it set out to do.

The arrangements used were done especially for this quartet by Leonard Marker, Walter Hatchek and Vernon Sanders. With the exceptions noted above, they were extremely clever, making use of solo passages, duets, trios, the quartet singing the melody in unison, and so on through a whole list of devices.

The Quartet was extremely well routined, with superb ensemble and clear diction and fine shading.

The program:

I
Largo ..... George Frederic Handel
Gia il sole dal Gange .. Alessandro Scarlatti
The Two Grenadiers .. Robert Schumann
The National Male Quartet

II
Duet: Solenne in quest' Ora, from "La Forza del Destino" ..... Giuseppe Verdi
Vernon Sanders and Gene Tobin

III
Where'er You Walk George Frederic Handel
On the Road to Mandalay ... Oley Speaks
All Through the Night Old Welsh Melody
Old Man River ..... Jerome Kern
The National Male Quartet
Intermission

IV
Prelude C Sharp Minor Sergi Rachmaninoff
Polonaise A Flat Major .. Frederic Chopin
Walter Hatchek

V
Duet: Act I, from "Faust" Charles Gounod
Attilio Baggiore and Bruce MacKay

VI
Stouthearted Men ..... Sigmund Romberg
Passing By ..... Henry Purcell
The Battle of Jericho ..... Traditional Negro Spiritual
The National Male Quartet

VII
Tally-ho ..... Franco Leoni
Shadrack ..... Robert MacGinsey
Mountains ..... Oscar Rasbach
The National Male Quartet

The National Male Quartet consists of Attilio Baggiore and Gene Tobin, tenors; Vernon Sanders, baritone and Bruce MacKay, bass. Walter Hatchek was at the piano both as soloist and as accompanist, both positions which he handled effectively.

"On the Road to Mandalay" and "Shadrack" had to be repeated. Among the encores were "Mighty Lak a Rose," "Some Enchanted Evening," "Big Brown Bear," and "Sylvia."

$200,000 Deficit Noted for 1950 by Symphony

APR. 5

Reserves Almost Gone in Year, Wolcott Reports; '51 Outlook Is Brighter

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a chance of coming out financially even this season, Oliver Wolcott told the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Said Mr. Wolcott, chairman of the organization:

"At last year's Friends' meeting we told you that we expected a very critical year financially, and unfortunately it turned out even worse than expected.

"We predicted a deficit before Friends' gifts of about $180,000, and the deficit actually turned out to be $100,000 greater. While our expectation of a $20,000 drop in broadcasting receipts was pretty close, record royalities decreased by $60,000 instead of the $50,000 expected. Symphony Hall rentals fell $15,000, we had to finish the rebuilding of the organ, and these and a number of other drops in receipts and increases in expenses led to this result. The Friends' gifts of just under $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000, which has pretty much eliminated all our available reserves.

"Last year we told you that the great hope was that the Federal Government would repeal the tax on admissions as applied to orchestras such as our. Had this hope materialized, it would have just about wiped out our deficit."

When hope for the tax repeal had gone, an appeal to the Friends, and a supplementary campaign headed by Bartlett Harwood, brought in $107,000.

"Further, record royalties are once more on the increase and we have, as you know, found a sponsor for the Pops broadcasts. As a result of all these factors we have a good chance of coming out even in the current year. It is touch and go, but it looks more like touch than go. I am glad to say that again we have some generous legacies and gifts to our restricted endowment

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 4 - 1951

MUSIC

National Male Quartet Gives Concert at Warwick School

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Kent County Civic Music Association completed its current series of concerts last night at Gorton High School Auditorium in Warwick with the appearance of the National Male Quartet in a variety program of songs and arias planned to arouse audience response by practically every known legitimate means.

There were only one or two artistic casualties—Handel's "Largo" turned up in a religious text quite out of keeping with the original setting, and the Brahms "Lullaby", especially arranged as an encore, barely nodded to Brahms in passing—but these were exceptions, and generally the evening was nicely successful in doing what it set out to do.

The arrangements used were done especially for this quartet by Leonard Marker, Walter Hatchek and Vernon Sanders. With the exceptions noted above, they were extremely clever, making use of solo passages, duets, trios, the quartet singing the melody in unison, and so on through a whole list of devices.

The Quartet was extremely well routined, with superb ensemble and clear diction and fine shading.

The program:

I
Largo ..... George Frederic Handel
Gia il sole dal Gange .. Alessandro Scarlatti
The Two Grenadiers .. Robert Schumann
The National Male Quartet

II
Duet: Solenne in quest' Ora, from "La Forza del Destino" ..... Giuseppe Verdi
Vernon Sanders and Gene Tobin

III
Where'er You Walk George Frederic Handel
On the Road to Mandalay ... Oley Speaks
All Through the Night Old Welsh Melody
Old Man River ..... Jerome Kern
The National Male Quartet
Intermission

IV
Prelude C Sharp Minor Sergi Rachmaninoff
Polonaise A Flat Major .. Frederic Chopin
Walter Hatchek

V
Duet: Act I, from "Faust" Charles Gounod
Attilio Baggiore and Bruce MacKay

VI
Stouthearted Men ..... Sigmund Romberg
Passing By ..... Henry Purcell
The Battle of Jericho ..... Traditional Negro Spiritual
The National Male Quartet

VII
Tally-ho ..... Franco Leoni
Shadrack ..... Robert MacGinsey
Mountains ..... Oscar Rasbach
The National Male Quartet

The National Male Quartet consists of Attilio Baggiore and Gene Tobin, tenors; Vernon Sanders, baritone and Bruce MacKay, bass. Walter Hatchek was at the piano both as soloist and as accompanist, both positions which he handled effectively.

"On the Road to Mandalay" and "Shadrack" had to be repeated. Among the encores were "Mighty Lak a Rose," "Some Enchanted Evening," "Big Brown Bear," and "Sylvia."

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Last Program of Season Here

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, played the final concert of the season last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. The program was received with great enthusiasm and the superb artistry of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been so completely displayed or so completely appreciated here as it was at this concert.

The program included engaging music by Rameau, the Suite from the opera "Dardanus," the delightful Symphony in E flat major (K 543) by Mozart and the Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a by Berlioz.

Rameau's music was played with a tone color which, in the first three sections, took on the faded tint of old brocade. Its stiff, conventional patterns were played with perfect balance and in the Rondeau, the delicacy of the strings was delightful. The "Rondeau gai" was played with a firmer touch and it led into the Mozart well.

The Mozart E flat is a favorite Symphony and the orchestra gave it devoted attention. The Andante was marked by a beautiful singing tone in the strings. The Trio of the Minuet was also one of the fine moments of the concert. The Finale was very gay and the audience recalled the conductor several times.

The Berlioz Symphony is a tremendous work and as Dr. Munch interpreted it, one can understand the enthusiasm which devotees of Berlioz music show. The amazing fact that Berlioz wrote as he did, so long before his contemporaries and that he experimented with orchestral tone color in a manner then unknown and even now, imitated, makes the hearing of his work all the more entrancing.

Single melodic phrases, sung with exquisite tone by solo reed instruments, unusual placing of accents and extraordinary bowing effects were some of the special bits which were heard. The full sweep of his phrases and the tonal volume of the climaxes were exploited to the utmost by the musicians and there was nothing in the music which Berlioz indicated which we did not hear.

That Dr. Munch conducted the entire program without scores and that he brought such a thrilling experience in listening to his Providence admirers as this magnificent reading of the Fantastic Symphony brings anew a profound sense of gratitude that we are able to enjoy as many concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence. It has been a wonderful season. We can anticipate next year's concerts eagerly because we are sure that the orchestra has inspired leadership.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 5 - 1951

ORCHESTRA IN $200,000 LOSS

Huge Boston Symphony Deficit in 1950

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of approximately $200,000 last year, Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told his group yesterday during their annual meeting.

Wolcott told the group, which contributes money to finance the world-famed orchestra, that the major factors in the deficit were the decreases in broadcasting receipts, phonograph record sales and Symphony Hall rentals. He said that record royalties fell off $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and hall rentals by $15,000.

Although the deficit was actually $280,000, contributions made by the group cut it by about $80,000, Wolcott said. He predicted that this year's financial outlook is "touch and go" but that the orchestra has a "good chance to break even financially."

Boston Post Apr. 5, 15

ORCHESTRA IN $200,000 LOSS

Huge Boston Symphony Deficit in 1950

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of approximately $200,000 last year, Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told his group yesterday during their annual meeting.

Wolcott told the group, which contributes money to finance the world-famed orchestra, that the major factors in the deficit were the decreases in broadcasting receipts, phonograph record sales and Symphony Hall rentals. He said that record royalties fell off $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Although the deficit was actually $280,000, contributions made by the group cut it by about $80,000, Wolcott said. He predicted that this year's financial outlook is "touch and go," but that the orchestra has a "good chance to break even financially."

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
APR 5 - 1951

Symphony Reports Big Hub Deficit

BOSTON, April 5 — (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the red.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that it had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950.

Wolcott said that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

He reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Wolcott said the actual deficit was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the friends group cut it to about $200,000.

He said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but he predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even."

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 5 - 1951

Boston Orchestra $280,000 in Red

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of $280,000 during the last year, Oliver Wolcott, chairman, reported at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Record royalties were declined by $60,000, broadcasting receipts were down $20,000 and Symphony Hall rentals suffered a $15,000 drop, Wolcott said. Gifts of about $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000 "which has pretty much eliminated all our available reserves," he added.

The out-look for the coming year is better, he said, because record royalties are on the increase again and a sponsor has been obtained for the Pops broadcasts. "We have a good chance of coming out even," Wolcott declared.

This Clipping From
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
APR 5 - 1951

Says Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Deficit

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the red.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that it had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950.

Wolcott said that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

He reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Wolcott said the actual deficit was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the Friends group cut it to about $200,000.

He said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but he predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even."

[262]

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 4 - 1951

Boston Symphony, Six Colleges Join in New FM Station

Plans for a new FM radio station for educational broadcasting that will bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges, as well as the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to millions of New Englanders, were announced last night by Ralph Lowell, trustees of the Lowell Institute.

Lowell said the Institute has applied to the Federal Communications Commission for a construction permit to erect a high-power non-commercial educational station with 20,000 watts effective radiated power to be operated in the FM band.

Boston Symphony Orchestra will join the six colleges and universities now members of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council to inaugurate the new station, which will feature "live" full-length concerts of the Orchestra broadcast direct from Symphony Hall.

In announcing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's affiliation with the Council, Henry B. Cabot, president of its trustees, said the orchestra would broadcast scheduled performances beginning with the 71st season next Fall.

Thus the membership of the orchestra in the council, will make it possible to add symphony music to the educational resources already provided by the cooperation of scholars and scientists, he said.

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra is frequently heard over national networks, this will be the first time that full performances have been broadcast to the listeners of Greater Boston since 1926.

Will Broadcast Important Talks

"In addition to the Symphony," Lowell said, "the proposed station is planned to carry addresses by national and international figures speaking at the universities, important public discussions, great lectures from the classrooms, full-length performances of good plays and authoritative and comprehensive interpretation of news and events by faculty specialists.

"In the field of commercial radio, Boston has well-established stations, both AM and FM," Lowell commented. "We shall not duplicate their offerings. We shall try, instead, to develop a full schedule of programs in the area generally described as 'adult education.'

"Our plans to add a unique cooperative and non-commercial FM station to Boston's listening opportunities have grown out of the encouraging response which the members of the Council have received during the past four years to the presentation of adult educational programs over Boston's commercial AM, FM and TV stations.

"The generous cooperation of the commercial stations of Boston has made these opportunities possible for Boston listeners, and it is our hope that these stations, which have furnished our colleges and universities with choice evening time on a sustaining basis, will continue to carry Council programs to their large audiences. At the same time, we hope to supplement the services already performed for the community in the field of adult education."

The transmitter and antenna of the proposed FM station would be located on the top of Great Blue Hill, in Milton, the highest point of land in eastern Massachusetts. Central studios and offices would be in Symphony Hall, Boston, with auxiliary studios in the cooperating colleges and universities. Institutions now cooperating in the Council program include Boston College, Boston University, Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern University and Tufts College. Boston University will continue to operate its own FM station, WBUR.

Transmitter by Prof. Armstrong

Engineering plans for the new station have been prepared by representatives of Harvard University and M. I. T.

The station will be equipped with a three-kilowatt frequency-modulated transmitter presented by Prof. E. H. Armstrong of Columbia University, renowned for his contributions to electronic circuitry including the vital new concept in radio broadcasting popularly known as "FM."

The land on top of Great Blue Hill is already occupied by Harvard University for operation of a meteorological observatory under a lease from the state. Under an amendment to this lease granted by the Metropolitan District Commission, the land also will be used as site for the new transmitter and antenna.

The 630-foot height of Great Blue Hill plus the height of the antenna will enable the three-kilowatt transmitter to provide the maximum radiated power of 20,000 watts allowed by the FCC in the Boston area. The new station is expected to provide strong high-quality signals within a 65-mile radius of Great Blue Hill, which is 10 miles south of Boston. The area to be covered includes 1,357,938 families with a total population of 4,861,369.

The proposed new station would be managed by Parker Wheatley, who has been director of the Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting Council since it was organized in 946. As a major, he was chief of the Radio Programs Section of the Armed Forces Radio Service during World War II, having entered the Army as a private. Earlier, he had been radio director of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., and producer of "Northwestern University Reviewing Stand" on Mutual Broadcasting System and "Of Men and Books" on Columbia Broadcasting System.

102,000 FM Sets

"I believe few other communities can match the educational resources we have in this region," Lowell said. "We shall, nevertheless, plan to bring to listeners outstanding educational programs of colleges and universities elsewhere in the country from the transcription network of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. We also shall have some surprises from other parts of the world for New England listeners."

Lowell reported that FM radio listening is on the increase stimulated in part by the sale of combination FM-TV sets. He said a report from Dr. Sydney Roslow, president of The Pulse, Inc., a radio survey organization, shows that in January, 1951, there were more than 102,000 families in the five counties of eastern Massachusetts with FM receivers. This is more than a 50 percent increase over a year ago.

Lowell, who was recently elected president of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, is president of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, formerly an overseer of Harvard University, a member of the corporations of M. I. T. and of Northeastern University and a trustee of Arts and Sciences. He holds the honorary degrees of Doctor of Laws from Northeastern and of Doctor of Humane Letters from Tufts.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
APR 5 - 1951

Orchestra Deficit $200,000 In 1950

Boston, April 5—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of [illegible] in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported yesterday.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and symphony hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

Wolcott reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

He said the deficit actually was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the Friends group cut it to about $200,000.

Wolcott said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even." He said record sales were on the increase and radio payments also were expected to be higher.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 5 - 1951

$200,000 DEFICIT

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1950 Finances Revealed

Boston, Apr. 4.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported today.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world-famed orchestra that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and symphony hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

This Clipping From COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
APR 5 - 1951

Education Station Slated for Boston Cultural Listening

Plans for a new FM radio station for educational broadcasting that will bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges, as well as the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to millions of New Englanders, have been announced by Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute.

He said the institute has applied to the Federal Communications Commission for a construction permit to erect a high-power non-commercial educational station of 20,000 watts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join the six colleges and universities, now members of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council, to inaugurate the new station which will feature "live" full-length concerts of the orchestra broadcast direct from Symphony Hall.

In announcing the orchestra's affiliation with the council, Henry B. Cabot, president of its trustees board said that broadcast performances will begin with the 71st season next fall.

Although the musical organization is frequently heard over national networks, this will be the first time full performances have been broadcast to the listeners of Boston since 1926.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
APR 4 - 1951

Lowell Institute Aiming For New Hub FM Station

By ANTHONY LA CAMERA

While many TV-conscious individuals are talking about allocations for new channels and the need for more video stations in this area, along comes a Greater Boston group which has set its sights on a new FM radio station for educational broadcasting.

Ralph Lowell, a trustee of the Lowell Institute, announces that the Institute has applied to the FCC for a construction permit to erect a high-power, non-commercial educational station of 20,000 watts and in the FM band.

The new station, according to Lowell, would be established to bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges, as well as the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to millions of New Englanders.

The transmitter and antenna of the proposed FM station would be located on the top of Great Blue Hill, in Milton, the highest point of land in Eastern Massachusetts. The central studios and offices would be in Symphony Hall, with auxiliary studios in the co-operating colleges and universities.

The institutions now co-operating in the plan are Boston College, Boston University, Harvard, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern and Tufts. Concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's affiliation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Lowell Institute trustees, reveals that the new station would broadcast scheduled performances of the orchestra, beginning with the 71st season next fall.

Although the Boston Symphony is frequently heard over radio networks, this would make the first time full performances have been made exclusively available to Greater Boston listeners since 1926.

"In addition to the Symphony," Trustee Lowell reports, "the proposed station is planned to carry addresses by national and international figures speaking at the universities, important public discussions, great lectures from the classrooms, full-length performances of good plays, and authoritative and comprehensive interpretation of news and events by faculty specialists."

Lowell expresses the belief that FM radio listening, stimulated in part by the sale of combination FM-TV sets, is on the increase in this area.

He cites a report from Pulse, Inc., radio survey organization, which shows that more than 102,000 families in five Eastern Massachusetts counties owned FM receivers as of last January. That represents an increase of 50 per cent over a year ago.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 5 - 1951

$200,000 Deficit Noted for 1950 by Symphony

Reserves Almost Gone in Year, Wolcott Reports; '51 Outlook Is Brighter

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a chance of coming out financially even this season, Oliver Wolcott told the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Said Mr. Wolcott, chairman of the organization:

"At last year's Friends' meeting we told you that we expected a very critical year financially, and unfortunately it turned out even worse than expected.

"We predicted a deficit before Friends' gifts of about $180,000, and the deficit actually turned out to be $100,000 greater. While our expectation of a $20,000 drop in broadcasting receipts was pretty close, record royalities decreased by $60,000 instead of the $50,000 expected. Symphony Hall rentals fell $15,000, we had to finish the rebuilding of the organ, and these and a number of other drops in receipts and increases in expenses led to this result. The Friends' gifts of just under $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000, which has pretty much eliminated all our available reserves.

"Last year we told you that the great hope was that the Federal Government would repeal the tax on admissions as applied to orchestras such as our. Had this hope materialized, it would have just about wiped out our deficit."

When hope for the tax repeal had gone, an appeal to the Friends, and a supplementary campaign headed by Bartlett Harwood, brought in $107,000.

"Further, record royalties are once more on the increase and we have, as you know, found a sponsor for the Pops broadcasts. As a result of all these factors we have a good chance of coming out even in the current year. It is touch and go, but it looks more like touch than go. I am glad to say that again we have some generous legacies and gifts to our restricted endowment fund to acknowledge with deepest thanks:"

From the Estate of Georgianna B. West in memory of Alonzo A. West, $5000; from the Estate of Arthur W. Moore, additional, $38,000; from an anonymous couple, $5000.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 5 - 1951

Boston Symphony $200,000 In Red

Boston, April 5. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the red.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that it had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950.

Wolcott said that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

He reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Wolcott said the actual deficit was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the friends group cut it to about $200,000.

He said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but he predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 5 - 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RED

$280,000 Deficit Leaves Unit With Few Available Reserves

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 4—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of $280,000 during the last year, Oliver Wolcott, chairman, reported today at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Record royalties were decreased by $60,000, broadcasting receipts were down $20,000 and Symphony Hall rentals suffered a $15,000 drop, Mr. Wolcott said. Gifts of about $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000, "which has pretty much eliminated all our available reserves," he added.

The outlook for the coming year is better, he said, because record royalties are on the increase again and a sponsor has been obtained for the "Pops" broadcasts. "We have a good chance of coming out even," Mr. Wolcott declared.

This Clipping From
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE
APR 5 - 1951

Boston Symphony in Red to Tune of $200,000

BOSTON—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra is in the red.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world-famed orchestra that it had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950.

Wolcott said that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

He reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Wolcott said the actual deficit was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the Friends group cut it to about $200,000.

He said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but he predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even."

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD
APR 5 - 1951

Boston Symphony $280,000 in Red

Boston, April 5 (NYT).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of $280,000 during the past year, Chairman Oliver Wolcott reported Wednesday at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Record royalties decreased by $60,000, broadcasting receipts were down $20,000, and Symphony hall rentals were $15,000 less than usual, Wolcott said. Gifts of approximately $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000, "which has pretty much eliminated all our available reserves," he added.

Had the government repealed the admission tax applied to symphony orchestras as was expected last year—it would have wiped out the deficit, Wolcott said.

The outlook for the coming year is better, he added, because record royalties are increasing and a sponsor has been obtained for the Pops broadcasts. "We have a good chance of coming out even," Wolcott declared.

[263]

April 5, 1951 - Christian Science Monitor

Barber's Second Symphony-

Music in Revised Version To Be Conducted by Composer

By Klaus G. Roy

The fact that the revised version (1947) of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony no longer contains the famous "tone generator" may give rise to more discussion than the composer deems worthwhile. He will conduct this work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts this week end.

In brief, the facts are these: The original version was given its première by Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony in March of 1944. The symphony had been completed that year when Mr. Barber was still in the Army Air Forces. A conspicuous feature of the slow movement was the simulated sound of a radio beam, produced by a specially-built electrical instrument. But times change, and composers become civilians again.

"I took it out," Mr. Barber said, "because it was really impractical, and in the long run unsatisfactory from a purely musican standpoint."

Even though the original purpose of the instrument was meant to be musical rather than descriptive, and even though thematic importance was assigned to it, the composer gave the impression that he would be glad to see the entire matter dropped once and for all. It seems unlikely that he will ever utilize the possibilities of the electrical Ondes Martenot.

♪ ♪ ♪

The exact nature of his other revisions, Mr. Barber thinks, is a matter which would demand minute comparison of the two versions. He feels that such prying into a creative artist's private workshop would prejudice a hearing of the work in its final and conclusive form.

Recently published by G. Schirmer, the symphony calls for a large orchestra, augmented by a good deal of percussion and a piano. Its three movements take about 26 minutes to play.

The first, an Allegro ma non troppo, is in sonata form with three themes. Although the effect of the entire orchestra is one of weight and agitated power, the composer demands a chamber music sound from the players whenever the texture is thinned. Woodblocks and various drums aid in a climax before the recapitulation, but the movement ends pianissimo in the higher strings.

The slow movement is an Andante un poco mosso, of nocturnal character. A five-four rhythm persits throughout, producing a quiet intensity. Divided and muted solo strings are joined by an English horn in an elegiac melody extensively developed.

The third movement, Allegro risoluto, is introduced by sharp spiral figures at presto tempo, which later recur. Variations and fugato are deployed over an ostinato bass; the coda allows the brasses full sway, and the work ends broadly and with force.

♪ ♪ ♪

Great concern with balance of form and polyphonic integration marks this work, as it did the First Symphony of 1936 with its large-scale Passacaglia. The tonal language of the Second Symphony is much more complex and dissonant than that in the Essay for Orchestra or "The School for Scanday" Overture.

But even in the most active of textures, Mr. Barber has never forsworn his apparently innate lyricism and expansiveness of melodic line. Now in his early forties, the internationally respected composer is finding a style that is related to the simplicity of his early Adagio for Strings only in so far as his human and emotional purpose as an artist is concerned. What Mr. Barber would understand by the label of "neo-romanticism," often applied to his music, may perhaps be best explained by a remark he made during the rehearsal of his symphony: "I want espressivo— but not too much."

Gracie Fields April 19

Tickets are on sale at Symphony Hall, Filene's, and Jordan's, for Gracie Fields, who will be at Symphony Hall on April 19. She will sing songs from the recent Broadway musicals as well as her familiar numbers. The songs are interspersed with stories.

Open Orchestra Rehearsal

The New England Philharmonic conducted by Richard Burgin, will give an open public rehearsal Friday evening at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. The program will feature Ma Si Hon in the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Mr. Burgin will also conduct the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture, Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain," and Wagner's Overture to "Die Mesitersinger." No admission charge.

John Brook

Samuel Barber at a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will conduct his Second Symphony at the week-end concerts in Symphony Hall.

Herald - April 5, 1951

$200,000 Deficit Shown By Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported yesterday.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group, which contributes to the world-famed orchestra, that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals had been major factors in the deficit.

Wolcott reported that record royalties had decreased $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

He said the deficit actually was approximately $280,000 but that gifts from the Friends group had cut it to about $200,000.

Wolcott said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 was "touch and go", but predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even." He said that record sales were on the increase and radio payments also were expected to be higher.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 5 - 1951

$200,000 DEFICIT

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1950 Finances Revealed

Boston, Apr. 4.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported today.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world-famed orchestra that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and symphony hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

This Clipping From BATH, ME.
TIMES
APR 5 - 1951

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS RUNNING IN RED

Boston, April 5. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in the red.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that it had a deficit of about $200.000 in 1950.

Wolcott said that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

He reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

Wolcott said the actual deficit was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the Friends group cut it to about $200,000.

He said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but he predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even."

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 6 - 1951

Conant, Lowell File Application for New FM Station

James B. Conant and Ralph Lowell, trustees of the Lowell Institute, today filed with the Secretary of State an application to incorporate a club which would operate a new FM radio station.

Call letters of the station would be WGBH. Over the airwaves WGBH would send out educational broadcasts and "live" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Six local colleges would cooperate with the new station to send out cultural broadcasts. They are Harvard, Tufts, M. I. T., Boston College, Boston University and Northeastern University.

Attorney Roland Gray Jr. of 50 Federal st. filed the application.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
APR 5 - 1951

$200,000 Deficit Shown By Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported yesterday.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group, which contributes to the world-famed orchestra, that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals had been major factors in the deficit.

Wolcott reported that record royalties had decreased $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

He said the deficit actually was approximately $280,000 but that gifts from the Friends group had cut it to about $200,000.

Wolcott said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 was "touch and go" but predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even." He said that record sales were on the increase and radio payments also were expected to be higher.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
APR [illegible]

FM Radio Station To Transmit Live Boston Concerts

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass., April 5.—Plans for a new FM radio station for educational broadcasting that will bring the cultural resources of six Greater Boston colleges, as well as the full concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to millions of New Englanders were announced by Ralph Lowell, trustee of the Lowell Institute.

Mr. Lowell said that the Lowell Institute has applied to the Federal Communications Commission for a construction permit to erect a high-power noncommercial educational station with 20,000 watts effective radiated power to be operated in the FM band.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will join the six Greater Boston colleges and universities now members of the Lowell Institute Co-operative Broadcasting Council to inaugurate the new station, which will feature "live" full-length concerts of the orchestra broadcast direct from Symphony Hall.

In announcing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's affiliation with the council, Henry B. Cabot, president of its trustees said that the orchestra would broadcast scheduled performances beginning with the seventy-first season next fall.

Thus the membership of the orchestra in the council will make it possible to add symphony music to the educational resources already provided by the co-operation of scholars [illegible]

FM SCHEDULES

KIXL-FM—Channel 283, 104.5 meg. 24 hours.
KRLD-FM—Channel 223, 92.5 meg. 5:30 a.m. to midnight.
WRR-FM—Channel 266, 101.1 meg. 8:15 to 11:15 a.m.; 6 to 9 p.m.
KYBS—Channel 300, 107.9 meg. 7 a.m. to 11 p.m.
KVTT—Channel 219, 91.7 meg. 12 noon to
KSMU-FM—Channel 207, 89.3 meg.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 6 - 1951

SYMPHONY DEFICIT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in common with other organizations which are engaged in the business of entertaining the public, apparently is having its troubles in making both ends meet, the net deficit for the past year being about $200,000.

Unlike similar groups in some foreign countries, the American musical associations are not subsidized by the government. While they are not strictly profit organizations, they are subject to about the same rules that govern business concerns generally; in that they show a deficit if they take in less money than they spend, with the notable difference that their friends sometimes come forward in helping to reduce any deficits that are incurred.

Music lovers generally will hope that the predictions of better things for the orchestra this year materialize, for the Boston Symphony is a world-famous orchestra, and it fills an important place not only in the community, but in the national life of the nation.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 5 - 1951

Boston Symphony Had $200,000 Deficit Last Year

BOSTON, Thursday (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a deficit of about $200,000 in 1950, an orchestra spokesman reported yesterday.

Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told an annual meeting of the group which contributes to the world famed orchestra that decreases in broadcasting receipts, record sales and Symphony Hall rentals were major factors in the deficit.

Wolcott reported that record royalties fell $60,000, broadcasting receipts by $20,000 and rentals by $15,000.

He said the deficit actually was approximately $280,000 but gifts from the Friends group cut it to about $200,000.

Wolcott said the orchestra's financial outlook for 1951 is "touch and go," but predicted there was a "good chance of breaking even." He said record sales were on the increase and radio payments also were expected to be higher.

[264]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 22d program of the 70th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The guest conductor was Samuel Barber; the soloist Clifford Curzon, pianist. The program: "Quiet City" ..... Copland
Symphony No. 2, Op. 19 ..... Barber
Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Op. 73 Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IN 1944 on the occasion of the first performance of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony (then sub-titled the "Air Force" Symphony, it having been commissioned by that branch of the armed forces), I find I reviewed it in enthusiastic terms. On its second performance here in a revised version yesterday afternoon the composer himself conducting, I am no less enthusiastic but just a little more aware of its shortcomings.

TO WHAT EXTENT Mr. Barber has revised his symphony I am not in a position to say. According to the program the revisions have been largely in matters of scoring and not in material. The composer has omitted the electronics sound effects of the slow movement and has, I would guess, reinforced the melodic aspects of the lyric theme of the first movement.

Now, first stated by the oboe and then taken up by the strings, this lyric section emerges as one of the more grateful contemporary melodic ideas. It also helps to throw into more powerful relief the vigor and the urgency of the opening and the developmental sections. In any case, this time I found the first movement far and away the best of the three regarding substance, form and creativity. The closing bars, very awkwardly written for the strings, which are never at their best in pianissimo ensemble at the highest position on the fingerboard, weakened the impression somewhat but it was nonetheless a fine and invigorating movement.

The slow movement I found a little tenuous, a little tiresome, a little special though still informed with Mr. Barber's highly lyrical qualities. The finale, in a strikingly active vein, recaptured the force and vitality of inspiration so well displayed in the first though on a less compulsive level and brought the work to an effective conclusion. It seems, in short, a somewhat uneven piece, an impression that might well have been conveyed by the composer's style of conducting. While Mr. Barber had a clear and forceful beat and an obviously definite idea how he wanted his music to sound, his conducting was just tentative enough to get in the way of his music. I suspect it might well have made a better impression under Mr. Munch.

THE CONCERT opened with a beautiful performance of Aaron Copland's fine occasional piece entitled "The Quiet City." We've heard it often enough now to enjoy its subtlety of mood to the full, and it is always a pleasure to hear such English horn playing as that of Louis Speyer and such trumpet playing as that of Roger Voisin. It was left, however, to Clifford Curzon, the renowned English pianist, and to Charles Munch as one of the greatest orchestral accompanists of the day, to provide the sensation of this concert.

Mr. Curzon's reputation is so formidable it was hard to see how he could live up to it until he set forth the great opening passages of the Emperor with a command, a clarity of bravura and an integrity of conception not often equalled. After that there was no doubt that his playing as well as his taste, musicianship and authority were indisputable. Consider, for example, that great octave passage of the first movement, that ascending chromatic trill of the slow movement, and that hushed transition into the rondo. His was, in short, a superb, even a great performance, and one to be long treasured in memory.

Next week's concert introduces the noted Belgian soprano in a set of arias with orchestra (including Ravel's "Scheherazade"), and D'Indy's Second Symphony and Ravel's First "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 7 - 1951

MUSIC

Composer Barber and Pianist Clifford Curzon Appear With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Composer Samuel Barber and English pianist Clifford Curzon both appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Barber conducted, as guest, the revised version of his own Second Symphony. Mr. Curzon, making his Boston debut, was soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The orchestra's regular conductor, Charles Munch, returning to the stand after an absence of a week, began the afternoon with Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," which was a substitution for the previously-scheduled "Carmel" Concerto by John Alden Carpenter.

Taking things in chronological order, since no qualities of special merit or excitement indicate otherwise, let it be said that "Quiet City" once again proved its worth in a performance that was admirable. This brief essay in mood music is well made, as we have known these 10 years, and it evokes the feeling of nostalgia, in a subdued way, which the composer intended. Mr. Munch, in his reading, captured this feeling, and did the piece full justice. But what will linger most in memory was the marvelous trumpet playing, especially in the pianissimo passages of Roger Voisin, and Louis Speyer's virtuoso performance of the solo part for English horn.

Mr. Barber's Second Symphony was also known as his "Army Air Forces" Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky gave it first performances in March, 1944. Then it contained an unconventional "instrument," an electrical tone generator to simulate a radio beam. Mr. Barber dispensed with that effect in his revision of 1947, and now the work is more than ever the absolute, undescriptive music he originally intended.

This Second Symphony is the work of a skilled hand with the orchestra, and of a musical mind with high respect for form and structure. Barber's melodic sense, when he chooses to exercise it, also is considerable, as the slow movement proves. His dissonance—and it is plentiful—is logical dissonance, for reason and effect. Yet I still feel that the Symphony is too long for what it has to say. Mr. Barber was cordially greeted when the performance was over.

Clifford Curzon came to Boston with a high reputation gained elsewhere. His performance of Beethoven's great masterpiece was taut, tense and boldly outlined. He was exact in the tempo and in the rhythms. But his tone often was hard, some of the fast scale passages were blurred, and there was little or no poetry, for my taste, save in the brief slow movement.

Mr. Curzon may have been nervous, for the piano was not fully in tune with the orchestra (although solo bassoon and solo flute seemed to agree with it on occasion); the orchestral strings were extremely dry and not in tune with the woodwinds. The applause was considerable, however, and Mr. Curzon was recalled to the stage several times.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
APR 7 - 1951

MUSIC

Composer Barber and Pianist Clifford Curzon Appear With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

Composer Samuel Barber and English pianist Clifford Curzon both appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Barber conducted, as guest, the revised version of his own Second Symphony. Mr. Curzon, making his Boston debut, was soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The orchestra's regular conductor, Charles Munch, returning to the stand after an absence of a week, began the afternoon with Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," which was a substitution for the previously-scheduled "Carmel" Concerto by John Alden Carpenter.

Taking things in chronological order, since no qualities of special merit or excitement indicate otherwise, let it be said that "Quiet City" once again proved its worth in a performance that was admirable. This brief essay in mood music is well made, as we have known these 10 years, and it evokes the feeling of nostalgia, in a subdued way, which the composer intended. Mr. Munch, in his reading, captured this feeling, and did the piece full justice. But what will linger most in memory was the marvelous trumpet playing, especially in the pianissimo passages of Roger Voisin, and Louis Speyer's virtuoso performance of the solo part for English horn.

Mr. Barber's Second Symphony was also known as his "Army Air Forces" Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky gave it first performances in March, 1944. Then it contained an unconventional "instrument," an electrical tone generator to simulate a radio beam. Mr. Barber dispensed with that effect in his revision of 1947, and now the work is more than ever the absolute, undescriptive music he originally intended.

This Second Symphony is the work of a skilled hand with the orchestra, and of a musical mind with high respect for form and structure. Barber's melodic sense, when he chooses to exercise it, also is considerable, as the slow movement proves. His dissonance—and it is plentiful—is logical dissonance, for reason and effect. Yet I still feel that the Symphony is too long for what it has to say. Mr. Barber was cordially greeted when the performance was over.

Clifford Curzon came to Boston with a high reputation gained elsewhere. His performance of Beethoven's great masterpiece was taut, tense and boldly outlined. He was exact in the tempo and in the rhythms. But his tone often was hard, some of the fast scale passages were blurred, and there was little or no poetry, for my taste, save in the brief slow movement.

Mr. Curzon may have been nervous, for the piano was not fully in tune with the orchestra (although solo bassoon and solo flute seemed to agree with it on occasion); the orchestral strings were extremely dry and not in tune with the woodwinds. The applause was considerable, however, and Mr. Curzon was recalled to the stage several times.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
APR 9 - 1951

Symphony Concerts To Be Heard Over FM

The participation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the coming new FM station which is to be operated by the Lowell Institute beginning next season has been made possible by the following generous contributions: The Theodore Clarence Hollander Fund (Permanent Charity Fund), Edward A. Larner, president, Employers Liability Assurance Corporation, Mark M. Horblit and A. M. Sonnabend.

The new plan will enable listeners within a 65-mile radius of the Blue Hills to hear full concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MUSIC April 7

Composer Barber and Pianist Clifford Curzon Appear With Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

returning to the stand after an absence of a week, began the afternoon with Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," which was a substitution for the previously-scheduled "Carmel" Concerto by John Alden Carpenter.

Taking things in chronological order, since no qualities of special merit or excitement indicate otherwise, let it be said that "Quiet City" once again proved its worth in a performance that was admirable. This brief essay in mood music is well made, as we have known these 10 years, and it evokes the feeling of nostalgia, in a subdued way, which the composer intended. Mr. Munch, in his reading, captured this feeling, and did the piece full justice. But what will linger most in memory was the marvelous trumpet playing, especially in the pianissimo passages of Roger Voisin, and Louis Speyer's virtuoso performance of the solo part for English horn.

Mr. Barber's Second Symphony was also known as his "Army Air Forces" Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky gave it first performances in March, 1944. Then it contained an unconventional "instrument," an electrical tone generator to simulate a radio beam. Mr. Barber dispensed with that effect in his revision of 1947, and now the work is more than ever the absolute, undescriptive music he originally intended.

This Second Symphony is the work of a skilled hand with the orchestra, and of a musical mind with high respect for form and structure. Barber's melodic sense, when he chooses to exercise it, also is considerable, as the slow movement proves. His dissonance—and it is plentiful—is logical dissonance, for reason and effect. Yet I still feel that the Symphony is too long for what it has to say. Mr. Barber was cordially greeted when the performance was over.

Clifford Curzon came to Boston with a high reputation gained elsewhere. His performance of Beethoven's great masterpiece was taut, tense and boldly outlined. He was exact in the tempo and in the rhythms. But his tone often was hard, some of the fast scale passages were blurred, and there was little or no poetry, for my taste, save in the brief slow movement.

Mr. Curzon may have been nervous, for the piano was not fully in tune with the orchestra (although solo bassoon and solo flute seemed to agree with it on occasion); the orchestral strings were extremely dry and not in tune with the woodwinds. The applause was considerable, however, and Mr. Curzon was recalled to the stage several times.

Composer Samuel Barber and English pianist Clifford Curzon both appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Barber conducted, as guest, the revised version of his own Second Symphony. Mr. Curzon, making his Boston debut, was soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. The orchestra's regular conductor, Charles Munch,

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
APR 14 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have been hearing a lot of fine singing at the Opera House this week and we heard some more at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, from a soprano who has not yet joined Mr. Bing's Metropolitan, but who would grace it if she did. Her name is Suzanne Danco. She is a Belgian, who made her first American appearances this year, and her beautiful voice is beginning to be known to record collectors.

Miss Danco was heard in airs from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" (per pieta) and "The Marriage of Figaro" (deh vieni, non tardar). She then appeared in a performance of Ravel's "Sheherazade." It was in the Mozart that Miss Danco really shone. She would seem to have everything in the way of voice, musicianship and style that a Mozart singer requires. The music of Ravel she sang discerningly and expressively, but these three pieces, which we last heard in December 1942, require a darker, even a warmer voice than hers appears to be. Miss Danco was most enthusiastically received, as indeed she deserved to be.

At this pair of concerts Mr. Charles Munch, conductor, is honoring the memory of a notable French composer, Vincent d'Indy, who was born a hundred years ago last month. The work he chose was the monumental Second Symphony, a work of great nobility and of marvelous facture, though it lacks the creative impulse which marks the "Symphony on a Mountain Air," the "Istar" Variations, and, as I recall it, the three-part tone poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," which we have not heard since 1924, while the symphony is fairly familiar. This fine work received an understanding and a tonally beautiful performance. D'Indy knew how to make an orchestra sound and Mr. Munch gave him every support. The current concerts conclude with the seldom-heard First Suite (minus the interlude) from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The greater popularity of the Second is easily understood. However, the Nocturne contains interesting instrumental effects and the warlike dance is exciting. Here as elsewhere throughout the afternoon, Mr. Munch and the orchestra were in fine form.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

We have been hearing a lot of fine singing at the Opera House this week and we heard some more at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, from a soprano who has not yet joined Mr. Bing's Metropolitan, but who would grace it if she did. Her name is Suzanne Danco. She is a Belgian, who made her first American appearances this year, and her beautiful voice is beginning to be known to record collectors.

Miss Danco was heard in airs from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" (per pieta) and "The Marriage of Figaro" (deh vieni, non tardar). She then appeared in a performance of Ravel's "Sheherazade." It was in the Mozart that Miss Danco really shone. She would seem to have everything in the way of voice, musicianship and style that a Mozart singer requires. The music of Ravel she sang discerningly and expressively, but these three pieces, which we last heard in December 1942, require a darker, even a warmer voice than hers appears to be. Miss Danco was most enthusiastically received, as indeed she deserved to be.

At this pair of concerts Mr. Charles Munch, conductor, is honoring the memory of a notable French composer, Vincent d'Indy, who was born a hundred years ago last month. The work he chose was the monumental Second Symphony, a work of great nobility and of marvelous facture, though it lacks the creative impulse which marks the "Symphony on a Mountain Air," the "Istar" Variations, and, as I recall it, the three-part tone poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," which we have not heard since 1924, while the symphony is fairly familiar. This fine work received an understanding and a tonally beautiful performance. D'Indy knew how to make an orchestra sound and Mr. Munch gave him every support. The current concerts conclude with the seldom-heard First Suite (minus the interlude) from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." The greater popularity of the Second is easily understood. However, the Nocturne contains interesting instrumental effects and the warlike dance is exciting. Here as elsewhere throughout the afternoon, Mr. Munch and the orchestra were in fine form.

This Clipping From
TUCSON, ARIZ.
ARIZONA STAR
APR 8 1951

Koussevitsky Sees Southwest As Becoming Cultural Center

PHOENIX, April 7.—(Special)—The southwest is uniquely designed to become one of the greatest cultural centers of the world, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky declared recently in discussing the Tucson Festival of Arts with Elliott Arnold, festival president.

Dr. Koussevitsky, now living near Phoenix, is regarded as one of the great musical interpreters of his age. He recently retired as director of the Boston symphony. He founded the famed Tanglewood festival in Massachusetts.

"You don't even realize yourselves what you have here," he said. "Look at this country around us in southern Arizona. The climate which you all talk about so much—do you realize what this means in terms of an art center?

"In Tanglewood we have just a few weeks each summer for the students to work and the orchestra to give its concerts. Here, on the other hand, you have five, six, seven months out of the year in which the most perfect climatic conditions imaginable exist.

Specific Instances

"Just to give some specific instances: Think of what the dryness of the climate here means to students studying the voice. You don't realize unless you have been in this field as long as I have how much time is lost, wasted, by throat irritations, colds, damp conditions which affect the singing voice. Here such things are largely nonexistent. The same thing applies to certain musical instruments which are affected by humidity and changing weather conditions; the tone of violins for instance. Here all of those small but terribly important obstacles are eliminated.

"But I want to go beyond that. It's not just the climate, even though the climate offers the first basic physical encouragement for the establishment of a great center of artistic activities. It goes much beyond that. Here I sit in my room with large glass windows all around me. Wherever I look I see these great brooding mountains. I have lived here but three years and yet I have found myself filled with the moods and impressions and atmosphere of this beautiful section of the country. All around me I can feel the things that have passed before. They are in the air, they are on the earth, they are in the mountains.

New Thoughts

This is a region of the country that is not set in its artistic thinking. New thoughts, new theories, new ideas are encouraged by the very nature of life around here. What could afford a greater combination of wonderful foundation for people interested in the arts, all the arts, than to live in a place where the climate is so perfect, where the surroundings are so exalted, and where the limitations imposed on the imagination are imposed only by the limitations of the human mind itself?"

"I can't tell you how thrilled I am to know that your Festival of Arts originated among artists. It is an easy thing, perhaps, to buy a festival. If you get enough money together, you can hire anybody, even the best. But to think that a few artists with very little resources, with very little experience and with nothing but a great driving urge to express the artistic and cultural feelings they felt surrounding them in this beautiful country, is the most heartwarming thing I have experienced in a very long time.

"You must carry on with this idea and make it greater and truer each time you do it.

Anxious to Help

"If there is anything in my experience that will help guide you, would like to be able to give it to you. I do not think of Phoenix, do not think of Tucson, I think only of us as belonging to a great regional area in this country which larger than the cities or the people. I want to have a part as far as can in the development of this festival idea in the future."

April 7, 1951

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts had gone for sometime without offering anything in the way of music or performance that could be properly described as sensational, which is not to say that they have lacked interest. However, the needed stimulation came yesterday afternoon when the British pianist Clifford Curzon, made his local debut in the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven.

The Emperor, as it is popularly called, is anything but performance proof. In a great performance it stands as great music; in a mediocre or pedestrian one it can relapse into dullness. Happily, that of yesterday was of the great variety, surpassing on the planistic side any traversal of the work we had heard in years. Nor was the orchestral part unworthy of the distinguished company in which it was placed. Sometimes inclined to extravagance and overemphasis in the music of Beethoven, Mr. Munch yesterday had everything under control and the whole effect was magnificent.

As for Mr. Curzon, whom we had waited for too long to hear, he disclosed his stature as virtuoso and musician in the very opening measures, so arresting were they both tonally and rhythmically. After that no opportunity was lost: every measure, every note had significance. Even in a day when such things are taken for granted, Mr. Curzon's command of different varieties and gradations of tone is exceptional. He seemed to be playing not one instrument but a dozen.

An eleventh hour change in the program brought Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" as opening number in place of the announced "Carmel" Concerto of Carpenter. Mr. Munch gave it a sensitive reading, and Roger Voisin and Louis Speyer distinguished themselves in their respective roles of solo trumpet and English horn.

